This thing of dragging in Scripture, to give moral tone to tradition, cannot by any means be pleasing to Him who says: "He that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully." "If they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Can you find anything in God's blessed book to justify your remarks on the occasion referred to? "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God." Where do the "oracles of God" teach the consciousness of the dead? Jesus said to the Jews: "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead." Did the Jews deny this statement, and contend that they were somewhere alive? Certainly not; for when Jesus said: "If a man keep my sayings he shall never see death," the Jews replied, "Now we know that thou hast a devil; Abraham is dead, and the prophets; and thou sayest if a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." Did the Saviour contradict the Jews and tell them that Abraham and the prophets were then in heaven, alive and singing, and he knew this to be so? "Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead;" and whom makest thou thyself, my brother, by affirming they are not dead? And although they are thus dead, yet the oath and promise of God secures them a resurrection from the dead. ("As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations) before him whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were." Paul's testimony concerning them is, "These all died in faith, not having received the promise." Such an idea as "life," between "the life which now is, and the life which is to come" receives no countenance whatever from the sacred Scripture, and is utterly at variance with, and subversive of the glorious doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. "For, if the dead rise not, then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?" Poor deluded Paul! had you lived till now, modern teachers would have comforted you with the old Edenic doctrine, "Ye shall not surely die;" those beasts may tear in pieces the "beautiful casket," but as for Paul they conld not harm him; death itself could not kill Paul; it would become the "gate of endless joy," and Paul might "fly fearless through death's iron gate," and "be living and singing in heaven with Jesus," because modern teachers "know this is so." Oh tradition, tradition, what hast thou done? If Paul could only hear thy learned advocates, would he not indeed "marvel" to see, and hear, how very far removed from his teaching, unto another gospel, and how earnestly he would caution them and assure them that "Though we or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." "For the time (has now) come when they will not endure sound doctrine, but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears, and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables." "Having a form of godliness, but denying its power," they have substituted the fables of Plato and of heathen mythology, for the sound doctrines of "Jesus and the resnrrection," and their itching ears are tickled when deep, dark, mysterious, incomprehensible, abstruse, abstract, metaphysical and philosophical problems are made the subjects of pulpit eloquence, and the flowers of rhetoric and oratory dazzle and float in their imagination, like the gilded balls of the chinese magician, in the presence of an admiring audience. Science, falsely so-called, and vain philosophy are the right and left hand maidens of a corrupted gospel, or more properly, the crutches on which tradition leans, and by which it manages to hobble around. Just ask tradition, or science, falsely so called or vain philosophy, this question: "If a man die, shall he live again?" and what is their answer? "He is not dead, he lives, he lives in heaven; he has entered into that spiritual body, eternal in the heavens, and we know this is so." Then, of course, he needs no resurrection, and the doctrine has been dispensed with; and if there be no resurrection, or it has passed, then, of course, Christ has made his second Advent, and is to come no more; "for all things continue as they were from the beginning;" and science and philosophy have demonstrated that "matter is eternal;" and then telegraphic communications from the spirit land are now so well established, and the lines in such perfect order, and the spirits more willing to communicate than we are to receive them; would it not be better to turn our churches into spiritual temples, and our congregations into circles, our pastors and officiary into first class mediums, and thus find out the depth, and height, and length, and breadth of the mysteries of the marvelous mysticisms of spritualistic spiritism.

Ridicule: No sir. It is only the natural legitimate come out of the traditions of men, of which spiritism is the fruitful crop, and for which the doctrine of immortal-soulism is the primal cause, and stands in the presence of God responsible. "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" Has not the blessed Jesus power over all flesh, and will he not give eternal life to as many as the Father hath given Him? and is it not the Father's will that of all that "he hath given Christ, he should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day?" did he not repeat this promise on many occasions? Did he not assure his disciples that, "Because I live ye shall live also?" is it true, that by the first Adam came death; and if there had been no second Adam, there could be no resurrection, nor future life whatever? Did the Apostle understand his own reasoning when he affirmed, that "to this end, Christ both died, and revived, and rose again, that he might be Lord, both of the living and the dead?" (Christians of course); for he is not the God of the dead. You know these dead, are dead; "they shall not live, they are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them and made all their memory to perish." They "remain in the congregation of the dead;" consequently the question propounded by the patriarch Job, "If a man die, shall he live again?" becomes one of paramount interest, when viewed from the Bible standpoint. Jesus said to the Jews, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you;" no inherent, natural immortality. "I am the bread of life; he that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son, hath not life" and "shall not see life." Now, if a man refuse to eat this bread of life, he dies, just as the father which ate the manna in the wilderness and are dead, and will never live again, for there is no life in them, now, but animal life, and this is the fleshly life, born of flesh and ends in death and corruption; the righteous eat this bread of life, partake of the spirit of Christ, are begotten again unto a hope of life from the dead, by the resurrection of Christ from the dead; and while looking for (the realization of) the blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, they fall asleep in death without receiving the promised inheritance; they died in faith, and they rest in hope "of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, hath promised;" first to Abraham, and all his seed. The promise, then, is sure to all the seed; whether they sleep or wake, it matters not, God hath sworn by Himself to keep his oath to Abraham and his seed, and whether they now repose in the depths of the ocean, or lie deep in the furrows of the rending earthquake, or buried beneath the ruins of once densely populated cities, or whether they are now living and moving among men, and unknown by even professing christians, God knows them, and knows too that they are the only subjects worthy of eternal life,and will attain unto the resurrection of the dead, or a translation at his second coming in power and great glory, when he comes to judge the quick and the dead; and that this is the truth can be abundantly shown from the Scriptures. Jesus informed his disciples that, "Whither I go, ye cannot come." John xiii. 33; and in the following chapter, he comforts them with these words, "Let not your hearts be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you, and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." Could he have told them in plainer language than this, that they could not come where he has gone, but that he will come again at the time appointed by the Father; and if we, with Paul, love his appearing, we shall receive with him, a crown of life; for, "unto them that look for him, shall he appear the second time, without sin unto salvation."

Death has no agency whatever in the christian's reward. "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work shall be." "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." "I will raise them up at the last day." "Because I live ye live also." These are some of the promises of Him who was under the dominion of death himself, but being raised from the dead, he dieth no more, "death hath no more dominion over him;" he can say, "I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive forever more, Amen; and have the keys of death and hades." Then where is the use of "beating the air," or "fighting with shadows?" Can a mother forget to wake her sleeping child? She may; but God will not forget the heirs of promise. "Precious in the sight of the Lord, is the death of his saints;" and all the attributes of omnipotence are pledged to give Abraham and his seed their promised inheritance. Why then all this hot haste in sending imaginary sky-kingdom, "beyond the bounds of time and space?" which, in the very nature of things, must be outside of God's creation, and may very properly be called, "nowhere;" and as this imaginary soul is "immaterial," that is, nothing; nowhere would be a very appropiate place for nothing to go:

> "Add nothing to nothing, and nothing is gained, > Nothing from nothing, and nothing remains"

And yet what volumes have been written to bolster up this prostrate Dagon of inherent immortality; but on the wall of destiny may be traced, in characters of prophetic certainty, this handwriting: Immortalsoulism, "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of the Father, full of "grace and truth," hath supplanted thee, thy birthright is departed from thee forever; bred and born in the carnal mind, which is at enmity with God, and is not subject to his law; neither indeed can be; thou must indeed be cast out, "for the Son of the bond-woman, shall not be heir with the Son of the free-woman." Thank God, we are no longer children of the bond-woman, but of the free; and the Son of the freewoman hath made us free from the law of sin and death; and being made free, we are free indeed. "The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, hath made us free from the law of sin and death; for what the law could not do, in that it was weak, through the flesh, God, sending his own Son, in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit," "and if the spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, then He also which raised up Christ from the dead, shall quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you." "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so also them that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him," (from the dead of course.)

Now we might extend these and similar promises almost to any extent; but to find one promise of going to heaven at death, we have not been able, nor do we think any one can, that they may endeavor to weave in a few inferential texts in proof, we have no doubt; but will they stand sound Bible criticism? Does the Bible speak in positive terms when it says, "The living know that they shall die, but the dead know not anything; neither have (present tense) they any more a reward." The righteous are without their reward while dead, of course. But when Jesus, who has power over all flesh, and has authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man; when he comes, and his reward is with him, he will also bring the keys of death and hades, and fulfil his promise, and raise his people up, and give them their rewards; while the wicked will be left, "as though they had not been."

Now, every man in the possession of his reason, knows the above passage to be true; they all know that when a man dies, he returns to his earth, and in that very day his thoughts perish; and if, as a man, he ever lives again he must be raised from the dead; here knowledge stops, all beyond this is speculation; mere matter of opinion; and God thus shows us, in every corpse we see, a perfect picture of our own mortality, and in obedience to his beheet, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return;" we commit our dead to the bosom of mother earth. If we plant them there, in the likeness of Christ's death, they shall appear also in the likeness of his resurrection; but if there is no hope in their death, they shall not see life, but the law of sin and death abideth on them. Oh what an insurmountable barrier to a right apprehension of the simple truth, as it is in Jesus, is this doctrine of inherent immortality. May we all see the truth, that "God only hath immortality;" and then, by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, honor and immortality, thus securing the promise of eternal life when Jesus comes.

Yours, in hope.

WILLMINGTON, Del., March 26, 1871,

A LETTER ON JOHN V. 28, 29.

BY CLARENDON KELLY.

To J——. W——: You say you think that "making John v: 29 figurative is an error." Let me show you some of the consequences of a literal construction of this passage. But first let me say. Whatever meaning we may attach to the word "graves," as a mere English word, nevertheless, when it stands as the representative of a word in another language, its meaning must be limited to that of the word it represents. To disregard this rule is in fact to add to the words of the original. This you understand.

Now in order to make this passage teach a general resurrection of both good and bad, you have to attach a meaning to the word "graves," in verse 28; equal to that of sheol of the Hebrew and thanatos or hades of the Greek. But the Saviour did not use either of these words in this passage. He said, "All those in tois Mneemeios shall hear his voice," etc. Now mneemeios never means the state or general abode of the dead, as does sheol or hades, Here are its definitions as given by J. P. Englis in his "Greek Lexicon:" "Mneemeios, from Mnas—Memorial, Monument; a Cenotaph, Tomb, Sepulchre."

The following passages will show you its meaning as used by Jesus and the apostles. "And laid it in his own new mneemeios—tomb, and having rolled a great stone to the door of the—mneemeios—tomb." Matt. xxvii. 60; "And his disciples having heard, came and carried off the dead body and placed it (the "dead body") in—a mneemeois—tomb." Mark vi. 29. "And do not permit their dead bodies to be put into—mneemeios—tomb." Rev. xi. 9. Please observe—The persons spoken of in the above passages were already in the state of death, literally, before their friends put them in—mneemeios. See also the following passages: Acts xiii. 29; Matt. viii. 28; Mark xv. 46: xvi. 2, 3, 5, 8; Luke xi. 47: xxiii. 55: xxiv. 1, 2, 9, 12, 22; John xix. 41, 42: xx. 1, 2, 3, 6, 11; Acts ii. 29,: vii. 16. In all these passages it means, a place to deposit a dead body or bodies. Therefore if you hold that "come forth," means raised from the dead, it cannot embrace any, good or bad, whose bodies have not been buried in a—mneemeios—tomb. The millions of human beings of both classes, who have had no burial in a tomb, are left entirely out of the resurrection, so far as this passage is concerned; for, if Jesus had intended to teach a general resurrection, why did he use a word that was never used to signify "the dead" as a whole, and never had such a meaning, and not use the word, sheol or hades, which did have just that meaning, and would have taught just the doctrine that it is erroneously contended is taught in this passage?

The reason is obvious to my mind. He did not intend to teach such a doctrine, and hence he was careful not to use words that would teach it. So you see, that no general resurrection doctrine can be got out of this passage without giving to this word—mneemeios—a latitude that it never had anywhere else, and that without a shadow of authority only that the common version reads "graves," and the word "grave" sometimes signifies the general abode of the dead.

Another thing to which I invite your attention is the fact that the coming forth is not "the resurrection of the dead." The resurrection of verse 29 is something unto which those in the tombs "come forth." It is "the resurrection of life," and "The resurrection of condemnation."

Well then, brother W——, having found that no general resurrection of [literally] dead ones is taught in this passage, let us give it a careful and unprejudiced investigation, and see if we cannot discover what Jesus did intend to teach. We will commence with verse 24, where a passing from death into life is mentioned in these words, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." What does the Saviour mean by "heareth my word?"—See chap, viii. 43, 47. "Why do ye not understand my speech? because ye cannot hear my word" [with the "hearing of faith."] "He that is of God heareth God's words; ye therefore hear them not because ye are not of God." Now, brother W——, you see that to hear Christ's words, in the sense that he uses the term "hear," a man must be literally alive. And yet one must be dead before he can "pass from death unto life."

All who heard Jesus with the physical ear did not hear his word. But those who did hear, passed from death unto life. In what sense? See—Ch. viii. 51. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my sayings he shall never see death" [in the absolute sense]. Not mere temporal death; else the words of Jesus would be untrue. But his words are true. Neither could he have referred to some future death; for he makes this same promise in chapter vi. in these words, "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead. This is that bread which came down from heaven that a man may eat thereof and not die."—Verse 49, 50. "This is that bread which came down from heaven, not as your fathers did eat manna and are dead; he that eateth of this bread shall live forever."—Verse 58. Now do you not see that by claiming that the fathers who died in the wilderness, died only a temporal death, viz., suspension of life, from which they are to have a resurrection, literally—i. e., be restored to conscious existence, you make Christ teach that those who eat the bread that came down from heaven should not lose their conscious existence at all? and in that case, I ask where do they stay while their bodies are mouldering in the dust? They are not with Christ, for he told them they could not come there. Take care, brother, you are not far from the pit of natural immortality. Look out that you do not fall into it.

"The wages of sin [the penalty of the law] is death." Not suspension of life, (else men suffer the sentence of the law after their offences are pardoned), but death in the absolute sense. This sentence passed upon all, "For that all have sinned." But when men become united to Christ, i. e., become "new creatures in Christ Jesus," they are freed from the "law of sin and death;"—(Rom. viii. 2): and hence they do not die in the absolute sense, but in the secondary sense, viz., suspension of life, or of conscious existence. Having passed out from under the sentence of the law, which is death; and become partakers of the life of Christ, they are properly said to have passed out of death unto life.

Now that we may not mistake the time and nature of this eating, we will read the words of the Saviour, recorded in John vi. "And the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."—Verse 51. "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day."—Verse 54. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me hath everlasting life."—Verse 47.

To believe on him, then, is to eat of the bread that came down from heaven. Such shall not die as the fathers died in the wilderness. Why? Because "I will raise him up at the last day." They heard his word and passed out of death into life. Those who cannot hear, still abide in death, and will utterly perish in their own corruption, as did the fathers in the wilderness.

We will now look at verse 25. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, the hour is coming and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." As I have already said, a man cannot pass from death unto life unless he is first in death; and to be in death is to be dead. We have seen, in verse 24, that some passed from death unto life. You will not contend that these were literally dead; for they not only heard but they believed.

Well then, as verse 25 is the continuation of his discourse, why make the dead of this verse different from that of verse 24? I am fully satisfied that Jesus is not speaking of persons literally dead in this verse or in verses 28, 29. Let us see. Whose voice were the dead to hear? Ans.—"The dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God." Did all that heard Jesus hear the voice of the Son of God? No; for he says, "But ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you. My sheep hear my voice and I know them, and they follow me."—John x. 26, 27. And again, in verse 33, "The Jews answered him saying, For a good work we stone thee not; but for blasphemy: and because that thou being a man, makest thyself God." Thus you see, some who heard Jesus, could not hear the voice of the Son of God, because they "were not of God." They were not his sheep, and could hear only the voice of "a man." But some heard more than the voice of a man; they heard the voice of the Son of God;—(see Matt. xvi. 16); and those that heard lived, i. e., "passed out of death unto life." But an hour comes, when all who are in the tombs will "hear his voice." The effect however will not be as it was when Jesus was on the earth before. Then all who heard lived, as the result of their hearing; but when the hour comes for all in the tombs to hear, life is not the result of hearing; hearing only causes them to "come forth unto" a resurrection. But we will drop this part of the subject for the present, and look after those in the tombs, and see if we can determine who they are.

DEAD AND NOT DEAD, ALIVE AND NOT ALIVE.

BY Z. CAMPBELL.

"Wherefore I praise the dead which are already dead more than the living which are already alive."—ECCL. iv 2.

THIS very singular text teaches a truth which a great part of Christendom do not believe or understand. The first clause: "The dead which are already dead," by implication proves there is a class that are dead; and yet not dead. The second clause, "the living that are yet alive," in the same manner, proves there is another class that are alive, and yet not alive. So it is evident there must be a difference in the condition of the dead, relative to death; and also conditions of the living relative to life. To illustrate; our Saviour says, John vi. 47–50. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me hath everlasting life. I am that bread of life. Your father's did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. This is the bread which came down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die." Here is an assertion that the fathers that eat manna are dead; but those who eat the bread of life will never die. But thousands have eaten that bread of life, and their bodies are as dead as those who eat manna in the wilderness. Now wherein is the difference? Let us see:

Our Saviour (Luke xx. 37, 38), quoted the language to Moses at the bush, to prove a resurrection from the dead. "I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob," and added, "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living."

This language was used long after the patriarchs were dead; and yet, God was their God, and not the God of the dead. Therefore, in some sense, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were not dead, because God is their God. And the Saviour gives this as proof of the resurrection of the dead. So those who are dead that God is the God of, will be resurrected to life; this is certain, unless the Lord failed to prove a resurrection. But he did not fail; it is equally as eertain that those of the dead, that God is not the God of, will have no resurrection.

So, since God is not the God of all the dead, all the dead will not be raised. God raises none but his own children; and his own children are children of the resurrection. See Luke xx. 36.

But how is it that some of the dead are not dead? The Saviour says, "My sheep hear my voice . . . I give unto them eternal life." Now, the penalty of sin has no claim on this eternal life that Christ gives to his sheep; its claim extends only to our Adamic life. So when the Christian loses his Adamic life, which is already forfeited to the law, he is not dead, because he still retains the eternal life given to him by the good shepherd, the LIFE-GIVER; and this life is hid with Christ in God. He is Adamically dead; but still he lives, and God is his God, therefore, he is sure of a resurrection to the enjoyment of eternal life.

And for another reason he cannot die as did the fathers in the wilderness; he is a part of a body, having a living Head; so, as long as the Head is alive the body lives also. Christ is the living Head, and first resurrection.

But not so with the ungodly; they have no living resurrected Head: the law takes their Adamic lives and leaves them no other: mercy gives them no other, because they have rejected her offer: they are dead and God is not their God; therefore they have no resurrection.

So the dead that are not dead are true Christians: and the dead that are dead are the ungodly. The living that are alive are the converts to Christianity:—John v. 24, 25; and the living that are not alive are the living wicked, not passed from death unto life: over these the second death has power to hold them forever; but over those who have part in the first resurrection, it has no power. Christ is the first Resurrection, he is also the Life; and those having part in him have part in the first resurrection. And as the second death has no power over Christ, so it can have no power over those in Christ. They sleep in him, and the life he gives them is hid with him in God. They are not dead, but live eternally in their living Head.

"HER PLAGUES COME."

BY ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

APRIL 10.—In Paris the prospect of a most terrible and unheard-of slaughter. The details of the condition I need not give. Some items will suffice.

The Commune will have a hundred thousand picked men. The Paris Avengers being organized, and arms being taken for their use. In the last battle the slaughter was fearful on both sides: 12,000 killed and wounded.

The Commune have decreed the separation of Church and State, and abolished all national property. An escaped nun, at Brussels, says that the priests are insulted, arrested, and maltreated. Convents entered at night and searched. A rumor prevailed that twenty priests had been shot. A special, to the "Daily News," says that "all the professors and officers of the Jesuit's College have been arrested by the Commune.

This "city of confusion" is being "broken down." The judgment upon the Great Harlot Power in this second great instalment, comes suddenly, and just as the word indicates.

The condition of the great capital, to-day, is just what it should be if our reasoning is correct in previous articles, showing that the literal "great city, Babylon," is the French metropolis.

It is essential that the temporal power of the Pope should depart just at this time. It is essential that Louis Napoleon should go down (his government to perdition) in connection, and equally essential that Paris should suffer an infliction of wrath, that the Catholic powers should be humbled in France, preparatory to the final thunders which shall shiver the system to atoms. Strong is the Lord God who judgeth her.

FROM MARIA M. WEAVER.

DEAR PILGRIMS: Of late I have felt too unqualified to write for our "family paper," and as so many of our "elders" have been writing, it seemed appropriate that "little children" should keep still. Not presuming to "speak to edification" on the strange subjects now being presented in the HERALD, I only ask the privilege of saying THE LORD is still my SHEPHERD, and has been good and kind to me the past cold winter. My faith in his precious promises has been greatly strengthened, and I have had fresh tokens of his love, sweet answers to prayers, and an increased desire to see him whom my "soul loveth," O, will "it not" be a joyful day when our God calls us to inhabit the city where his peace and glory reigns! Is it not worth all the crosses and trials we may be called to endure to have the hope of such precious promises?

We would express our thanks to "Father in heaven" for mercifully sparing to the church our dear Brethren Storrs and Campbell; and, also, for granting a little strength to our loved, tho' unseen Br. E. Wolcott. The thought that Jesus will soon come is truly cheering. O how many hearts, are longing to see him. But O, let us search ourselves and see if there truly is no "evil way" with us. I often see faults in my own life, and if at last I am saved it will be because God had mercy on me. Through his rich grace I hope to be reckoned as one of his children at last.

"What do you think of the Age to come?" ask several of our dear ones, in writing to me. My answer is, I can see neither beginning or end to it; but suppose it must be my own fault. Once thought I understood the subject; but after reading some tracts on the subject, which seemed full of man's imaginations, instead of Scripture, I gave it up as too great a subject for small minds to comprehend. It is no one's duty to believe a doctrine that is not plain. Yet we should be willing to listen and learn. I want to hear on both sides. The "Truth" is what we want to "buy," and we know it will be for our good. So let us use wisdom and grace concerning this subject, as well as any other.

Nothing is more common than for men, when they have lost the spirit and power of the grace of God, or never possessed either, to seek to make up their lack of such grace by attention to forms and ceremonies, as if Christianity was made up mainly of outward observances of such inventions.

As to "feet-washing," we have never said much, as we have had no occasion to do so, not having come in contact with many of that class of people. That the case recorded in John xiii. was not a religious rite or ordinance appears evident to us from the fact that Jesus had said, "The true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him." John iv. 23. Further, we never hear of the apostles or New Testament believers performing any such ceremony in their social meetings.

Our Lord's design, in this act of washing his disciples' feet, is sufficiently explained by himself at the close of the act. The disciples had often shown a desire to be great; or, were possessed of worldly ambition—"disputing among themselves who should be greatest." Their "Master and Lord" takes this occasion to teach them a lesson they should never forget, by doing them an act which was only performed in those days by the lowest order of servants. By this means Jesus taught his disciples that instead of seeking superiority over one another, or being masters, they should seek to serve each other by any act of kindness they could perform, however menial it might appear. Said He, "Ye call me Master and Lord: and ye say well; for so I am. If I then your Lord and Master, have washed your feet; ye also ought to wash one another's feet."

In Judea, in those days, traveling with the feet slightly protected, they needed frequent washing, both for comfort and safety. Hence, the first act of hospitality on calling on a friend, or arriving at a resting place, was to wash their feet; and as we said, it was done by the lowest servant.

In this view of the subject, our Lord taught a great moral lesson to his followers; that of abstaining from pride, or seeking to aggrandise themselves one above another: or, as Paul expresses it, "In lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves." Phil. ii. 3. Such is the spirit of the gospel, or true Christianity: and such was the lesson Jesus taught his disciples by this act in washing their feet. "I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done unto you:" that is, be ready to perform any necessary service to your brethren, however menial it may be. Such was the lesson. Happy are those who learn it. But to convert it into a rite to be performed, whether there is a necessity for it or not, is to pervert the teaching and destroy the lesson given. So we believe.

We might say much more, but think it unnecessary for those who are willing to learn, and useless for those who are not.

DECLINED COMMUNICATIONS.

"If there is any objection to publishing this letter, let me know what it is."

So speaks one of our friends at the close of his communication. This seems to us an unreasonable request. There are various reasons why some articles sent us are not published. How shall we make the writer acquainted with them? Shall we write him a private letter? We have no time for such business. Shall we publish in the paper the reasons? This most likely would lead to a reply; and so our time would be taxed to no good end. If any one sends us a communication, they must calculate we shall use our best judgment about its insertion. We intend to be as accommodating as possible; but we cannot publish all that may be sent us. Some people seem not to have the gift to express their ideas intelligibly; others write so bad that it taxes our time and patience to make out what they wish to say: others still, wish us to publish fancies; some want us to discuss the "Elijah Message," etc.

We must use our best judgment in all these things. We are sorry to disoblige any; yet it is better for one to suffer than many. We are sure an editor must suffer, if no one else does, by many articles sent him, and the fault some find if theirs is not inserted. Let us all be as patient as possible, and try to help bear one another's burdens.

THE PROMISE AND OATH OF GOD TO ABRAHAM.—NO. 5.

WE shall next notice a very natural conclusion that some draw from Rev. vii. 9–14, that all nations have had the good news of Christ and of redemption through his blood. Of a "multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues," who "stood before the throne, and before the Lamb," it is said, "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

The general opinion of Commentators is, that this exhibition represents the church, universal, glorified. Our friends, who are opposed to our views of the age to come—or, kingdom of God age—accept the view of the Commentators, and conclude this multitude out of all nations, etc., precludes the idea that all nations have not already been blessed in Abraham and his seed.

In dealing with the book of Revelation; or explaining its figures and symbols, we have need to express ourselves cautiously. Let us look at the idea that this multitude represent the church universal, or all the saved at the end of this age. If it does, we might ask the question once propounded to our Lord by his disciples—"Who then can be saved" out of those who now live, or have lived for the last seventy years, or during the present century? How many professed Christians, for these 70 years, can be numbered as those "who came out of great tribulation?" If that is to be the test, we think nearly all of us, who have lived in this nineteenth century, will fail of salvation. What have any of us yet passed through that would entitle us to say we came "out of great tribulation?" We must look for some other construction of the language of Rev. vii. 9–14 than that of the Commentators, or give up our hope of salvation among that multitude which John saw there.

This idea may startle some of our friends; but we repeat it, if all that are ever to be saved are from this, or any previous age of the world's history, not only multitudes of those who call themselves Christians in this century, but many of previous ages will fail of being of the "great multitude" seen in Rev. vii., no matter how great their faith may have been; for very many true believers have died without passing through "great tribulation."

We seek, therefore, an explanation of the text which shall harmonize with the facts of history, and the general tenor of Scripture. First: Let us see where the scene of Rev. vii. is laid. It is after that scene of chap. vi., in which the sixth seal was opened, and "the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men," etc., "said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath has come; and who shall be able to stand?"

This scene shows that the persons represented, upon whom this great tribulation falls, were those who had the knowledge of "the Lamb," and had learned that there would be a "great day of His wrath:" hence it is clear that they had previously had the gospel message and despised or neglected it. A "great tribulation" now overtakes them; corresponding with smiting the image and dashing it to pieces, Dan. ii., and the destruction of the fourth beast, Dan. vii. That "great tribulation" passed, "the kingdom of God" is established on the earth—"the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess it forever and ever."

The "great tribulation," then, is on the wicked rejectors or neglectors of the gospel message; and is the winding up scene of this age, when the corruptors of earth, and the corruptors of God's word, will find the "great day of the wrath of the Lamb," on them, has come. That "great tribulation" being over, John is presented with a new scene; he says, "After this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes and palms in their hands," etc. When John was asked by the angel, "What are these . . . and whence came they?" he evidently did not understand the matter; he must have been surprised at such a glorious multitude, in such a position, and asked the angel an explanation. The angel replied, "These are they which came (ek) after the great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

But, says one, "you have altered the text; it reads out of, and not after." Our translators have rendered the Greek word, ek, "out of," and it is generally so rendered in our Bible; but in turning to our Greek Concordance we find the first English word used, in defining the Greek word ek, is "after," and it has also the sense of "since." It will also be observed that we have inserted the definite article [tees, the] before "tribulation." This article is left out of the text by our translators; but it is in the Greek, and clearly refers to the tribulation described at the close of chapter vi.

In the account of what John saw, in chapter vii., it is expressly laid "after this"—"after this," what? clearly, after the "great day of the wrath of the Lamb" spoken of in the previous chapter. After this day of wrath, which winds up the present age, John saw the fruit of the following age, or the age of the kingdom of God; briefly stated, it is true, but sufficiently clear to be unmistakable as a fulfilment of the promise and oath of God to Abraham.

Let the text be read with the closing of chap. vi., in view, and the fact that the scene of chap. vii., is expressly said to be "after this," and see if the following is not evidently the true sense of the text: "These are they which came [to Christ] after the great tribulation on the kings of the earth, etc., and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

This construction agrees and harmonizes with a similar representation in Rev. xv., where John saw those who had gotten the victory over the beast "stand on the sea of glass, having the harp of God: and they sing the song of Moses . . . and the song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear thee O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest."

Thus, we see, the saints on the sea of glass, glorified—take the same view of the effect, on "all nations," of the judgments—"the great tribulation"—on "the kings of the earth," etc., that we have suggested on the texts in chapters vi. and vii., and the coming of "all nations," or, the "great multitude of all nations," appear in both cases to be after the judgments which wind up the present age, and opens the age of the "kingdom of God," which immediately follows the end of this; and "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear."—Matt. xiii. 43. Thus shining on the "left of the nations," the world—"all nations"—will be blessed in "Abraham and his seed," and the multitudes of the saved, in the dispensation of the kingdom of God, will as much surprise many of our good brethren, who do not as yet see the matter as we do, as it surprised John when he saw it in vision. Then shall we truly see a multitude of redeemed ones, who have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb, "which no man can number, out of all nations, kindreds, people, and tongues." How gloriously, then, will the promise and oath of God to Abraham shine forth over the face of the whole earth, and His immortalized saints rejoice that they are honored in having a part with Christ in the glorious work of earth's redemption, and the salvation of such untold multitudes.

Who desires a part in this work of God's promise and oath in blessing all the families of the earth, or all nations? O, how blessed the thought that we, who may be among the redeemed of the past ages, will have such glorious employment in "the ages to come." What are all of earth's present joys or glories, when compared with the glory and honor of being "workers together with God" and His dear Son in reducing the earth, so long cursed with sin, to order, peace, universal love and good will; making "wars to cease to the ends of the earth;" and every man "shall sit under his own vine and fig tree, having none to molest or make him afraid." If you dear reader, would share in that glory, come now to Christ, that you may live in that blessed age.

The view we have taken of chapters vi. and vii. of Rev., and of chap. xv., might be further urged as the true one from many testimonies of the Old Testament. We will notice Isa. lxvi. "Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad with her, all ye that love her: . . . that ye may milk out and be delighted with the abundance of her glory: for thus saith the LORD, Behold I will extend peace to her like a river, and the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream . . . Ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem. . . . The hand of the LORD shall be known toward his servants, and his indignation toward his enemies: for behold, the LORD will come with fire, and with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire: for by fire and by his sword will the LORD plead with all flesh: and the slain of the LORD shall be many." (This corresponds with Rev. vi. 12–17; which please read.) . . . "For I know their works and their thoughts: it shall come, that I will gather all nations and tongues; and they shall come and see my glory: and I will set a sign among them, and I will send those that escape of them unto the nations . . . and to the isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles," etc.

Observe, this proclamation is to those who had not heard the LORD'S fame; and it was after the fearful judgment on "many," who were "slain" in that judgment; and there were those who "escape," and they are employed in making the proclamation to the "nations and isles afar off," who had "not heard" of the LORD'S "fame," etc. Here, also, we might introduce God's oath, Isa. xlv. 23, "I have sworn by myself, the word has gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear." Compare this with Paul's language Phil. ii. 10, 11, "That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and in earth: and every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Thus a universal proclamation of Jesus Christ is to be made to all; and all are required to give him honor to the glory of God. Here, then, is a proclamation of God's good-will to men which has never yet been made in the fulness set forth in the word; but God has sworn by himself it shall be. Who shall call in question His promise and oath? When that promise and oath is carried into effect, we shall see the innumerable company brought to the Revelator's astonished view, Rev. vii., "of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues."

No wonder Jesus said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."—(John xii. 32). He knew all the "families of the earth" were to be "blessed" in him; and He hesitated not to accept the cross in his work of blessing all men with the means of securing eternal life. His faith in God's promise and oath was not shaken, though the awful death of the cross lay in his path to the accomplishment of his work of blessing all the families of the earth: and because He became "obedient unto the death of the cross, God highly exalted him," and gave "him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow," etc. Therefore, his name is to be proclaimed to all "the families of the earth;" else, how could they be required to bow to it?

Let us rejoice and be glad that God is not so restricted in the means of carrying out his promise and oath as our finite minds might be disposed to think: and let us remember, His thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor His ways as our finite ways. His word will not return void; but will surely be accomplished, every "jot and tittle" of it. "So let it be."

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

LET us further examine concerning gehenna, valley of Hinnom. What is its locality? In Josh, xv. 8, we find the situation of the lot of Judah described as follows: "And the border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite; the same is Jerusalem: and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward, which is at the end of the valley of the giants northward." In chap. xviii. 16, we find the inheritance of Benjamin described thus: "And the border came down to the end of the mountain that lieth before the valley of the son of Hinnom, and which is in the valley of the giants on the north, and descended to the valley of Hinnom, to the side of Jebusi on the south, and descended to En-rogel." In the word of the Lord commanding Jeremiah to warn his disobedient people of evil that should come upon them unless they repented, we find the following: "And go forth unto the valley of the son of Hinnom, which is by the entry of the east gate, and proclaim there the words that I shall tell thee."—Jer. xix. 2.

Is it true that this once beautiful valley became the scene of awful abominations? "Moreover, he" (Ahaz) "burnt incense in the valley of the son of Hinnom, and burnt his children in the fire, after the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord had cast out before the children of Israel."—2 Chron. xxviii. 3. Also xxxiii. 6: "And he" (Manassah) "caused his children to pass through the fire in the valley of the son of Hinnom." "And he" (Josiah) "defiled Topheth which is in the valley of the children of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Moloch."—2 Kings xxiii. 10.

Kitto says of Hinnom: "When Josiah overthrew this idolatry, he defiled the valley by casting into it the bones of the dead, the greatest of all pollutions among the Hebrews; and from that time it became the common jakes of Jerusalem, into which all the refuse of the city was cast, and where the combustible portions were consumed by fire." Prof. Stuart remarks concerning it: "The pious king Josiah, caused it to be polluted, i. e., he caused to be carried there the filth of the city of Jerusalem . . . Perpetual fires were kept up in order to consume the offal which was deposited there, and as the same offal would breed worms, (for all putrifying meat of course does,) hence came the expression, 'where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.'"

This valley became a place of punishment. "For the children of Judah have done evil in my sight, saith the Lord: they have set their abominations in the house which is called by my name, to pollute it. And they have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my heart. Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that it shall no more be called Tophet, nor the valley of the son of Hinnom, but the valley of slaughter; for they shall bury in Tophet till there be no place."—Jer. vii. 30–32. In chap. xix. the above is substantially repeated; and it is added: "I will make void the counsel of Judah and Jerusalem in this place; and I will cause them to fall by the sword before their enemies, and by the hands of them that seek their lives; and their carcasses will I give to be meat for the fowls of heaven, and for the beasts of the earth."

Much other testimony might be adduced to prove that Gehenna, the valley of Hinnom was formerly a place of punishment by fire, etc., and certain portions of Scripture indicate that it may again be a place of punishment by fire or otherwise unto destruction. It is not, however, anywhere intimated that it is a place where the wicked are being punished at the present time, nor that any wicked ones will ever be long kept alive in it. To assert that they will be is to speak against God, for He has called the place, The Valley of Slaughter.

"I will also gather all nations, and will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there for my people and for my heritage Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations, and parted my land."—Joel iii. 2. The valley of Jehoshaphat lies on the east of Jerusalem, and is called the valley of judgment. Jehoshaphat, it is said, we presume truly, means "The Lord Judge." If this prophecy of Joel relates to events yet future, then Mr. Read well observes: "As the feet of Christ are to stand on the Mount of Olives 'in that day,' we can perceive, that as the mountains rise behind, his face will be toward Jerusalem; and if the nations are gathered before him, in the valley of Jehoshaphat, Gehenna will be on his left hand; and there probably many of the wicked will be consumed with fire from Heaven." In such an event Gehenna will be a place of future punishment. If this be so, will the fires of Gehenna be eternal? There is no passage of Scripture which teaches any such thing.

If we except the one instance of its use by James, and it is questionable whether it is really the word James used, Jesus is the only one who ever made use of the term Gehenna, in the whole New Testament, and he only used it in speaking to Jews. It was familiar to them, not only as a place where human sacrifices were at one time offered; but also as a place of punishment by death, we may fairly presume, since their Scriptures speak of it as such. They were familiar with it, too, as the place where the offal of the city was thrown, as also not unfrequently the dead persons of malefactors, and where fires were kept constantly burning to destroy whatever was thrown there. They esteemed a denial of burial one of the very greatest of indignities. Solomon says, if a man "have no burial, an untimely birth is better than he." In addressing the Jews, therefore, no stronger expression could be used to represent extinction of being, nor one better calculated to be so understood than being cast into Gehenna, valley of Hinnom, or gehenna fire. As nothing cast there ever came out alive, but was wholly consumed, for what the fire did not burn, the worms destroyed, so when gehenna punishment was threatened they well knew it meant utter destruction.

Another fact must not be overlooked. Christ sometimes used the term Gehenna in denouncing judgments against wicked Jews. The following is an instance: "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell (Gehenna?")—Matt. xxiii. 33. The word translated "damnation," is kriseas, meaning judgment. The text more properly rendered, would read, "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the judgment of (gehenna) the valley of Hinnom? Gehenna, valley of Hinnom, is here named as the place of punishment of those wicked Jews, and the punishment was, of course, then future. Jesus said unto them: "Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them ye shall scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, all these things shall come upon this generation."—Matt. xxiii. 34, 35, 36. "And when ye" (believers) "shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Then let them" (believers) "which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto. For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled."—Luke xxi. 20, 21, 22. All this refers directly to the judgment in Matt. xxiii. 33.

The Jews certainly filled the measure of their fathers. They scourged, stoned, killed and crucified believers: they persecuted followers of Christ beyond measure. Such were well worthy of the judgment of the valley of Hinnom. Forty years later that judgment came; and how terrible was it! The city surrounded by the minions of Titus: anarchy, starvation, death, horrors of every description reigning within; the scenes then witnessed no pen can ever describe. So literally did the streets run with blood that fires were extinguished by it. More than eleven hundred thousand Jews lay, buried and unburied, about the city. They did not escape the judgment of the valley of Hinnom. Indignation and wrath came upon them to the uttermost. Then did it transpire that men looked upon the carcasses of them transgressed against the Lord, where their worm did not die, and where their fire was not quenched. That was the judgment that was nigh at the time Christ threatened the Jews, believers, if faithless, and unbelievers, with gehenna punishment. That was the punishment inflicted upon the disobedient and faithless of that generation.

Modern theology would have the text under consideration teach what they to whom the language was addressed could never have understood it to mean. It would have the expression destroy both soul and body in Gehenna, to mean that God will keep alive what it calls the immortal soul, in what it is pleased to call hell, until the resurrection, and that then He will keep alive both body and soul in the same place, and delight Himself in torturing them to all eternity. Who does not see from what has been said, that nothing could well be imagined which would be more foreign to the meaning of Christ's words, or more at variance with his teachings. What a perversion is it of the word of God! What blasphemy against God!

The nature and effect of punishment in Gehenna, the whole consequence of being cast there, whether dead or alive, was so well understood among the Jews, that it came to be recognized as well by other peoples round about, among whom it became a sort of familiar saying when threatening the greatest punishment. Illustrative of this is the following circumstance, which occurred long after the death of Christ.

In the early experience of Mahomet, as a prophet, so called, he had no more bitter and unrelenting enemy than was his uncle Abu Lahab. Though subsequently a most faithful Mahomedan, he for some years lost no opportunity to oppose and persecute the prophet. When the time came for Mahomet, as he believed, to "announce publicly and boldly his doctrine, beginning with his kindred and tribe," he summoned all the Koreishites of the line of Haschem to meet him on the hill of Safa, in the vicinity of Mecca, when he would unfold matters important to their welfare. They assembled there, as requested, and among them was Mahomet's hostile uncle, Abu Lahab. When the prophet had fairly begun to discourse of his mission, and make known his revelations, Abu Lahab started up in a rage, upbraided him for calling them together for such a purpose, and catching up a stone would have hurled it at him. Mahomet turned upon the disturber, cursed the hand thus impiously raised, and predicted his destruction in the fire of Jehennon; with the assurance that his wife, Omm Jemil, would bear the bundle of thorns with which the fire would be kindled.

Of course the fact that had Mahomet understood any thing of a theological hell, he must have remembered that its fire of everburning brimstone would be quite sufficient to accomplish the purpose without the addition of a few fagots borne thither by the scoffer's wife, forbids the thought that any reference was had to such a place, and settles it that he simply used an expression of Jewish origin to convey the idea of punishment by burning to death.

Dr. Richard Watson, writing on Mark ix., where Gehenna is several times mentioned in connection with the expressions, "their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched," says:

"As the worm itself dies not, but destroys that it feeds upon, and as fire unquenched consumes that upon which it kindles, so when temporal judgments are expressed by this phrase the utter destruction of persons, cities, and nations appears to be intended."

In the Targum is the following paraphrase of Psa. xxxviii. 20: "They shall be consumed in the smoke of Gehenna."

"The early Christian writers plainly understood our word 'destroy' in its literal and ordinary sense. Tertullian paraphrases the passage (Matt. x. 28,) thus: 'Who is able to kill and destroy (occidere et perdere) both soul and body.' And Cyprian: 'Who can slay (occidere) both soul and body.' Likewise Jerome and Augustine. And Origen says: 'Who is able to destroy and blot out both soul and body, either in Gehenna or as he may choose.' And not only do the other terms used require the literal sense of the word 'destroy,' but the reason of the case demands it. Christ was 'the faithful and true witness.' And would he give his most solemn warning in ambiguous terms? The ordinary sense of the words plainly name an indefinite loss—the loss of being, and of eternal life; the literal loss of the soul. The same faithful witness elsewhere reminds us that to gain the whole world and lose the soul is a foolish exchange. Did he here expect us to understand that the soul is imperishable, that it can never be strictly lost, but we have something infinitely worse to fear? 'Endless annihilation,' says the younger Edwards, 'is an endless or infinite punishment;' and the ordinary sense of Christ's words denotes extinction. Did he mean a two-fold infinitude of punishment?"—Prof. Hudson.

Augustine says, "The soul can die, it can be slain." "If the soul cannot be slain, how should our Lord, warning us, say, 'Fear Him?'"

We think we have heretofore sufficiently shown what the soul is. If "Rev." Mr. George does, others, we feel assured, will not fail to see that the text so confidently relied on by himself and other believers in inherent immortality is, rightly understood and reasonably interpreted, an unanswerable argument against the theory. May our blessed Lord help all his people to rightly understand it and, understanding it, so justly appreciate the truth it teaches that they will ever be preserved from further libelling the character of God by attributing to him acts of most fiendish cruelty.

What but cruelty of the most unrelenting and malignant type could keep helpless beings in endless torture with no view to either their improvement or as warning to others. Such a proceeding could not be had for purposes of benefit to the tortured ones, since it is held that their sufferings are to be eternal; neither could it serve as a warning to others, for it is contended that when the damned begin to receive their torture in its full intensity time will have ended, and probation closed. Who can believe such a doctrine, and at the same time, bowing before the throne of grace, confidently lift the voice in solemn praise and adoration, saying, "Thou who art a God of Love, and whose tender mercies are over all thy works?" May all patrons of the torment theory diligently consider these things, prayerfully striving to weigh them well, to weigh them with the care and intelligence their immeasurable importance demands.

LIBERTY WETHERBEE, Bangor, Me., sends several new subscribers, and writes: The Lord is at work wonderfully in old Hampden. It is the most interesting field that I have ever labored in, in all my life. The brethren and sisters take hold of the work in earnest. Some fifteen or twenty have come out on the truths of the Bible; and the sects feel bad, for some of their best members have taken advanced steps on the truth. To God be all the praise.

THE RESTITUTION.—NO. 3.

BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

"Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things."—Acts iii. 21.

Restitution is the act of restoring a thing to its former state or condition. The original condition of the thing to be restored, determines what its condition will be when it is restored.

The thing to be affected by the restitution, in our text, is the thing that has been affected by the curse. It is the earth with its inhabitants, which are earthy; the world—the kingdom which was prepared when the world was made. Its restitution has been spoken of by all the holy prophets since the world began. There are several conditions which are essential to the doctrine of restitution, without which there can be no restitution.

1. The thing to be restored must have been once in a good condition. This is true of the world. It was once in a good condition.

ITS ORIGINAL UNCURSED CONDITION.

"And God saw every thing that He had made, and behold, it was very good." The earth was to bring forth grass and grain, and fruit after its kind. The waters were to bring forth living creatures after their kind. The earth also, was to bring forth living creatures after their kind, cattle, and beast, and creeping things. The productions of the earth were to be for food for its inhabitants. This condition of the earth was pronounced very good.

And the Lord made man out of the dust of the ground, in his own image, and after his own likeness, to have dominion over all the animals he had made, and over all the earth. He made them male and female, and blessed them. They were to multiply and replenish the earth by families, and subdue it. This condition of man was very good.

And the Lord put the man whom he had made into the garden of Eden, prepared for him, in which was every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food; the tree of life also, and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and a river to water the garden. Of every tree of the garden he might freely eat, except of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; if he ate of that tree he should die. His business was to be, to dress the garden and keep it. This was the original uncursed condition of the world. It was complete in God's estimation. There was no curse upon it. It was then in a condition which, if continued, would have secured all that prosperity and blessing to the world, of which the prophets have ever spoken since it began.

In this good condition of the world, provision was made for its perpetuity. Adam was allowed to eat freely of the tree of life, that he might live forever. The continuance of this favor was to be secured by continued obedience to the law of God. By complying with the condition contained in this law, Adam and his posterity would have secured for themselves the uncursed condition of the world for ever.

In that good condition of the world was included all the growth and development of which it was capable for all time to come: as in a child are included all the elements of its growth, and the future man. In it was the foundation for perpetual prosperity, and blessing, in their highest sense. It was as well adapted to the wants of the world, filled with inhabitants, as to a single pair. It could as easily secure the prosperity of the world for ever as for a single day. It was a condition equally adapted to every period of the world's history, in all its increase of knowledge, and experience and skill.

If man had continued loyal, the world would have remained uncursed, and its growth would have been legitimate, bringing forth of its kind. It never could grow out of its own nature. It could never grow into a heavenly world, in distinction from an earthy world. Its inhabitants could never grow into heavenly beings, in distinction from earthy beings. It must have remained always the earth with its earthy inhabitants. This good condition of the world is the model of its restitution. It is the standard of completeness implied in the doctrine of restitution, and which is to be secured by it.

While the world remained in this uncursed condition, restitution was not needed. It is because this condition has been lost, that its restitution is proposed in the gospel.

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich.

RECOVERY OF JERUSALEM.

BY B. F. THOMPSON.

THIS is the title of a book just issued by the "Palestine Exploration Fund"—a society that has existed several years in England, for the purpose of making surveys in the Holy Land, but more especially in Jerusalem. The work was began in 1864, and was started for the purpose of improving, if possible, the sanitary condition of Jerusalem. This "had become one of the most unhealthy places in the world," caused chiefly "by the inferior quality of the water, and the presence of an enormous mass of rubbish which had been accumulating for centuries."

In 1864–5 a topographical survey of Jerusalem was made by Capt. Wilson, R. E.: and from the spring of '67 to the spring of '70, excavations were made by Capt. Warren, R. E. These were made chiefly around Mount Moriah, or the Holy Sanctuary. On this mountain once stood the temples of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod. It is faced on three of its sides, at least, with huge walls of masonry, and it was the object of the excavating party to examine these walls and to decide, if possible, in regard to their age by the manner of their construction.

Mount Moriah was originally a narrow, sharp ledge of rocks: but this has been levelled either by filling up, or building huge arches on its sloping sides, so as to form a plateau measuring about 1,500 feet from North to South, and about 900 from East to West. The general level of this plateau is 2,420 feet above the Mediterranean; and in its centre there is an elevated platform some sixteen feet higher than the general surface, from which rises the famous mosque of the Mohammedans.

The exact site of the temple has been, and still is, a source of much controversy. Some have thought it covered the whole plateau; some have placed it at one angle, and others at another, but Capt. Warren thinks it was on the dome of the rock, for he argues, and very plausibly, that it would not have been built on the slope but on the top of the ledge. He also supposes the temple to have been rectangular in form, instead of square, as most have thought.

This whole plateau is completely honeycombed with tanks, cisterns, vaults, aqueducts, etc., which Capt. Warren was unable to explore systematically, owing to the bigoted and whimsical oppositions of the Turkish authorities.

It was outside of the walls that surround Moriah that the excavations were made, and it was there that the immense heaps of rubbish were found; the result of desolations and overturnings of ages. The Turkish authorities would not allow any digging near the walls, and so the party were obliged to sink the shafts a few rods from them, and then run galleries up to and alongside of them. This was done with immense labor, for these shafts had to be sunk through from 50 to a 100 feet of rubbish before coming to the natural surface of the ground. This rubbish is composed of the offal of the city and its sewerage, which often form a rich, black soil from ten to twenty feet in thickness, and of immense quantities of stone chipping, which Capt. Warren styles, shingle; and which, he says, runs like water when found alone. Opposite the west wall a great arch has been found, called Wilson's arch, which seems to be the remains of a viaduct leading up to the Upper City or Zion. A similar arch is also found at the South West angle of the wall. At the North East angle of the wall the rubbish was 110 feet thick! At this angle, to the North of the Sanctuary area, is an immense cistern, said by tradition to be the pool of Bethesda: it is upwards of 80 feet in depth, but is filled for 35 feet with sewerage, stones, and filth generally.

The book is very interesting, though at the same time unsatisfactory, as no very definite results could be reached. It is valuable in suggesting what might—yea, what will be done, when all hindrances shall have been removed. It also indicates that the attention of the church is being turned, with an increasing interest, toward that city, which must ever be first in the affections of all Christ's true disciples. It is a herald of that fast approaching day when that rubbish shall be removed; when a more glorious temple than Solomon's shall crown Moriah's brow; and when on its opposing peak—Zion—shall be re-erected David's throne in more than its original splendor; and on it "He whose right it is" shall sit and judge the nations. "For behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem and joy in my people, and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., April, 1871.

FROM MRS. E. C. M. BOYD.

BRO. STORRS: The Passover anniversary, just past, was one of peculiar interest to us who meet in this city. It seemed to have been an object of "desire" with many "to eat this passover." Friends from afar gathered with us: some we had never before seen.

Bro. Fahnestock, of Harrisburg; Bro. Armstrong, of Trenton,—formerly of this City; Brn. Carlisle, Mc Clary, Wyatt, and a dear Bro. ——, whose name we do not recall—but whom "the Lord knoweth"—from Wilmington, Del., and Sr. McCullongh, from Westchester, were here; also, some from each of the advent congregations in this city; two sisters whose names are inscribed with the Methodists, and one Presbyterian, and others, not reckoned with any of these.

Thus holding different views on some points of doctrine, yet in the love of our Lord looking and hoping for his appearing, all were one, and, we trust disciples according to the Saviour's test,—"If ye have love one to another."

Many, who in past times met with us, were absent; of these, some sleep in hope; some were detained by sickness, and others by circumstances they could not overrule. A few squares from where we were assembled, were two whose hearts were with us, but whose coming "satan" had "hindered."

In that room, Sallie Vogt,—the youngest daughter of Br. John and Sr. Sarah Scott, of this city,—was wrestling with the enemy who has conquered so many of the loved ones, and who shall be "the last that shall be destroyed." When, two weeks before the time, she read in the "HERALD OF LIFE," the notice of the Passover anniversary at our house, she expressed a wish to be there, saying, she thought she should so much enjoy it.

At that time she was not aware that her disease was consumption, and hoped to recover; but her strength decreased so rapidly that she ceased to think of meeting with us.

Br. Scott came alone; for, when the time arrived, Sallie was so feeble that her mother dared not leave her. During that evening, while we were yet gathered, the struggle was so great that for a few minutes it seemed she must yield; but not yet,—her hour had not come: for her, there was one more blessing in store—one more sitting "together in heavenly places in Christ" for those sorrowing hearts.

We sent by Br. Scott some of the unleavened bread, and a portion of our simple repast; and she partook of the supper with her parents, no more to "eat thereof, till it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God."

She was much blessed; she became happy, even joyous, and angels "came and strengthened" her. It was a time long to be remembered by that father and mother, as they received the fulfillment of the promise of Jesus—"Where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I."

The day after the passover, I called, according to promise, to see the sick sister. Found her suffering greatly, and much weaker than I had supposed. Indeed, so stealthily had the enemy approached, that not even her family were aware how near his footsteps came.

It was my privilege to sit for an hour at her bedside; to hear her speak of her hope of life through Jesus, and of the blessed light that illumined the future, because of that hope.

At her request, I read to her from the Bible, selecting the prayer of our Lord in John xvii. After reading, I said to her "You believe on Jesus through the word of his disciples:—He has prayed for you;"—and never shall I forget the light that beamed in her eye, and her smile, as she answered—"Yes; I do believe!"

Thankful to the Lord that I had been permitted thus to minister to one of "the little ones that believe" in Him, I kissed her goodbye, hoping to see her again; but, on Saturday morning, her sufferings ended, and she "fell asleep."

Last Tuesday, she was laid to rest by the side of her beloved husband, who, three years ago, sunk under the same disease. Together they "rest in hope."

Their little son, four years old,—now indeed an orphan,—receives the loving care of his grand-parents.

May God, in whom his parents trusted, "bless the lad!"

PHILADELPHIA, PA., April 13, 1871.

FROM MRS. A. GOODRICH.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS: I often think, what shall I render to the Lord for all his benefits towards me? I will bless the Lord at all times; his praise shall be continually in my mouth. I feel as if it ought to be the language of every Christian's heart to bless the Lord at all times, and under all circumstances. While we are afflicted on every hand, yet we know that we have a friend that has promised never to leave or forsake us. These precious words from the lips of Jesus, how they have comforted my poor heart amid hours of affliction: how they bear my spirits up while I walk a lonely pilgrim here. What a friend we have in Jesus. Though earthly friends fail, and storms of adversity rise, in Jesus we have a never failing friend, who will never forsake; no; and if we trust fully in him, he will journey by our side all the way down through the valley of the shadow of death, even to the haven of eternal rest. How sweet the thought; how blissful the anticipation to the believer in Christ of soon seeing Jesus, and being made like him. Though the way may be rugged, and thorns and thistles continually strown in our pathway, and tears sometimes, in our weariness, fall, Jesus has promised to be with us, and we need fear no evil. Blessed thought. Though a host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear. We read in Psa. 125, As the mountains are around about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth, even forever. What more can we ask forever? Oh, what a beautiful place for the Christian is the throne of grace: suited to every time and condition of life: here we can come boldly. I find grace and mercy to help in every time of need. O, how glorious the word of truth seems. How much the truth of God has done for me. I often weep when I think how good the Lord is in revealing his blessed truth to my poor heart. I feel many times that whereas once I was blind I can thank the Lord now I see. Let us thank the Lord for the Bible. How much we find in the sacred volume to cheer and comfort us in our heavenly journey. O may we all be submissive and feel that he doeth all things well. Yes, bless the Lord for all things. May the Lord bless you in all your endeavors to spread the truth as it is in Jesus. We pray for the HERALD more and more. Your sister hoping for Life when Jesus comes.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., March, 1871.

E. S. WILLIAMS, Grant's Hill, Mo., writes. By means of Eld. W. P. Shockey, of Aspinwall, Neb., I became acquainted with the HERALD OF LIFE. It is a most welcome visitor. Br. Shockey preaches among us once in a while; but the sects are down on him at a desperate rate; yet we believe he preaches the truth. There are fifteen or twenty of us here who have hope of life in Christ alone. I would like to know your mind as to who the beast in Rev. xiii. 14 is, and what is "the mark" of this beast.

Remark by the Editor.

We do not choose to express an opinion as to who is represented by that beast, or his mark. All that we have ever read on the subject, hitherto, appears mere fancy, or an effort to be wise above what is written. It may relate to a future antichrist, or to Papacy in the past. Which, we shall not presume to say. We confess to a lack of "wisdom" to determine with positiveness. It is easier to say what it is not, than to tell what it is.

OBITUARY.

FELL ASLEEP IN CHRIST, at Wallingford Farms, Conn., March 11, MARY R. YOUNG, aged 18 years.

This young sister, just blooming into womanhood, was stricken down suddenly by the hand of death. The subject of many prayers and pious instructions from a devoted mother, she gave her heart to JESUS four years ago. With a sweet spirit of resignation she fell asleep, leaving behind Christian advice to her relatives as a priceless legacy to the sorrowing ones. A bright immortality awaits her "at the last day." She leaves a father, mother and brothers to mourn her early departure.

TO MY MOTHER.

Mother! how dear that word!
Its faintest echo thrills my very heart,
As if it were an angel's voice I heard,
Unconsciously I start.

A thousand pleasing things
It bids, at once, before my vision rise,
And back to mind in all its freshness brings
An earthly paradise.

My mother and my home
Are hallowed terms that blend in union sweet;
And though away from both I often roam,
Yet glad return my feet.

I joy to view the place
Blest by a cherished parent's tenderest care,
While memory loves each early scene to trace,
And fondly linger there.

Mother! 'tis evening now,
And I am far from childhood's place of glee;
But as my hand supports my aching brow,
My thoughts go forth to thee.

I think of those glad days
When I was 'neath thy care, a playful child,
And thou didst watch my little sports and ways,
And on me sweetly smiled.

Oft, at evening hour,
Thou kindly bad'st me to thy side repair,
To tell me of the great Creator's power,
And learn me some sweet prayer.

Those lessons taught by thee
Were not forgotten then, nor are they yet—
Waymarks they've been, in evil hours, to me—
To shun temptation's net.

And through life's gathering cares,
My heart with grateful thanks shall e'er rejoice,
That Heaven hath blest me with a mother's prayers,
A mother's warning voice.

Most bitterly I mourn
That I should e'er have caused thee once to grieve,
Or thy fond heart with anguish to have torn:
My penitence receive.

I know thou lov'st me still,
And oft in my behalf dost humbly pray
That Heaven may shield me from each threat'ning ill,
And crown with joy my way.

May blessings on thee rest,
Mother, till life's fast waning day be o'er;
Then may we join the ransomed and the blest,
Where parting is no more.

"WHEN I AWAKE."

"WHEN I awake," it will be morning,
The night forever past,
With all its glooms and fearing,
With all its fever-dreaming;
Light, joyous light at last;
"When I awake"—then no more sleeping.

"When I awake," it will be morning,
The pathway blindly trod
With footsteps weak and failing,
Illumined and clear, revealing
The purpose of my God;
"When I awake"—then no more doubting.

"When I awake," it will be morning,
And no more crushing pain,
With all its tears and sighing,
With all its grief and crying,
No more the falling rain;
"When I awake"—then no more grieving.

"When I awake," it will be morning;
Then rest, yes, perfect rest,
And no more care-worn musing,
No mountain-cliff sad climbing,
No looking to the West;
"When I awake"—no weary toiling.

"When I awake," it will be morning,
The loved ones gathered home,
With no more words of parting,
No trembling tear-drop starting,
In heaven's celestial dome;
"When I awake"—then blessed greeting.

"When I awake," it will be morning,
A Sabbath-keeping time;
A seraph harp then tuning!
An angel lyre then sweeping!
Ah, more than this be mine
"When I awake"—the new song singing.

"When I awake," it will be morning;
"I shall be satisfied;"
No distant, far-off reaching
For something ever fleeting;
With Thee, the crucified
I shall awake, and know no longing.

"When I awake," it will be morning;
It hath not been revealed,
No mortal eye is seeing,
No mortal ear is hearing
The bliss not e'en conceived:
"When I awake"—what glory beaming!

"When I awake," it will be morning;
Ah, then, why fear to sleep?
See, from the tomb uprising,
The Saviour interceding;
My soul He'll safely keep
Till I awake—Oh glorious waking!

MATERIALITY VS. IMMORTALITY: ALIAS, NOTHING!

BY A. G. HUDSON.

A PERSON conversant with the arguments (excuse the term; I am speaking of things that are not as though they were) for the existence of an immaterial soul, must inevitably arrive at the conclusion that matter in the opinion of these teachers is absolutely horrible.

The idea that God made man of it is—I was about to write, nauseating and abominable, but on consulting the lexicon I find there is no word that expresses their abhorrence and detestation of it.

If any reader of the HERALD wishes to get the exact idea, repeat in the presence of some D. D., "The LORD God formed man of the dust of the ground," etc.; but unless your nerves are strong my advice would be, better not do it; the contortions and spasms that follow are generally greater than weak nerves can endure.

It seems almost too bad that God should have employed it in making houses for these immaterial souls; a house made of nothing would have been much more congenial; it probably would not have proved so much of a clog and prison as this natural one is represented to be.

But why have these houses at all? They certainly are unnecessary for the development of these immaterial souls; for, we are told, they existed before the body and will exist when the body is dead, and that their development is greatly accelerated by a removal from the body; and if those who remove early, (and some scarcely get in before their houses fall) reap an advantage, the question is legitimate, Why did God make bodies? and why did he make matter? for, these same teachers tell us, he made matter out of nothing. If God is immaterial, angels are immaterial, souls are immaterial, what was the necessity for materiality? Just think for a moment what a delightful time these souls would have had in space with nothing in the way! How they would have unfolded! Nothing to attract their attention; no stars to gaze at, their precious time would not have been employed in the study of astronomy.

The mysteries of geology would not have disturbed them. Chemistry, botany, mechanics, mathematics, music, in short, none of the sequences of matter would have alloyed their happiness; they would, of course, have been perfectly happy. Just what would have made them happy is not clear; but it is certain there could have been nothing to destroy their happiness.

In the absence of matter there would have been no science or principles; consequently there would have been no time wasted in study; they would have had no necessities, therefore, no wants to satisfy. Being immaterial and immortal nothing could harm, add to or detract from them.

Being a simple essence, uncompounded, they were therefore uncreated, as well as immortal, dependent upon no one for past, present, or future existence: no necessity of prayer or praise would have existed.

As it is impossible to will, think, or reason until some knowledge of that about which you will, think, or reason is acquired, and as there could be no knowledge without matter, none of these things would have engaged their attention; these souls would certainly have been very quiet: how they would have spent their time is immaterial, indeed; when you think or speak about immateriality it is immaterial what you think or say, or whether you do either, excepting always the effect upon others. And who is able to speak of this God? or can comprehend and understand the baneful effect of immaterial and immortal soulism?

It has robbed God. It absolutely denies Jesus Christ; for he never proposed to do any thing for any such souls. I have no compromises to make with this enemy against God and his people. I admit the existence of good, kind, humane, and devout individuals, with all kinds of belief and without any belief in the future. I admit their good intentions, their honesty. What God may do where opportunity to become enlightened does not exist, I will not say; but, God forbid that I, by lowering the standard by word or deed, should lead any one to fail of life.

The Bible in which life and immortality are brought to light, without which all is dark as darkness itself, makes no compromises. It presents but one Lord, one faith, one baptism; that Lord we must seek and accept; that faith must be ours; that baptism we must be baptized with, if we would have life. Jesus made no compromises; he as fearlessly told the church what they must do as he did those outside: he tells us that he that sent him gave him a commandment what he should say and what he should speak, and that commandment was life everlasting. He also assures us that he spoke that, and that only. John charges us with making God a liar if we believe not the record. Paul charges Timothy, before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, to preach the word; he not only exhorts us to prove all things, to contend for the faith, but he pronounces a curse upon all that preach any other doctrine. By grace are ye saved, through faith. We cannot believe without evidence; we cannot have faith until we have believed; if we would have the evidence we must investigate. Are the so-called professors of Christianity willing to do this? I answer, no, they are not.

The blind are willingly led by the blind, and are being fed on chaff. Paul assures us of his zeal and honesty, but he nowhere intimates that they would have saved him. An honest, intelligent belief in Jesus Christ, and in the immateriality and immortality of the human soul, cannot both find place in the same individual.

This presumptious, little blasphemer is made, by its advocates, to stand up before the God of heaven and earth, who only hath immortality, and who on a certain occasion said, "As I live," and is made to say, as I live.

It tells Jesus, who comes to raise up his people, and give them immortality, "We want no raising up; we never lie down; we want no immortality; we cannot die."

These teachings have changed death, the sequence of sin, into the voice of Jesus. They make of Jesus just what the teachings of all Spiritualists, so-called, make of him; he is a Saviour so far as his teachings save men; he taught higher principles, and led a better life than any other one; consequently, he is a better Saviour than any other one; but we are all saviours so far as we by our words or ways induce men to become better.

But does this view recognize the necessities of mortal, dying men? the work that Jesus came to do, or that there is but one being that has life in himself; that he gave the Son to have life in himself, that he will give it to those who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for it?

It not only robs God, and denies Jesus Christ, but it makes fools of men. It compels them to close their eyes, every day of their lives, to the plainest truths. It makes them insist that it is easier for God to make a thinking, reasoning being out of nothing than it is out of something. They undertake to tell us about the properties and possible results of matter, as if they, poor souls, comprehended them all, when they have not learned the alphabet of what may follow the combination of matter.

Fifty years ago we could travel from Albany to Buffalo in about twelve days: the act is accomplished now in less hours. Had the same thing happened at that time, that has during the last year, the glory of France would have departed before we were advised she was at war with Prussia; but now we were able to read at our own houses in the afternoon what transpired in France in the forenoon.

The HERALD is not large enough to speak of the new results that follow each week, the combinations of matter, if its columns were devoted exclusively to that purpose; and yet men, who know really nothing of the possible results of inanimate organism, will undertake to question the power of God to make a man out of the dust of the ground, though he plainly declares that he did do it.

I do not wonder that our beloved Editor, whose life has been devoted to the rooting out of this evil, viewing it from what he supposed might be his death-bed, saw it in all its enormity. May strength be given him to strike heavier blows at this climax of all evils, than any he has yet been able to do.

I cannot understand from the teachings of these "philosophers," what power they would give to these imaginary creatures: they certainly should be more explicit. At what point in the scale of being is their presence necessary? They are exceedingly shocked with our arguments. They say we bring man down to a level with the brute. From this assertion it would seem that they do not give immaterial souls to animals, but their arguments do give them souls as well as men; and thus they raise animals to a level with man! Whether it is worse to put man on a level with animals, or animals on a level with man, I leave them to decide. I recognize no such level: man having a better organization has more capacity for the acquisition of knowledge; and to him is given the offer of future life. I understand life to be a condition of organism, a sequence of combination beyond the power of man; it is found in man and all animals and vegetables.

Are our philosophers prepared to say that an immaterial soul is necessary for this condition? We know this takes away the breath and all die. The wise man says, all have the same breath; all die alike, and go to the same place. Ascending the scale a step, we have involuntary motion; to this succeeds instinct. Is instinct the result of vitalizing peculiar combinations of matter, or is it the workings of an immaterial soul?

According to the teachings of Dr. Haven, it cannot be induced by organization, unless it previously existed in matter. The gold could not be hammered so thin, or the thread spun so fine as to induce it to do what we find the uneducated hen is doing; namely, covering the eggs until the young are produced. That there is no reason or thought here, we conclude; for she will as faithfully sit on pieces of marble, or where there is nothing, as she will on her own eggs. Shall we find an immaterial soul here, Dr.? or, shall we reject your argument?

As we find in inanimate organism to instruments made of the same material, and both moved by the same power performing entirely different operations, and as we find the cause in the combination, shall we not, when we find two animals made of the same material and both living by the same principle, doing, untaught, entirely different things, find the cause in the same place, namely, in the organization?

Ascending the scale a little, shall we find a necessity for the soul in the exercise of the five senses? These are found in man, and in nearly all animals: in animals they are more acute than in man. Now as gold could not originally see, and hammering it thin would not make it see, and as a fly or gnat can see, shall we, Dr., conclude they have immaterial, immortal souls? If not, what shall we do with your argument?

Passing on, we find man and animals in the possession of the same passions; namely, desire, fear, hope, joy, grief, love, hatred, envy, amativeness, etc. Do these inhere originally in the soul; or, in matter; or are they so many sequences of living organisms, under peculiar circumstances?

But still advancing, we find consciousness, memory, will, converse, thought, reason, these are not essential attributes of matter, are they, of immaterial souls? I remark first, that none of these are entities, and we should always mark well the distinction between cause and effect. Could an immaterial soul think before it acquired something to think about? If you say, it could, what would be its thoughts? We want, in this discussion, something tangible: the old story about the soul being all eye, all ear, the essence of thought and spirit, is current only with those who think by proxy.

The child learns that two and two are four before it thinks of that truth. So it is with all truths. Thought is simply the taking cognizance and using truths and facts impressed upon the brain through the senses. Memory is the power to revert to these acquisitions, and is dependent for its existence upon the agent; and upon that which is remembered. In the infant the thing to be remembered is wanting. In the octegenarian the ability is generally wanting in the individual.

We, who believe that capacities and powers are generated in organism, find the cause for this in that decaying form. Where do the D. D.'s find it? Their power to find it is not generated yet, or, why that man is crazy or that one unconscious?

Why will not these gentlemen walk up and deal with the phenomena of the human mind with practical questions and with plain Bible language? They love to build men of straw, and then burn them; to talk of hammering gold to produce cries of agony, and spinning fine thread to produce thought, when they know they are purposely misrepresenting, to satisfy dupes, that they may retain a little longer, positions already tottering.

Man is made of dust, and is mortal, says the Bible. Philosophy says, Amen. The Bible says, man may live again. Philosophy says, while I have no power to know that, I have none to contradict it. God made man that he might become intelligent and happy: his intelligence must be acquired; his character must be formed.

In the education of our children we should remember the order in creation. Attend first to the form; that is the base without the foundation; we cannot have the structure. As we value the structure, we must attend to the foundation.

Immateriality says, the surest and most expeditious way of securing the one is to destroy the other. You who believe it, destroy your children as soon as possible; you who do not, guard well the development of their bodies. But in their minds, which they acquire, and in their characters, which they form, is found the sum for which God created them, if found at all.

The individual receives the words of the kingdom; he believes, he acts: here is regeneration; the qualities of a new creature in Christ Jesus that is to come into life at the resurrection of the dead. Here commences the adoption of principles of truth and righteousness: here is Paul's new man, the inner man, that which is begotten by the word of the Lord, which endureth forever. This is what we admire and love in the man; that by which he is weighed and measured in community; by which he is to be judged. If this new element is cultivated and grown until it guides and controls, it is the ultimatum for which man was created; something worthy of an enduring habitation. Here, in my opinion, is the identity of the spiritual man that is to be; for what is consciousness but a knowledge of ourselves; of our mental and moral attainments; where that is, there we are. The old man is and must remain under the curse: the new man at death is in the keeping of the LIFE-GIVER: the bodies that are to be immortal, and like Christ's glorified body, are not the sequences of this new formation, as death is the sequence of sin; but they are the free gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. This treasure is now in earthen vessels; but thanks be to God, it is to be clothed upon with immortality. Glorious thought. Justice satisfied. The righteous saved. Christ the "father of the everlasting age."

Brethren, do you aspire to this condition? Seek for it; live now for it. The mind that was in Christ must be in you; the character that adorned his life must be yours, if you would have it. The Spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead must dwell in us, if we would have life.

THE LORDSHIP AND JUDGMENT OF CHRIST.

BY ELD. J. B. COOK.

"THE times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men . . . to repent; because he hath appointed a day in the which HE will judge the world in righteousness (how?) by that man which He hath ordained; whereof He hath given assurance to all men, in that He hath raised him (Christ) from the dead."—Acts xvii. 30, 31.

"The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the SON . . . and hath given him authority to execute judgment . . . because he is the Son of man."—John v. 19–28.

"Him, God raised up the third day . . . and commanded us to preach unto the people and to testify that it is he who was ORDAINED of God to be the Judge of quick and dead! To him give all the prophets witness."—Acts x. 38–43.

"For to this end Christ both died and rose and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living." "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ."—Rom. xiv. 9–11.

"In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men, by Jesus Christ, according to my gospel."—Rom. ii. 16.

"I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom: preach the Word."—2 Tim. iv. 1-8.

Let this suffice to state the Lordship of Jesus, and God's judgment of the world "by him." This is the Lordship and judgment foretold, Psa. cx., where, also, his Priesthood is made perpetual "after the order of Melchizedek." Thus the point is made and settled by the most plain and positive portions of God's truth. If Christ could be constrained to withdraw, or theorized, the Bible would go all to pieces. It would be like having the heart withdraw from a living man.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

ONE STEP MORE.

HAD I better get in and row across? Nobody would ever know any thing about it; and there the new boat lies, rocking on the river, and there are the two oars in the bottom. It's only a mile down to the bridge, and I could row down there and back in a little while; and it would be such a splendid sail!

Of course nothing could happen to me, for grandpa said to mamma the other evening, when we went down to the mill:

"Why, Helen, Harry's a natural-born sailor. He can manage the boat as well as I."

"Oh, dear, I wish he'd never seen that boat!" said mamma. "I expect it will be the death of him yet."

"Well, he didn't inherit his natural taste from you, that's certain," laughed grandpa; "but women are always nervous about the water."

And that's all. It's just mamma's nervousness; and I know nothing would happen to me, getting in there, and having a little sail; and it would be so nice, this beautiful afternoon, and the river looks away up by the bridge, like a ribbon among the oaks and poplars.

Nobody would ever know any thing about it, either; for of course, I should get back safe, and I don't believe there'd be any harm in it.

But, then, there's my promise to mother; there's no getting around that, and it was the last thing she said to me before she left home on Thursday.

She called me to the carriage, and bent over one side, and smoothed my hair as she always does when she talks to me.

"Now, Harry, my boy," she said, "I want you to promise that you won't get inside that boat until your father and I get home again."

"No, mamma, I won't, certainly," I answered, though I hated to, bad enough—that's a fact.

And I think it's quite too bad that such a big boy as I am can't have his own way in such things.

Oh, dear! dear! the longer I look, the more I want to go. It seems as if I must.

One more step, and I shall be in the boat; but there—my promise to mamma!

And how shall I feel when she comes and looks in my face, and calls me her darling boy, and puts her arms around my neck, and kisses me over and over again?

She won't ask me whether I've been in the boat, because I promised her I wouldn't; and I never told my mother a lie in my life.

And won't now.

Mamma came home last night. Such a hugging as I had!

"Has my Harry been a good boy?" she said, "and not done a single thing his mother would have disapproved of?"

"No, I guess not, mamma," I said; but I was thinking about the boat, and didn't speak very positively.

Mamma held me away, and looked in my eyes.

"You guess not? Are you not quite certain, Harry?" she asked.

"Well, mamma, I haven't done any thing, but I've thought about it."

She drew her arms around me, and held me close to her.

"Tell me all about it, Harry," she said.

And then I did. I told her about my going to the river Saturday afternoon, and how near I came to getting into the boat, and rowing down to the bridge, and what a terrible temptation it was, and how in one step I should have been in; but the memory of my promise to her, and the thought that God saw me, held me back, when there was only one step betwixt me and the boat.

And when I had done I found mamma's tears falling, just like rain-drops, in my hair.

"Oh, my child! I thank God! I thank God!" she said.

And I too, thanked him then from my heart that I didn't take that "one step."—Church Monthly.

"OLD RATTLEBONES."

SAYS an old writer:

A number of us school-boys were playing by the roadside one Saturday afternoon, when the stage-coach drove up to a neighboring tavern, and the passengers alighted. As usual we gathered around to observe them. Among the number was an elderly man with a cane, who got out with much difficulty, and, when on the ground, he walked with the most curious contortions. His feet turned one way, his knees another, and his whole body looked as though the different limbs were independent of it and each other, and every one was making motions to suit itself. I unthinkingly shouted, "Look at old Rattlebones!" while the poor man turned his head with an expression of pain which I shall never forget.

Just then, to my surprise and horror, my father came round the corner, and, immediately stepping up to the stranger, shook his hand warmly, and assisted him to walk to our house, which was but a little way off. I could enjoy no more play that afternoon; and when tea-time came I would gladly have hid myself, for I knew that he would be in, and so tremblingly went into the sitting-room. To my great joy and relief, the stranger did not recognize me, but remarked pleasantly to my father as he introduced me: "Such a fine boy was surely worth saving."

How the words cut me to the heart! My father had often told me the story of a friend who had plunged into the river to save me as I was drowning, while an infant, and who in consequence of a cold then taken, had been made a cripple by inflammatory rheumatism, and this was the man I had made a butt of ridicule, and a laughing-stock for my companions!

I tell you, boys and girls, I would give a great deal to have the memory of that event taken away. If ever you are tempted as I was, remember that, while no good can come of sport whereby the feelings of others are wounded, you may be laying up for yourselves life-long painful recollections.—Selected.

THE LOVE OF CHILDREN.—If I were to choose among all gifts and qualities that which, on the whole, makes life pleasantest, I should select the love of children. No circumstance can render this world wholly a solitude to one who has this possession. It is a freemasonry. Wherever one goes, there are the little brethren and sisters of the mystic tie. No diversity of race or tongue makes much difference. A smile spreads the universal language. "If I value myself on any thing," said the lonely Hawthorne, "it is on having a smile that children love." They are such prompt little beings too; they require so little prelude; hearts are won in two minutes, at that frank period, and so long as you are true to them they will be true to you.—Selected.

HOW TO OBEY.

Do it at once. Never wait to be told a second time.

Do just what you are told. Do not try to have your own way, even in part.

Do it cheerfully. Then your obedience will be pleasing to God and man.

IF you have been tempted to evil, fly from it; it is not falling into the water, but lying in it, that drowns.

A BIBLE VIEW OF HELL:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This valuable work is a real Scriptural compend of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

A LETTER ON JOHN V. 28, 29.

BY CLARENDON KELLY.

[Concluded.]

ALL THAT ARE IN THE TOMBS.

Having shown, as I think, that the word "Graves," in verse 28, does not signify the abode of "the dead" in a literal sense, because it's Greek original never has that meaning, and it being (in this verse) merely the English representative of the Greek word—mneemios—it cannot exceed the limits of the word it represents. Consequently, if we receive the Saviour's words in these two verses in a literal sense we make him confine the resurrection (if come forth means resurrection) to persons whose bodies have had a burial in a tomb; but neither of us believe he meant to limit the resurrection to this class.

Please consider carefully the following

EXPOSITION.

In Matt. xv. 24, Christ says, "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." The first time he sent out his disciples, he forbade them to go to any but the "lost sheep of the house of Israel." He was Israel's Messiah. He was of Israel (according to the flesh), and for Israel; as saith the apostle Peter—"And that he may send Jesus Christ, who was before destined for you."—Acts iii. 20. See "B. U," "Diaglott," and "Anderson."

His discourses were listened to by Israelites who were more or less familiar with Moses and the prophets. His parables were illustrations of the condition, history, and dealings of JEHOVAH with Israel. And in his discourses and illustrations he borrowed largely from the imagery and language of Moses and the prophets.

In Deut. xxxii. is a prediction of Israel's turning away from God to serve other gods; and God says, "They have moved me to jealousy with that which is not God; they have provoked me to anger with their vanities; and I will move them to jealousy with those who are not a people: I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation. For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest sheol," and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundation of the mountains."—Verses 21, 22.

What does Jehovah mean by "a fire is kindled in mine anger and shall burn unto the lowest sheol—? See the following context. Verse 24. "They shall be burnt with hunger and devoured with burning heat," etc. "I will scatter you among the heathen and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate and your cities waste."—Lev. xxvi. 33. "And I will make thee to pass with thine enemies into a land which thou knowest not: for a fire is kindled in mine anger which shall burn upon you."—Jer. xv. 14. "I will scatter them also among the heathen whom they nor their fathers have known, and I will send a sword after them till I have consumed them."—Jer. ix. 16.

Here we have the fire kindled in his anger, burning upon them unto the lowest sheol; viz., Israel scattered among the heathen, with the sword of Jehovah following them, until it has consumed them. How came this fire to be kindled in Jehovah's anger? Ans.—"For ye have kindled a fire in mine anger which shall burn upon you."—Jer. xvii. 4. Thus we see that Israel, scattered among the heathen, is in sheol.

Let us now go to the "valley of dry bones," Ez. xxxvii. I need not repeat the vision; it is familiar to you, but I wish to call your attention to the interpretation as given verses 11–14. "Then he said unto me, Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel. Behold they say, our bones are dried and our hope is lost: we are cut off for our parts. Therefore prophecy and say unto them, Thus saith the LORD God, Behold O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the LORD when I have opened your graves; and shall put my Spirit in you; and ye shall live, and I shall place you in your own land, then shall ye know that I, the LORD have spoken and performed, saith the LORD." Now brother, notice: These dry bones represent the "whole house of Israel." Does this mean all who have ever belonged to the house of Israel?

Turn to chap. xlv. 6. "And ye shall appoint the possession of the city, five thousand broad, and five and twenty thousand long, over against the oblation of the holy portion; it shall be for the whole house of Israel." . . . "And the rest of the land shall they give to the house of Israel according to their tribes." Verse 8. This shows us what the "whole house of Israel" is, viz., The twelve tribes. The house of Judah did not constitute the house of Israel, neither did the ten tribes; but the twelve tribes united under one King does constitute the "whole house of Israel."

Why are they represented by a valley of dry bones? Listen. "Behold they say, our bones are dried and our hope is lost." Now if these dry bones represent men literally dead, then they died without faith; for they say, "our hope is lost;" hence they cannot have a resurrection to life; for, "Without faith it is impossible to please God." And "We are saved by the hope." But when these dry bones, who have lost their hope, come out of their graves, they come out to life. "And shall put my Spirit in them and they shall live."

Again. Do dead men talk about their lost hope? These dry bones talked about theirs. Once more. If these dry bones represent that part of Israel that are literally dead, at the coming of Christ, then they not only died without faith, but with out knowing Jehovah. For he says, "And ye shall know that I am the LORD, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves." This implies that they did not possess this knowledge before. Now when we remember that departure from Jehovah to worship as God that which was not God, was the chief cause of their being scattered, by Jehovah's anger, among the heathen, we see the force of this declaration, "Then shall ye know," etc.

One other point I wish you to observe. It is in the 12, and 14 verses. He says in verse 12, "I will open your graves," etc., "and bring you into the land of Israel." Consequently, the valley of dry bones is not in the land of Israel; but many of Israel sleep in their own land. Now verse 14. "And shall put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I will place you in your own land," etc. Now read verses 26, 27, 28, chap. xxxvi. "A new heart also will I give you, and a new Spirit will I put within you, and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh and give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statues, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them. And ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers, and ye shall be my people and I will be your God."—(Comp. Rev. xxi. 3). Read the balance of the chapter and then read Paul's description of the resurrection in 1 Cor. xv. 52, and 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17, and say if you think the coming up out of the graves in Ezk. xxxvii. 12–14 is the resurrection described by Paul. He says, "The dead shall be raised incorruptible." And this incorruptible resurrection is on the condition that the Spirit of God dwelt in them before they died. It is also brought about by that indwelling Spirit; (Rom. viii). It also required that they hold their confidence [hope] stedfast unto the end.—(Heb. iii. 14). But those represented by the valley of dry bones had lost their hope, and knew not Jehovah; and when they come up out of their graves, he will put his Spirit in them; and this is called giving them a new spirit.

Now this causing them to come up out of their graves, and bringing them unto the land of Israel, is spoken of in chap. xxxiv. 27, thus, "And the tree of the field shall yield her fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase, and they shall be safe in their land, and shall know that I am the LORD." When? "When I have broken the bands of their yoke, and delivered them out of the hand of those that serve themselves of them."

Here are the "graves" of the twelve tribes—"The whole house of Israel;" buried among the heathen nations of the world; ten of the tribes entirely lost sight of. But Jehovah will open their graves and bring them to light, and re-establish them in their own land; for Jehovah saith, "But now thus saith the LORD that created thee, O Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel, Fear not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name: thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee: and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned: neither shall the flame kindle upon thee. For I am the LORD thy God, the Holy one of Israel, thy Saviour. I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Sela for thee. Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honorable, and I have loved thee: therefore will I give men for thee and people for thy life. Fear not; for I am with thee. I will bring thy seed from the east and gather thee from the west, I will say to the north, Give up: and to the south, Keep not back: bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth; every one that is called by my name, [Isra—El], for I have created him for myglory, I have form ed him; yea I have madehim."—Isa. xliii. 1–7.—So let it be.

The ten tribes had been in their graves over six hundred years when the Saviour uttered the language recorded in John v. 28, 29; which, it will be seen, is only a reiteration of Jehovah's promise by the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel. He said, "I will open your graves and cause you to come up out of your graves and bring you into the land of Israel." Jesus says "All in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth. They that have done good [come forth] unto the resurrection of life: and they that have done evil [come forth] into the resurrection of condemnation."

Jehovah says they will open their graves and cause them to come forth, and he will put his Spirit in them, and they shall live. Again he says, chap. xx. 30–38, "And I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant, and I will purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against me, ("done evil.") I will bring them forth out of the country where they sojourn, and they shall not enter into the land of Israel: and ye shall know that I am the LORD." For an explanation of the term "pass under the rod," see Lev. xxvii. 32, and Jer. xxxiii. 13.

We will now devote a little time to the consideration of the words "Resurrection of life" and "Resurrection of condemnation." In Rom. v. 12, Paul tells us how death entered into the world, viz., "by sin:" and as all have sinned, death passed upon all. "For," says he, "until the law [of Moses] sin was in the world, but sin is not imputed where there is no law." Well then, as there was no law to transgress between Adam and Moses, those who lived during that time were exempt from death, were they not? No, for he continues in verse 14—"Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression;" i. e., transgressing a law—they had no law to transgress. Well, did the reign of death stop when the law of Moses entered? No: for he says, verse 20, "Moreover the law entered that the offence (the sin) might abound." And as death is the wages of sin (Rom. vi. 23), and sin is the transgression of the law, (1 John iii. 4), so death still reigns, and will continue to reign until it is cast into the "lake of fire."

Now, brother W——, what is death? literally, it is the opposite, or absence of life, is it not? Whatever is without life is in death. So John taught—"He that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son hath not life." 1 John v. 12. "We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death."

Over whom then does death still reign? Ans. Over all who are out of Christ; who have not the Son of God; for Paul says, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus; for the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death."—Rom. viii. 1, 2. Well, when did death begin to reign? Ans. "Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin." Well then, death did not reign before Adam sinned, did it? No. Consequently, life must have reigned before sin brought death into the world. Peter tells us in Acts iii. 20, 21, that God will send Jesus Christ into the world again, when "the time of restitution of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets since the world began" has arrived. What will be the nature of this restitution? Ans. "Nevertheless we according to his PROMISE, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."—2 Pet. iii. 13.

Peter was one of those, looking for a new heaven, etc., and he looked for it because God had promised it. Where will we find that promise? See Isa. lxv. 17. "For behold I create new heavens and a new earth," etc. "But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy."—Verse 21, "And they shall build houses and inhabit them, and they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them."—Verse 23. "They shall not labor in vain nor bring forth for trouble, for they are the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them." This is in the new heavens and new earth that Peter and others were looking for. See also, ch. lxvi. 22–24. "For as the new heavens and new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name [Israel] remain." "And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the LORD."

Who believes it? I do; Peter did; and he says, "Wherefore beloved, seeing ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless." Verse 14. John had a vision of this "new heaven and new earth." He says, ch. xxi. 1, "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away. And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven. . . . And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and He himself will be with them, their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes: and "the Death"—Ho tanatos—[that sin brought into the world, and which has reigned ever since] shall be no more." Why, what has become of it? See ch. xx. 14. "And death and hades were cast into the lake of fire: This is the second death." The Lake of Fire.—Tregelles.—So then, "The death" will not reign in the new earth.

But let us read further.—Verse 5. "And he that sat on the throne said, Behold I make all things new." Surely this must be the "restitution" which God hath been speaking of "by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began," mentioned by Peter, and which he evidently understood to be the "new heavens and earth," promised by the Father. But we are not done with our witness yet. He tells us in verse 9, 10, that this holy city is the "Bride the Lamb's wife;" and in verse 24, he says, "The nations of them that are saved" shall walk in its light: and in ch. xxii. 2, he says, he saw the "Tree of life" in it; and "the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." "And there shall be no more curse."—Br. W—— don't this look like a "Restitution?" the earth renewed—"The death" destroyed—"The tree of life" restored to man—The "curse" removed, and God dwelling and holding familiar intercourse with men on the earth as in the "garden of Eden." Here is where "Israel" will realize the glorious promises of which the prophecies are so full. And now, please notice. This is all after the "DRAGON" has been loosed from his thousand years imprisonment and cast into the lake of fire. And Peter says, the heaven must receive [retain] Christ until the time of this restitution.

But say you, "Don't Paul say, he must reign until he has put all enemies under his feet? and that the last one is death? and then he will deliver up the kingdom to God even the Father?" Certainly he does. And now please let us turn to the record again. "And Jesus came and spoke unto them saying, All power [Authority—see Diaglott] is given unto me in heaven and in earth." Matt. xxviii. 18. But, say you, that was prospective, for he was not yet glorified. True, but you must admit that if it was given to him, a time must come when he will exercise it. Do you believe that he will exercise all authority in heaven while he is reigning on the throne of his father David in Jerusalem? Let us consult Peter about the time when he is to exercise this "all authority." Speaking of Christ he says, "Who is gone into heaven and is on the right hand of God. Angels [in heaven] and authorities and powers [on earth] being made subject unto him." Well this looks very much like "all authority in heaven and on earth." But for fear Peter may be mistaken we will call another witness. Paul what sayest thou? "Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in heavenly places. Far above all principality, and power and might, and dominion," etc. "And hath put all things under his feet." Eph. i. 20–22. Is this prospective, Paul? "Not only in this [aioon] age, but that which is to come." (Read this in the Diaglott). Three such witnesses as Christ, Paul, and Peter, ought to be sufficient to establish one fact.

This authority, Christ says, was given to him. Who gave it to him? Ans. "Which he (God) wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead and set him at his own right hand," etc. The Father then gave him this authority. Is God a king? Ans. "Jehovah is king forever and ever." Psa. x. 16. "For God is the king of all the earth." Psa. xlvii. 7. Well then, the authority which he gave to his son was a part in his own kingly rule or authority. Br. W—— do you know the meaning of the word—basileian—? Kingdom, do you say? But has it no other meaning? Robinson's Lexicon says "A Dominion, reign; i. e., exercise of kingly power." And this definition he marks, "A." Now this is just what Christ, Paul, and Peter, testify he (Christ) is now doing, setting with his Father on his throne, and jointly with his Father exercising—bassileian—kingly authority and power over the host of heaven and over the kingdoms of earth; and this—basileian—Paul tells us he will continue to exercise until all oposition is put down and the last enemy, death, is destroyed, and then he will deliver up the—basileian—(this is the word he uses) [i. e., which he jointly exercises with his Father in heaven] to God even the Father. What will he do then? Then shall the Son himself be subject unto him that put all things under him. He now exercises authority jointly with his Father. He will then exercise authority in subjection to his Father. He now sits on his Father's throne. He will then sit on his own throne in Jerusalem, the throne of his father David, and "reign over the house of Jacob [the whole house of Israel] forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke. i. 33.—Amen.

So the kingdom of Christ is, Peter's "Restitution." In it, the reign of life is restored; for Christ destroys the last enemy—"the death"—before he commences his reign on his own throne, by casting it into the lake of fire, which is the second death.

Here then is the "resurrection of life" unto which those in their [national] graves, that have done good, come. Those of Israel who received and accepted Christ—when he was first sent to them, as the Son of God, the promised Messiah, i. e., heard the voice of the Son of God, lived; i. e., "passed from death unto life;" were freed from the law [dominion] of sin and death. And the hour is coming in which the whole house of Israel,—now buried (nationally) among the "heathen," will hear his voice [recognize in him the Messiah—the Son of God] and come forth, but not all unto the resurrection of life. Only those that have done good prior to hearing his voice. Those having done evil will come forth unto the resurrection of condemnation, as Jehovah saith by the mouth of the prophet Exekiel, ch. xx. 38, "And I will purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against me ["have done evil"]. I will bring them forth out of the country where they sojourn, and they shall not enter into the land of Israel." They come forth unto the resurrection of condemnation; i. e., to be executed under the penalty of the revived law which passed upon Adam and all his posterity; but which in case of his posterity, has been suspended to give them a chance of life through the second Adam. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." But this cutting off those of all nations, Israel included, who are not fit to become subjects of Christ's kingdom, being simply the revival and enforcing of the suspended "law of sin and death," it is properly called the "resurrection of condemnation." So I believe, and therefore, so I have written.

Yours, in love.

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.

THE HARVEST OF THE EARTH.

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

"And I looked, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat like unto the Son of man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle. . . . And he that sat on the cloud thrust in his sickle on the earth; and the earth was reaped."—Rev. xiv. 14, 16.

THIS vision of the reaping of the earth is a very interesting portion of the book of Revelation.

The holy seer upon the Isle of Patmos was here favored with a vision of the closing scenes of this dispensation. This reaping scene is the termination of all earthly strife, the carnage of nations and the sufferings of God's saints. He had beheld the strange and sad history of the world; saw the bloody persecutions of God's people under the iron heel of the Papacy;—he had seen the glorious triumph of the church in contrast with her wilderness state; and it seems but proper now in another vision that he should behold the great harvest,—the gathering of the "wheat" and the destruction of the "tares."

In the vision under consideration, the first thing that appeared to have attracted John's attention was a "white cloud" upon which sat the Son of man. Though Christ is here spoken of as "one like unto the Son of man," yet we do not believe that it will be denied that it was not Christ, for in the Scriptures he is often spoken of in this figure of speech. The important fact of his second coming in the same manner as he ascended, was the point to be impressed upon the Revelator's mind. At His ascension "a cloud received him" from the sight of the disciples, and angelic messengers declared to them that "this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come again in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." (Acts i. 9, 11.) Christ himself predicts his second coming "in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." (Matt. xxiv. 30.) Thus the literality of his second coming is placed beyond a doubt. To spiritualize the event would destroy the harmony and beauty of the Scriptures which uniformly represent his coming in the clouds of heaven. Daniel "saw in the night vision, and, behold, one like unto the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven. . . . And there was given unto him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people nations and languages, should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." (Dan. vii. 13, 14.) He comes with the clouds of heaven, all radiant with glory,—such glory as never met mortal eyes; arrayed in his own glory and in the glory of the Father and all the holy angels. This is an event that has always gladdened the heart of the true bride, and to-day his saints are lifting up their heads and rejoicing that it is an event near at hand.

John describes Christ as coming forth as a king. Upon his head is "a golden crown." This is symbolic of his regal position. He will receive a "kingdom that shall not be destroyed." "Then shall the king say unto them on his right hand, Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." (Matt. xxv. 34.) Oh what a thought of joy we find in this testimony that at Christ's coming he shall set up a kingdom of unending glory, from which everything unholy shall be excluded, for it was "prepared from the foundation of the world" for his saints,—for those to whom he will address those thrilling words of joy, "Come ye blessed of my Father." How plainly Jesus tells us that unless we secure a birth to immortality we shall not see the kingdom of God. He says: "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God; . . . he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." (John iii. 3, 5,) With this important consideration in mind, how deeply in earnest we should be to cleanse ourselves from all unrighteousness, and to walk in harmony with God, that through his boundless grace we may be granted an abundant entrance into the kingdom. Then will the glorious consummation be reached, and God's will shall be done on earth as it is done in heaven.

Again: As well as Christ being represented as coming as a king, he is also presented as a reaper, "having in his hand a sharp sickle,"—a symbol of his power over the harvest. The duty of a reaper is to gather the harvest at the appointed time, but not until it is fully ripe. Though Christ is presented as a reaper, yet he is "lord of his vineyard," and uses agencies to accomplish the work. The "field is the world," in which the good and bad seed grow together until the harvest. "The harvest is the end of the world; the reapers are the angels." (Matt. xiii. 38, 39. Thus we are shown that the angels are the agents which Christ employs to gather the "good seed." The good seed, he tells us are "the children of the kingdom." Then as a king he is to "gather" (Matt. xxiv. 31.) the subjects of his kingdom,—those who are "accounted worthy"—(Luke xx. 35, 36),—and they will reign forever in a land made glorious by his presence.

As we have already intimated, the reaping is to be done at the appointed time. In this vision John heard a loud voice declare, "Thrust in thy sickle and reap, for the harvest of the earth is ripe;" i. e., the condition of the world is such as to be ready for the reaper. What is the predicted condition of the world when Christ shall come? It is one of excessive wickedness, "evil men and seducers waxing worse and worse;" a cold faithless state of the church; and a greatly perplexed state of the political world, is the Scriptural description. But Christ very clearly describes this reaping time when he says: "For as in the days before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be."—Matt. xxiv. 38, 39.

Dear reader, what language could more clearly describe the present condition of the harvest field (the world) than the above? And thus we are afforded strong assurance that the end is at hand. It is said of the antidiluvian world that they knew not until the flood came and took them all away. Why did they not know of the approach of the flood? They were warned and as good a chance was given them of escaping the danger as Noah had. They were heedless, and would not believe the warning; but the flood came, they were wholly unprepared, and they all perished.

But again: The reaping of the earth will be a sudden work. "He that sat upon the cloud thrust his sickle on the earth, and the earth was reaped." (Rev. xiv. 16.) "As the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." . . . And he shall send forth his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Matt. xxiv. 27, 31. Only two classes are presented; "the one shall be taken and other left" (verse 40). Paul in bearing his testimony on this matter says: "Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep (that is, die), but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality."—1 Cor xv. 51, 52, 53. "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first. then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them (the resurrected saints) in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air: and so we shall be ever with the Lord."—1 Thess. iv. 16, 17. If the plain declaration that the living and resurrected saints are "caught up" to "meet the Lord in the air" at his coming, does not mean that they are taken up from the earth, (thus escaping the fiery day of indignation that awaits all others), then I confess I can fix no reliable meaning to the apostles' words.

Dear reader, this is the harvest of the earth, and let me assure you that it is near at hand. Jesus is soon coming; this is the great fact that I desire to impress upon your mind, that, by a proper application of this truth, you may secure a crown of life, and be one of the number who shall celebrate the marriage supper of the Lamb before the throne of God, and partake of the glory of his presence while the earth is being purified for your glorious and eternal home.

"Awake! shake off thy slumbers; put on
Thy beautiful garments, let thy lamp be trimmed,
For lo, the cry 'Behold the Bridegroom cometh!'
Is ringing in the air. Then come thou forth,
Forth from the world with all its vanities;
Forth from the world with all its vileness;
Forth from the world that hates thy Lord and thee;
Make thyself ready, lo, He is at hand!"

ROCHESTER, N. Y., April, 1871.

FROM DR. J. F. LEE.

DEAR BROTHER: For thirty-four years I have been fully persuaded that unbelief is the sin that dooms to destruction all who receive in vain the gospel of the Son of God.

There are weighty inferences or sequences drawn logically from what is said in relation to the age to come, to say nothing of plain and positive assurances, that no mortal will be condemned for unbelief in Jesus Christ to whom He has not been preached. No one will be damned for not coming to Him of whom they have not heard—or for rejecting that which was never offered.

SUPPOSITIONS.

Suppose 1st, There will be in the kingdom of heaven probation, and that the offer of Eternal Life will be made to all who had never heard of Jesus Christ and him crucified. Suppose 2dly, Paul, the apostles, and other immortal, unerring, infallible witnesses, raised from the dead, are the instruments employed by God, etc., would not the evidences be infallible that God is love; that those who had heard the voice of the Son of God—witnessed his miracles, corrupted his word, rejected, hated Him—were worthy of death? Would it not appear that the Jews, who rejected him, and attributed his miracles to the prince of devils, deserve their doom? And what would be the decision of "the judges of the twelve tribes of Israel," relative to those who had preached a gospel different from that which Paul received from Jesus Christ?

I need not multiply questions, as I once did relative to the re-living of the wicked, nor quote the passages of Scripture bearing on the subject, which is dear to the heart of him who has introduced the subject into the HERALD OF LIFE. I can say this much, I have weighty reasons to believe God is just; that he is no respector of persons; that he will never condemn those for unbelief, in him, to whom he has never been revealed.

MONROE, N. C., April, 1871.

FROM E. B. WAIT.

BR. STORRS: I thank you very much for sending me the HERALD OF LIFE until the present time. I love the truths it advocates, and want it as long as it lives. I hope it will live as long as the Lord wants to have it. O, I do thank the Lord that the righteous only will live again. Some professors of religion, that I talk with on the subject, say to me, "If I believed your doctrine I I never would offer another prayer." O how little do they love God and value life! How little do such ones appreciate the love and mercy of God, who has given his dear Son to suffer and die that they might live. Well, I do thank the Lord with all my heart for the unspeakable rich gift of his dear Son. My earnest desire is to be a humble follower of that blessed Jesus who has given his life for us. I have often wondered why God delivered up his dear beloved Son to suffer and die that such poor unworthy creatures as we are might live. O, truly God is love: glory be to His holy name. My great desire is to love Him with all the heart, and work righteousness. I want to be more faithful in His glorious cause. I do thank Him with all my heart for life, and for the health I enjoy, and for every blessing He bestows upon me. Thanks be to His ever blessed name for sparing your life, and restoring you to health. O may the time speedily arrive when there will be no more sickness, sorrow, pain nor death. The Lord help us to watch and pray, and keep ourselves in the love of God, that we may be saved in His coming kingdom for His dear Son's sake.

Your sister, hoping for redemption.

RUSSELL, MASS., April 16, 1871.

THOS. W. & PHILANDA P. VICK, Kalamo, Mich., write: To our much esteemed Br. Storrs in the love of the gospel, and the truth as it is in Jesus, we salute you, and all the brothers and sisters who are so nobly striving to search out, sustain, and build a Brotherhood whose motto shall ever be "Holiness to the Lord." Words are inadequate to express our thanks to the great I AM for raising up those that have the ability and means given them, to expound the Scriptures in their true light to our benighted minds. We find that peace and joy in reading the HERALD OF LIFE, and comparing its texts with the Bible, that the world cannot give or take away. We are alone, in these parts, in this faith. Our names cast out as deluded, and believers in a dangerous doctrine; but if God be for us we will not fear what man shall do or say unto us. Truth will prevail. In conclusion would say that we are striving to build our hopes on Christ as the chief corner stone; trusting to be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead. Oh that all might see that God is Love, and rules in equity. Yours, in hope.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, APRIL 26, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

TO NEW YORK SUBSCRIBERS.

IF any of you are to change residence on the first of May, you should give us notice immediately; otherwise you may lose one or two numbers of your papers, as we shall not be able to supply a second time. Please attend to this matter without delay.

TO DELINQUENT SUBSCRIBERS.

A NUMBER have paid but $1 on this volume, and have now received five numbers more than were due them. If they would not have their papers discontinued, let them remit another dollar soon.

OUR POSITION.

1. GOD has promised, and confirmed it with an oath, that, In Abraham and his seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed.

2. This promise and oath is to be understood in the literal sense of the words in which it is made.

3. This promise and oath is not yet fulfilled in its fulness.

4. Therefore, there is to be an age, or "ages to come," in which its fulfilment will be perfectly accomplished.

One article more will be all that we care to say on the subject at present; or, till those who take the negative of it shall answer the following questions, viz.,

1. Did God mean what the words express in the promise and oath?

2. Has that promise and oath had a fulfilment in the past?

These are the two questions at issue. We have answered the first in the affirmative; and the second in the negative.

When we are through with our articles, we shall issue them in pamphlet so soon as we can raise the means to do it. We shall not employ any of the "Tract Fund" money for this purpose, nor put the pamphlet among the "Campaign Documents." It will be our private concern. If any one wishes to help us in this matter, we shall be glad to receive their aid, and will return them their money in the pamphlets at the cost of the first edition. We shall need about $50.

We regard the subject as one of the first importance. If the kingdom of God is soon to be developed, we desire to know all that can be known about it, while preparing for it; and just how reliable God's promises are. We wish to know if we are to receive them literally, or are to construe them figuratively or hyperbolically. This knowledge must deeply affect our faith; and, therefore, is highly important at this near approach of the kingdom of God. So we regard it.

P. S.—Since the above was in type we have received the following from the Board of Managers of the Life and Advent Union, which will explain why our article for this week on "The Promise and Oath of God to Abraham" does not appear, though it was in type:

"Resolved by the Board of Managers of the Life and Advent Union, that Br. Storrs, Editor of the HERALD OF LIFE, be requested to cease all further publication, pro or con, on the subject contained in the series of articles entitled 'Promises and Oath of God to Abraham.'

"NEW YORK, April 22, 1871.

"THOS. M. REDHEAD,
"Secretary, pro tem."

To this resolution we responded as follows:

"I accept the above with the understanding, it is intended to exclude all matter, from whatever quarter it comes, relating to the future age, or ages to come."

The Board of Managers accepted our construction of their resolution.

Our remaining articles will be immediately published in the tract spoken of above. Let those who choose to help us in that work respond at once.

THE MISTAKE.

PERSONS still write us saying, "I received two papers of March 22 and none of March 29." If they will examine the second one they received of March 22 they will find the inside is "March 29," all right. It was a blunder of the Press-man. You have therefore, the inside perfect, but the outside wrong. We have sent to disappointed ones all of March 29 we had left, and all we could collect from subscribers in this city, and fear we shall not be able to send more.

PRACTICE YOUR PRINCIPLES.

WE cannot often see how principles can be carried out, till we begin to carry them out. Some principles seem altogether impracticable, until we approach them in the way of practice. When we practice one principle, we see how a second can be practiced, and when we practice a second and a third, we are then prepared to practice a fourth and a fifth. No man can see his way through the work of reformation when he first begins it, nor even when he has got some way on in it. Many principles and doctrines seem extravagant to a reformer when he begins his career, which prove to be true and necessary when he has gone on some way. We sometimes think that principles are impracticable, because they cannot be practiced without upsetting some other principle. But, perhaps that other principle or doctrine is a bad one, and needs to be upset. Our plan should be to adopt whatever principle or doctrine commends itself to our judgments as true and divine, and to resolve to reduce such to practice whatever the consequences may be. The practice of the truth will never destroy anything but error and evil. Have courage, friends, and have faith in truth. Be not frightened at the idea of old things passing away; the practice of the truth will make all things new. You will do nothing as you ought, unless you learn to place confidence in truth, and to risk something for its sake. We have followed the advice we give, and proved it to be good by experience.

QUESTIONS TO HELP SELF-EXAMINATION.

WHAT are we living for? What is the great end we aim at? Do we seek in all things to please God? Are we doing our best to benefit our fellow-men? Are we striving to promote the spread of truth? What have we done, and what are we doing to this end? What sacrifices have we made for this object since we professedly espoused the cause of Christ? Do we not see much reason to mourn that we have done so much for self, or merely worldy ends, and so little to help others to the light of life? Do we feel that interest in the eternal life of our fellow-men which manifested itself in our Redeemer? Are we aware that Christ is not only our Redeemer, but our example? Are we striving after conformity or likeness to Him, in love, meekness, patience, forgiveness of enemies; labor for the good of others, and holy obedience to our Father in heaven? Are we satisfied with ourselves while conscious that in all these particulars we come short? Do we seek His forgiving mercy for it, and pray for the Holy Spirit to help our infirmities in these things? Are our wills subjected to the will of God in all things? Are there no murmurings in our hearts, when our wills are crossed? Do we delight in doing good to others? Are we using the things God has intrusted us with, to this end, as we will wish we had when our Lord returns? Have we money lying idle, or expending it only to gratify self, or to make the rich richer, while we are dealing out grudgingly to relieve the destitute, and to scatter the knowledge of the loving God to those whose minds are still blinded? Do we make the friends of Jesus our chief friends and associates, or do we prefer and seek the society of the worldly-minded and politicians? Are we making as much of our situation and advantages as Christ would make were he in our circumstances? How would we feel, if we knew we were to meet Christ now? Would we not, rather, feel as if we had done too much for self and too little for him Do we know how soon we shall meet Him?

Are we afraid of reproach or persecution? Are we afraid we shall lose some desirable situation or employment, or some of our friends, if we openly act our convictions of truth and duty? Are our fears such, in this respect, that we have no eyes to see a greater loss impending, viz: the loss of eternal life, and a place in the kingdom of God on the earth in Edenic state? Do our fears prevent our renouncing and rebuking error? Are we afraid, if we do this, we shall be cast out of some religious society, and be left to our own resources; forgetting that when men forsake us, because of our attachment to, and defence of truth, God will take us up and be our Father?

INHERENT IMMORTALITY.

THAT DOCTRINE LEADS TO IDOLATRY.

DR. EADIE, "Professor of Biblical Literature to the United Presbyterian Church," Glasgow, though himself a believer in inherent immortality, makes the following statement in his "Biblical Cyclopædia," nnder the article "Idolatry:"

"The pride and pomp of the great and the abject spirits of the mean, occasioned first the flattery and then the worship of kings and princes as gods upon earth. Men famous for their adventures and exploits, the founders of nations and cities, or the inventors of useful arts and sciences, were reverenced while they lived, and after death canonized. The prevailing notion of the soul's immortality made them imagine, that the spirit of such excellent powers, either immediately ascended up into heaven, and settled there in some orb or other, or that they hovered in the air; whence by solemn invocations, and by making some statue or image to resemble them, they might be prevailed with to come down and inhabit it."

Such is one of the natural results of the popular belief of man's inherent immortality. "Ye shall not surely die," said the tempter to our first parents: and the belief of that popular falsehood has done more to corrupt religion and deify men than all other heresies put together; nor is there an error promulgated that may more justly be named "legion" than that of man's possessing an "undying spirit:" it is a plain and palpable denial of the testimony of God of certain death to the sinner. "Thou shalt surely die," and "The soul that sinneth it shall die," is the plain testimony of the truth-speaking God. No wonder that idolatry and every other abomination should grow out of the "nation of the soul's immortality:" and no marvel that the advocates of such a theory should cry out "Infidelity!" when that soul-destroying doctrine is attacked by the Bible doctrine of "No immortality except through Christ alone."

SOME MEN'S "COMMON SENSE."

An "orthodox" minister says:

"It has been the common sense of the whole race, with few exceptions, that the soul is immortal."

Whether this advocate of inherent immortality is possessed of "common sense" or not we shall see. His statement is a purely gratuitous assumption a thousand times uttered by men of his school.

Not a solitary expression of any such doctrine was ever known among the Jews till after their captivity in Babylon. They may be included in the "few exceptions:" they are, however, an important exception. Bishop Whately has shown, conclusively, that the wisest of the pagan philosophers did nothing more than to speculate on immortality, without ever satisfying their "common sense" that immortality is an attribute of the soul.

But supposing, contrary to fact, it could be shown that the Babylonians, Medes and Persians believed the soul immortal? What if Zoroaster, Pythagoras, Socrates and Plato taught it? What if the sentiment abounds in Homer, Ovid and Virgil? Does this prove the doctrine true? If so, the prevalence of other sentiments, held by these nations and distinguished persons, upon the same principle of reasoning, must also be true. If you receive the pagan idea of immortality, you must take along with it the pre-existence of souls—the transmigration of souls—and the rejection of the resurrection of the body! You must not divide the dose, though bitter, but swallow the whole.

The oldest hypotheses of the oriental world, upon this subject, resolved themselves into the doctrine of emanation and imanation; issuing from the "soul of the universe" at birth, and re-absorbed at death, as Bishop Whately has shown. They regarded the soul as a part of the Deity, thus making him divisible, which you say the soul is not!

Dr. GOOD says—"If we turn from Persia, Egypt and Hindostan to Arabia, to the fragrant groves and learned shades of Dedan and Teman, from which it is certain that Persia, and highly probable that Hindostan, derived its first polite literature, we shall find the entire subject" (of the immortality of the soul), "left in as blank and barren a silence as the deserts by which they are surrounded; or, if touched upon, only touched upon to betray doubt, and sometimes disbelief. The tradition, indeed, of a future state of retributive justice seems to have reached the schools of this part of the world, and to have been generally, though perhaps not universally accredited; but the future existence it alludes to is that of a resurrection of the body, and not of a survival of the soul after the body's dissolution."

Here are large exceptions to the assumed position of its "being the common sense of the whole race that the soul is immortal." And we find these exceptions just where we might expect to find them, viz., where the light of revelation shed its illuminating beams! That country is Idumea! Here Job, that venerable patriarchal saint who held communion with the living God, and not with the Buthos or Demiurgis of the Chaldeans, Egyptians, etc.,—here we say Job lived; and from this quarter we have, as Dr. Good expresses it, "that astonishing and transcendent composition" called "the Book of Job;" "a work," says he—"that ought assuredly to raise the genius of Idumea above that of Greece," etc., and may we not add, the knowledge of Job far above that of Zoroaster, Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato and Dr. Dick—all combined!

Dr. Good continues—"Yet in this sublime and magnificent poem, replete with all the learning and wisdom of the age, the doctrine upon the subject before us is merely as I have stated it, a patriarchal or traditionary belief of a future state of retributive justice, not by the natural immortality of the soul, but by a resurrection of the body!"

Dr. Good makes this belief "patriarchal or traditionary," but this is unnecessary, as Job was doubtless an inspired man. Dr. Good's testimony is the more valuable, because he believed in the popular doctrine of immortality.

Whether, therefore, the dogma of natural immortality originated with the old serpent, who said, "Ye shall not surely die," or whether it originated in Egypt, Persia, Media, Babylonia, or elsewhere, it matters not. One thing is certain, it did not originate with God, else Job would have been in possession of it; and we will put Job's knowledge and wisdom against all the Babylonians, Persians, Medes, Assyrians, Zoroasters, and Platos on earth! This is doubtless the oldest book or document extant, and on that account demands the attention of the sincere inquirer after truth on this subject.

"The Hindoo philosophers," says Dr. Good, "totally and universally denying a resurrection of the body, and supporting the doctrine (of future existence) alone upon the natural immortality of the soul, and the Arabian philosophers (among whom was Job), passing over the immortality of the soul, and resting it alone upon a resurrection of the body."

The Hindoo view of this question is the legitimate tendency of the modern dogma on the same subject—it leads to a denial of the resurrection.

AN INQUIRY ON HEBREWS ii. 2, 3.

"For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward: How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him?"

"I have no commentary, nor have I ever heard an explanation of the above text. If you could find time to give your views of it, you will oblige several of your readers. A. B."

"THE word spoken by angels" was the Mosaic law. Paul saith, "It was ordained by angels in the hands of a mediator:" Gal. iii. 19. That "mediator" was Moses. Stephen saith, Acts vii. 44, 53, "Our fathers received the law by the disposition" [or ministration] "of angels." Also, of Moses, he saith—"This Moses, whom they refused" . . . "the same did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer by the hand of the angel which appeared to him in a bush;" verse 35; see also verse 38.

God gave the law to Moses, and through him to Israel, by the ministration of angels; hence it is called "the word spoken by angels;" yet every transgression of it was punished according to its statements, or "received a just recompense of reward;" that is, such reward as specified in the law. But "God hath," saith the apostle to the Hebrews, "spoken unto us, in these last days" [or latter times] "by His Son," etc. Heb. i. 1–3. He then goes on to show, that the Son is far superior to angels, of whatever order they might be; yet as their "word was steadfast," and not to be disregarded with impunity, "How shall we escape" death—"the wages of sin"—"if we neglect so great salvation?" that which has been declared unto us by "His Son." The Syriac reads, "How shall we escape, if we despise the things which are our life," etc. The law, or "word spoken by angels," could not give life, but was a "ministration of condemnation." Christ came proclaiming life, through himself, from the dead, by a resurrection to life. The law laid men under death, but could not deliver them from it: Christ only could do that; and He proclaimed such deliverance to all that believe on him, saying—"This is the will of Him who sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day." John vii. 40. But, "How shall we escape"—death, or its dominion—"if we neglect so great salvation; viz.: that of being "raised up" by Christ, "at the last day?" There is no escape from death to those who neglect Christ, or His salvation—his deliverance—which He has promised in the words he has spoken, and which have been "confirmed unto us by those who heard him."

LIGHT WANTED.

BY J. W. STOKES.

BR. STORRS: Will you please answer this through our beloved paper, the HERALD OF LIFE? We read in Gen. ii. 17, that Adam eat of the tree that God commanded him not to eat, viz., the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Adam retained that knowledge. Now the question: Did Adam ever eat of the tree of life before he sinned? Because in Gen. iii. 22, we read, "And the LORD God said, Behold the man is become as one of us to know good and evil; and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life and eat and live for ever," etc. Does that mean if Adam had eat of the tree of life that he would have lived eternally? If once eating of the tree of life would not have made Adam live eternally, why did God guard the tree of life from Adam? Now the great question is, Did Adam ever eat of the tree of life? Will you please to answer this, as you understand the Bible, and you will greatly favor one looking for light, and the speedy coming of the LIFE-GIVER.

LEWISTON, ME., April 16, 1871.

Response by the Editor.

We do not know whether Adam ever eat of the tree of life, and we have no means of determining that point.

We have no idea that once eating of the tree of life would have perpetuated his life "eternally," any more than a man's having once believed in Jesus would secure him eternal life. "If that which ye have heard from the beginning shall remain in you, ye also shall continue in the Son." 1 John ii. 24. "If ye continue in the faith, grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel," etc. Col. i. 24. So, if Adam had eaten of the tree of life once or a hundred times and then had left off to eat, or access to it was cut off, he could not have "lived eternally." He must continue to eat. God guarded the tree of life, because upon man's exclusion from it depended the certainty of the execution of the penalty. From that hour mortality had its natural course, and "dying he did surely die."

IS IT LOGICAL?

THE following criticism is put forth with apparent triumph:

"'I saw the dead stand before God;' and mind you, they were dead when they stood there.' So said one man while covertly intimating that the wicked dead could never be raised. Amazing logic! Wonderful wisdom! The dead stood before God. Well, persons when they are dead do not stand till they are raised up; and the Greek word anastasis, translated resurrection, literally signifies a rising up, or standing up again. But again; it seems that the righteous and wicked stood before God. Now if the wicked could stand when they were dead and returned to dust, so could the righteous, and so there need be no resurrection of either.

"'But it says the dead stood before God.' Very well: so it says the dumb spake. Did he speak while he was dumb? It says the deaf heard. Did he hear while he was deaf? It says the blind saw? Did he see while he was blind? The man that was dumb spake when cured; the blind saw when healed; the lame leaped when healed; the deaf heard when cured; and on the same common-sense principle, the dead will 'stand' when raised."

1. This writer mistakes his opponent's position, by representing it as being that of a denier of the possibility of the revival of the wicked dead; whereas, it is a question of fact —"Will the wicked dead live again?" That God could make them alive we have never denied.

2. This critic has commented on "anastasis," as if that was the word used in the text Rev. xx. 12, and on. But such is not the fact.

3. He says—"Persons when they are dead do not stand till they are raised up." This remark is a mere truism. Let him try the question—Can the dead be said to stand before God without being made alive? If they can, his "logic" fails. That the dead can be "raised up," and speak "when they are dead," without being made alive, he must admit.

Let him read Isa. xiv. 4–23. At the overthrow of the king of Babylon, it is said—"Hell" (sheol, where the dead are) "stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth; it hath raised up from their thrones all the kings of the nations: all they shall speak and say unto thee," etc.

Here the dead are represented as raised up, and as speaking while in sheol: i, e., while they are dead and without life. If such is the declaration of the inspired prophet, what shall we think of the "wisdom" of the person who attempts, logically, to prove that the dead do not stand, unless they are made alive? We say, "made alive," because we have shown, by inspired authority, that they can be raised up, in some sense, without actual life; and if so, the objector's "logic" proves to be illogical, and an impeachment of the prophet Isaiah.

4. Again he says—"Now if the wicked could stand when they were dead and returned to the dust, so could the righteous, and so there need be no resuarection of either."

This is not "amazing logic." "There need be no resurrection of either" class in order to their being judged, or their character and doom being decided. But when the judgment decision is made, and the rejectors of God's offered mercy are doomed "not" to "see life," but to have "the wrath of God abide on them," (John iii. 36,) and the righteous are judged to life—to be made alive—is there then no "need" to "be a resurrection of either?"

5. The attempted illustration, in this effort, is as great a failure as the rest of the "logic." To disprove the fact asserted by the Revelator, that "the dead stood before God," the writer brings forward the expressions "the dumb spake—the dead heard—the blind saw," etc., and asks, if the dumb, deaf, and blind, spake, heard, and saw till they were cured? and he adds—"On the same common-sense principle the dead will stand when raised."

This illustration is a mere fallacy. If John had said, "I saw the dead" alive "before God," then there might be force in it. The antithesis of dumb, is speaking: so if one speaks he is not now dumb. So of the deaf; if he hears he is not now deaf, though previously so. But when it is said, "the dead stood," there is no such antithesis; because, alive, and not "stood" is the true antithesis of "dead." As we have seen from Isaiah, the dead may be "raised up," or stand, and yet have no life, or not be made alive.

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

"And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust."—Acts xxiv. 15.

Every thoughtful reader of ANNIHILATION NOT OF THE BIBLE, must wonder what could have induced the author to devote a number of pages of his book to this text. Did he suppose his work could fall into the hands of any one so ignorant as not to know that nothing can by any possibility whatever be found in the text that can be tortured into so much as the remotest intimation that the wicked will not all be literally destroyed? What object could a person, writing against the plain, unqualified testimony of inspiration, that "all the wicked will He" (God) "destroy," have in view in giving so much space to the text? It is difficult to imagine any good reason.

Does the author himself believe there will be a "resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust?" His theory prohibits it. Are we asked how that can be? "Who believes that corpses are men? They are only the remains of men." So says Mr. George, as we have before noticed. The body, then, is no part of the man proper, and cannot, as a matter of course, be either holy or unholy. The immaterial soul is the man, just or unjust, as the case may be, consequently neither the just nor the unjust can have a resurrection from the dead, for neither of them die, except what he calls a spiritual death, and if he admits the unjust are to have a future resurrection from such a state, he becomes involved in precisely what he severely denounces, viz., Universalism. Unless marvellously inconsistent, he must acknowledge that his theory precludes his believing what he affirms to be the assertion of Paul.

It is true that the text seems, at first glance, to be out of harmony with Paul's teachings generally, and to indicate the resurrection of the impenitent dead. As Mr. G. thinks it is a strong passage against the position that the righteous only will live again, we give it some attention. It will not be denied that upon the words of the dead, in the text, depends very much of the strength of what argument it is made to furnish in support of the theory of a resurrection of all mankind. Although the use of the definite article does not necessarily imply a reference to all the dead, as being subjects of the resurrection, it is nevertheless suggestive of the thought that they may all be meant.

If, however, Paul not only did not use the article, but also used neither of the words of the dead, then the language of the text cannot justly be thought to contain even an intimation that more than a part of the dead are referred to. Dr. Lange, together with the number of commentators by whom his Commentary is translated from the German, and edited, with additions, leave out the words in question. Other learned Bible students do the same. Dr. Alexander intimates that they should be left out of the text, and he does leave the article out of verses 7 and 8, of chap. xxvi., the first relating to Jesus, and the latter to "dead."

Did Paul's hope, as expressed in the text, in xxiii. 6, and in xxxvi. 7 embrace a resurrection of all the dead? They who hold that the text teaches a universal resurrection must contend that it did. Upon such an assumption, was Paul's assertion, xxiv. 15, that his Jewish accusers allowed his hope, a justifiable one? They who so maintain will be under the necessity of showing that the Jews who made accusation against Paul believed in the resurrection of all the dead. This they may find a somewhat difficult task, for is it not true that the Pharisees themselves denied any resurrection whatever to some, at least, of the Gentiles, and to the incorrigibly wicked of their own people? What says Dr. Adam Clarke on the question? Writing on John vi. 49, "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead," he says—"It was an opinion of the Jews themselves, that their fathers who perished in the wilderness, should never have a resurrection. Our Lord takes them on their own ground: Ye acknowledge that your fathers who fell in the wilderness, shall never have a resurrection; and yet they ate of the manna: therefore that manna is not the bread that preserves to everlasting life, according to your own concession."

It will at once be seen that if Paul hoped for a resurrection of all men, and the Jews did not believe all men would be raised from the dead, then they did not "allow" his hope. But if Paul, preaching, as he did, Jesus and the resurrection, believed in the re-living of those only who fell asleep in Christ, and the Jews held to a resurrection of two classes among their own people, viz., the just and unjust, then they did "allow" his hope. They could not otherwise be said to allow his hope unless, indeed, it be held that he believed just as they did as to who would be subjects of the resurrection, which by no means appears to have been the case. The whole weight of Paul's teachings is unquestionably of a different character. For example: "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. 11. Who can read this and many like sayings of Paul, and then suppose the apostle avowed before Felix that he believed in the resurrection of both just and unjust? The very thought is suggestive of absurdity. Do the ungodly have the Spirit of God dwelling in them? The question answers itself.

Dr. Alexander does not find in Acts xxiv. 15 any reference to a general resurrection. He says the character of the hope which Paul "still held in common with the unconverted Jews seems to be explained, in the last clause, as the hope of a general resurrection. But this was not held by the Sadducees, nor is it elsewhere represented as the great distinctive hope of Israel."

Says Mr. George, p. 40 of his book, "Paul hoped for the resurrection of the dead." If by the dead he means all the dead, then upon the authority of Dr. Lange, and other editors of the Commentary which bears his name; upon the authority of the American Bible Union, and also upon the authority of other Greek scholars we condemn the assertion as unfounded in fact, for they say the words the dead should not appear in the text. What Paul did hope for was a resurrection of dead (men). Mr. G., as we have seen, does not believe there are any dead men to have a resurrection. He differs very widely with Paul; but even if it were hard to decide which is right, we would feel quite justified in giving Paul's faith the preference, for that apostle certainly has a reputation for soundness of doctrine which Mr. G. has not just yet succeeded in establishing, nor is he likely to succeed while Paul and his doctrines are remembered, unless he concludes to make his faith conform to the teachings of Paul.

He takes up LIFE FROM THE DEAD, turns to p. 45, and reads: "If the apostle expected the wicked would be made alive again, he could hardly desire it. Could it be an object of desire to see all the wicked in one vast company, weeping, wailing, crying for mercy, and mercy deaf to all their sorrows, anguish and despair? Could he desire to listen to the curses and blasphemies, and witness the rolling sea of wickedness that would pour forth from these revived sinners and blasphemers of all sorts?" And how, dear reader, do you suppose this is met? What argument is brought against it? Why, having read, he casts aside the book, raises his hands, apparently, in holy horror, and exclaims, Universalist argument! Pray don't get immoderate, good neighbor; be tranquil. Is the argument any the less sound because Universalists have chosen to use it? Is their touch so vile that it contaminates and curses everything that is subjected to it? Truth is truth wherever found or by whoever held.

We are sorry to trouble Mr. G——, and it does seem to trouble him, but we must, in common with the author of LIFE FROM THE DEAD, urge the fact that Paul's hope was based on a promise; for he said, chap. xxvi, "I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers." Two things are undeniably true; first: the resurrection of the nnjust to a life of unutterable anguish could not possibly have been an object of hope with Paul; second: such a resurrection, or a resurrection of such a class to such a state could not be considered in any sense a promise, but must, if proclaimed at all, have been announced as a threat. But the fact is, no such thing is found in the law or the prophets, for a resurrection from the dead is uniformly spoken of as the privilege of a class.

Dr. Alexander remarks as follows concerning the last clause of verse 7, chap xxvi, "For which hope's sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews."

"Of (about, concerning) which hope I am accused (and that) by Jews (not the Jews), i. e., by men whose whole religion rests upon the very hope which they accuse me of maintaining. The hope described in this verse cannot be that of a general resurrection, which is only partially revealed in the Old Testament," (not revealed at all, Dr., if by "general resurrection" you mean a universal one), "and was not held by all the Jews at this time."

Of verse 8, he says.—

"The reference is plainly to the resurrection of Christ, as the crowning proof of his Messiahship, and thus the nexus between this verse and the one before it, which appeared to be abruptly broken, is completely re-established, as if he had said, they believe in a Messiah, so do I; but they expect him yet to come, while I believe that he is come already, not without grounds or on hearsay, but God has identified him by raising him from the dead; and surely this, if properly attested, cannot be thought by any devout Jew to be beyond his power.' Dead (not the dead) is in Greek a plural, and by some explained as a generic form relating to a single person; but it is rather an allusion to the general resurrection, of which Christ's was the pledge and the example."

We have quoted thus from Dr. Alexander to show, mainly, that, rigidly orthodox, so called, as he is, he does not find a universal resurrection taught in Acts xxiv. 15, and relative passages. "But" (raise dead) "is rather an allusion to the general resurrection, of which Christ's was the pledge and the example." We are pleased to have the Dr. thus plainly tell us what he means by "general resurrection." The terms embrace those of whose resurrection the resurrection of Christ was the pledge and the example. We thank the Dr. for so much frankness. Of course we must not for a moment entertain the thought that he can give any countenance whatever to the idea that the resurrection of Christ "was the pledge and the example" of the resurrection of the ungodly. Such a thought is too inconsistent to find place in his logical mind.

Says Mr. George, p. 43, Paul "is arraigned for heresy concerning the resurrection. He vindicates himself. His argument is this: "If I am a heretic, then my accusers are heretics; for I believe with them concerning the resurrection." We have already shown that the Jews did not believe in a universal resurrection, and if Paul did, as is asserted, how could he be said to believe with them? If he believed with them, pray tell us on what ground he was "called in question" by them? The very fact of his being called in question is proof that there was a point of difference between him and them. We are led to wonder what can be the limit of our author's capacity for error on this subject.

Paul preached a resurrection from the dead through Jesus. In doing this he preached the resurrection of Christ, and that as a pledge and sample of the resurrection of the faithful. When king Agrippa came to Cesarea, Festus stated Paul's case to him, and said that when Paul's "accusers stood up, they brought none accusation of such things as I supposed: but had certain questions against him of their own superstition, and of one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive." Here was just the point of contest. Paul preached a resurrection of dead (not the dead, remember) through Jesus. He might have preached a resurrection of dead men just as much as he liked, and they never would have troubled him about it had he not made that resurrection conditional, depending upon Christ and his resurrection, on the one hand, and faith in Christ as the promised Messiah, on the other. They had killed Jesus as an impostor, and they denied that he was raised from the dead. They wanted to kill Paul also for teaching the people that Christ had risen, and that as a pledge of the resurrection of somebody else.

"Of the hope," said Paul, at his examination before the chief captain, "and resurrection of dead I am called in question." Of what hope, and a resurrection of what dead was Paul called in question? Why, the resurrection of the dead Messiah, of course, and the hope of a resurrection of all whom Christ had promised to raise from the dead. And this was the promise that was "made of God unto the fathers."

The simple facts, then, are these: The Pharisees desired to put Paul "out of the way" because he preached the resurrection of Christ, and through him the resurrection of a class. In making complaint against him they were compelled, denying, as they did, that Jesus had been raised from the dead, to so put the charge as to involve the broad question of a resurrection. This Paul was quick to take advantage of by saying, substantially, to Felix, "I am accused by these Jews of preaching a resurrection of dead (Christ), and of cherishing and proclaiming a hope of a resurrection, yet future, of other dead. My hope themselves allow, for they too believe there will be a resurrection of dead, not only of just but also of unjust."

"The Greek, as well as the Hebrew, was written without points. The E. V. uses the word allow with a comma after it, and has a resurrection in the nominative case, whereas in the Gr., and in the Lat., resurrection is in the accusative: and so the E. V., by putting a resurrection in the nominative, was compelled to insert that there before its words shall be a resurrection. Now by inserting the true word expect, instead of allow, and putting no comma after expect, and striking out the E. V. word the before dead and before just, and putting which resurrection together, (they agreeing with each other in the accusative,) the E. V. verse, without filling the ellipsis, will read thus: And have hope toward God, which resurrection they themselves (the Pharisees) expect shall be of dead, both of just and unjust. And this plainly shows that there is an ellipsis after the words toward God. And by filling the ellipsis (as before) and taking out the comma and the improper words used in the E. V., the verse is perfectly plain: And have hope toward God, of a resurrection of dead, which resurrection they themselves expect shall be of dead, both of just and unjust."—Theology of the Bible.

Jesus warned the disciples, Matt. xvi. 6, saying: "Take heed, and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees." Did he not thus condemn the doctrine of both, showing that the Sadducees were wrong in saying there will be no resurrection; and that the Pharisees were wrong in saying the unjust will be raised? We think so. The reader will permit us, in recapitulation, to direct attention to some of the points which we have fully established.

First: Paul's Jewish accusers, while they held to a resurrection of two classes, just, and unjust, (the latter not embracing all the ungodly) of their own people, denied that certain others would have a resurrection.

Second: Paul's hope, therefore, could not have embraced all the dead, for had it done so he could not truly say that the Pharisees allowed his hope.

Third: Patrons of the universal resurrection theory—and this is true in an eminent degree of Mr. George, build their argument almost wholly, so far as relates to Acts xxiv. 15, upon the presence in the text of the words of the dead, an expression which, as we have abundantly shown from their own authorities, is not found in the original, the Greek, and should not appear in the E. V. text. It is significant that the oldest copies of the Syriac are without the words rendered both of the just and unjust. As they are not found in the older copies, the question very naturally arises, how came they in the later ones? If they were found in the earlier but were wanting in the later ones, we might justly conclude they had been accidentally omitted, but it is not so easy to explain the matter as it stands. While we call attention to the fact, we do not ask that it be regarded as favoring our exposition of the text, for the reader has, we think, already seen that to be just, consistent and Scriptural.

Few things, it seems to us, are plainer than that the use of the text in question to support the theory of a universal resurrection is subversive of principles of correct exegesis, is a perversion of palpable Scripture testimony, and is thus, of necessity, highly injurious to the interests of truth. THE GRACIOUS WARNING.

"My Spirit shall not always strive with man."—Gen. vi. 3.

THIS gracious warning of a long-suffering God, is not to be restricted to the antediluvians. The same merciful admonition was given to the unbelieving Jews, and is now applicable to impenitent Gentiles where ever God calls them.

There are two plainly revealed truths, demanding the special regard of a sinful world. One is, that our Father in heaven is "merciful and gracious, slow to anger, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin." The other is, that He "will by no means clear" the impenitent. Sinful and selfish man often cavils at the decrees of the infinitely wise and benevolent Ruler of the Universe. There is, however, no decree, or immutable purpose, more clearly revealed in the word of the Lord, than that announced by Jesus Christ, "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son and believeth on him, may have everlasting life." John vi. 40. There never was, or ever will be, a more sincere utterance of truth, on earth or in heaven, than the declaration of infinite love, "Whosoever will (may) take the water of life freely." Rev. xxii. 17.

What a spectacle of heavenly love and mercy, demanding the admiration of men and angels, was that, when "Jesus stood and cried, if any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." John vii. 37. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" Matt. xxiii. 26.

"O love divine, all love excelling!"

In addition to "the unspeakable gift" of his Son, our gracious Father has given his Holy Spirit, to reprove and convince the world of sin; John xvi. 8; especially of the great sin of unbelief: ver. 9. The Spirit of God enlightens, and awakens stupid men to a consciousness of their guilt, and danger of everlasting death. Among the sins charged against dying men in the holy word, is that of "resisting the Holy Ghost." Acts vii. 51.

This is a prevalent sin in the present day. The long-suffering of a gracious God, which should lead to repentance, is abused and the monitions of his Spirit resisted, until the dreadful mandate goes forth against the ungrateful sinner, he "is joined to his idols, let him alone."

Dear reader, how important is the question who of us are committing this sin of resisting the strivings of the Holy Spirit of God? Let us seriously ask, "Lord, is it I?" And the awakening influences of the Spirit are designed to convince the sinner of the duty of giving his whole heart to God, which the divine law requires, it is evident that every person resists the Holy Spirit so long as he withholds his heart from God. There is no substitute for this high duty. Neither pardon, or peace. or eternal life, can ever be attained without it. Like Simon we may believe and be baptized; like Demas we may join the Christian church, but so long as holy love is not the ruling principle of action—so long as we "mind earthly things" chiefly, our knowledge is vain, our faith is dead, our profession is a lie before the heart-searching God, and our "end is destruction." With all our specious morality, we are resisting the great appeal of the Spirit of God—"My son, give me thine heart."

Is not this, alas! the wretched state of many professors of religion? Have they not a name to live while they are spiritually dead? Have they not the form of godliness without its transforming power? Are they not the unhappy victims of idolatrous self-love, which is an insuperable barrier to the love of God and man in the human heart?

Search (us) O God, and know (our) hearts; try us and know (our) thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in (us) and lead us in the way everlasting."—Selected.

SEEING THE DEVIL.

LUTHER, in his day, said some things which may be characterized, not only as quaint, but as queer, and yet always, even in this most uncouth style, gave utterance to solid truth. "Every man has a devil in him as big as a cow," was one of this class of sayings. Notwithstanding this spice of the ridiculous, the truth that there is an evil side in men, so long as they are in their present very partially sanctified state, cannot be gainsaid.

It was Luther's suggestion, no doubt, which made old John Berridge say substantially the same thing. It is related of him (the "Christian at Work" says), "that he had a number of pictures of different ministers round his room, and a looking-glass in a frame to match. He would often take a friend into the room and say, 'That is Calvin,' 'That is John Bunyan;' and when he took him to the looking-glass, he would add, 'And that is the devil.' 'Why,' the friend would say, 'it is myself.' 'Ah!' said he, 'there is a devil in us all.'" John Berridge knew whereof he affirmed. Any man who looks into his own heart will find enough to convince him that there are uncrucified affections lingering there, like the remnants of the Canaanites, who haunted Mount Zion. He need not look at the envy, the pride, the passion, ill-nature and malice of his neighbor, in order to be persuaded of this; he can see the devil in them, no doubt, but, if he will look closely enough, he can find one nearer home.

To cast out this evil spirit is the life-contest which begins with the first believing look at the cross of Christ. The life of faith is a conflict which ends only with the death of this body of sin; and every believer who knows himself and the plague of his own heart, will cry often, even as Paul did, "O wretched man! O wretched man!"—Christian Intelligence.

FROM W. J. WARNER.

BR. STORRS: Could not there be some way to make arrangements to send ministers to the West to explain the Scripture (the much abused Scriptures) in their proper light? I listened to an orthodox preacher last Sabbath who tried to prove the immortality of the soul. It was the most miserable sermon I ever listened to. His text was "These shall go away into everlasting punishment;" and this was his strongest point. He then quoted John v. 28, "The hour is coming in the which all that are in their graves," etc. Then the balance, as he stated, was the book of Nature. Took this to prove what the Bible lacks. Now is not that adding to the Scriptures? and, as I understand it, "cursed is he that taketh from or addeth to."

FACTORYVILLE, CASS CO., NEB., April 13, 1871.

"Let every one who names the name of Christ depart from iniquity."

"EVERY good act," says Mohammed, "is charity." Your smiling in your brother's face is charity; an exhortation of your fellow men to virtuous deed is equal to alms-giving; your putting a wanderer on the right road is charity; your removing thorns and stones and other obstructions from the road is charity. A man's true wealth hereafter is the good he does to his fellow men. When he dies the people will say, "What property has he left behind him?" But the angels who examine him in the grave will ask, "What deeds hast thou sent before thee?"

A GENTLEMAN was one day asked by a friend how he kept himself from quarrels? He answered, "By letting the angry person have all the quarrel to himself."

"By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin: and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." This passage accounts for all the death that ever will occur in the world.

THE wish to think it justifiable to agree with, and adhere to, a party, is likely to bias a man's judgment, rather than to influence him contrary to his judgment.

NOTICE.

TO THE FAITHFUL, TENTED IN THE MISSOURI RIVER VALLEY: We invite you to attend a meeting on Saturday, before the 4th first day, in May, to remain together till Monday evening, at "Bethel," near Aspinwall, Neb.

Subjects of conference: 1st. Let each band, and each isolated brother report the probable amount they will spend for "sounding out the word of the Lord" this year. 2d. To examine any Bible subject.

Come one, come all. We are few. Let those who can, bring some food; those who can't, come any how.

LINES.

BY MARIA M. WEAVER.

TUNE: "Sweet by and by."

Tho' to dust this frail body may turn,
And in death I may yet sleeping lie,
There is life in the future for me
When the Saviour descends from on high.

Chorus:

In the sweet by and by
All our sorrows and cares will be o'er,
In the sweet by and by
We shall rest on a bright deathless shore.

Tho' through sickness and want I may pass,
And tho' lonely my earthly lot be,
There is health and rich treasures untold—
To possess in the future for me.

There are songs that no mortal has heard,
There are sights that no mortal can see.
There are pleasures and friends that are true,
And a home that's eternal for me.

Pilgrim, cheer thee, and trusting go on,
For not long shall thy pilgrimage be,
There is rest, there is life, there is peace,
And a home in the Kingdom for thee.

THE ONE THING NEEDFUL.

BY A. BOYNTON.

"Now it came to pass, as they went, that he entered into a certain village: and a certain woman named Martha received him into her house. And she had a sister, called Mary, which also sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his word. But Martha was cumbered about much serving, and came to him and said, Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? Bid her therefore that she help me. And Jesus answered, and said unto her, Martha, Martha, thou art careful, and troubled about many things; but one thing is needful, and Mary has chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her."—Luke x. 38-42.

FROM the history of our Saviour's visit to Martha's house, we learn the following facts: Martha had a load of unnecessary care; was burthened and over-anxious (like too many of our times) about appearances in the entertainment of company, and also in other things, cares of this vain life press heavily upon them. Our Saviour, as he was ever wont to do, used this opportunity to direct attention to the gospel plan; first, his mild rebuke to produce repentance, and then call attention to one point as of the utmost importance, a chief thing—Mary's choice: "that good part." The object of Christ's coming into the world he states as follows: "For the Son of man is come into the world to seek and to save that which is lost." To save men who were perishing, dying; that they might have life, and that more abundantly; even eternal life, was his mission work. To this work he went directly; the axe was laid at the root of the trees; his discourses went directly at the destruction of sin, and the immediate erection of a living temple of holiness; a habitation of God through the Spirit. To illustrate: you purpose a journey to the Pacific coast; in preparing for this, you find many things of importance to attend to, but amid all this multiplicity of care there is one thing as most essential which is not forgotten or neglected: the greenbacks. These are carefully counted, and safely secured; here, in a natural sense, is the one thing needful.

So in all efforts and enterprises, there is some one thing of paramount importance, which, if neglected, a failure is the result. This seems to be Christ's teaching in our text. Christ's object being to save men, ours should be the same. As he aimed directly at this object in his teachings, so should we. Most men feel themselves in a lost condition, yet have more or less conception or knowledge of just what this loss is in its several parts, or as a whole; yet they are sensible of this fact, an alienation, or want of affection, or love for God their Creator. They feel as did Adam when he sought to hide from God beneath the trees of the garden. GUILTY is blazoned on their foreheads, and shame is in their eye. The disease and the remedy. The first is the absence of God's favor: the last is its restoration; seen in type in Israel's sojourn in the wilderness; the glory of the Lord by pillar of cloud and fire over the tabernacle as a token of his presence and care; also, at the temple dedication by Solomon, this glory filled the house, and at their final rebellion this glory left the holy place, never to return.

The antitype of this is seen in the glorious gospel of God's dear Son. The acceptance of this gospel is not merely the acknowledging the person of Jesus as our Saviour, or of his doctrines as divine; neither does it consist wholly in an intelligent view, and fearless defence of those doctrines; but as the glass reflects faithfully the image of the beholder, so must our hearts (soul, seat, fountain of the affections, or love power) reflect the image of our God and Father, inwrought there by the Son; which is nothing less than the Holy Spirit, or Holy Ghost. Innocence is the favor of God, and the favor of God is the shekinal presence or glory shining in and illuminating our hearts; Christ (by his spirit) in you the hope of (future) glory. (For hope is expressed of things we have not, but yet look for, and expect). As the favor of God was man's first great loss, so God's friendship, love, and presence in our hearts is the one thing needful; first to be sought for, and ever to be cherished and regarded uppermost and foremost; not once, or for a little time; but through all time, under all circumstances, and as pre-eminently above all other things, which may or can interest us while here in the flesh and exposed to sin. Not but other things are of importance; for the truths of God are net-work, or a golden chain, all nicely joined together, so if we take away one link and follow carefully its connection, we find its end in God. However true and interesting this may be for many in their study of the Deity, yet in saving men from their sins, pulling them out of the fire, arresting them in the way of death, we are instructed from the word, and by the example of Jesus, to come directly to the disease, and at once apply the remedy. First, make the tree good (by grafting or otherwise); then will the fruit be good. If Christ first change the water into wine in the water-pots, all that is drawn out and served at the feast will be pronounced best.

The importance of this exhortation is two-fold: by attending to minor things first, there is great danger of becoming so lost amid a labyrinth of ideas and doctrines as never io reach the great door of entrance to the temple of God. To illustrate: you are sick; your physician orders sea-bathing as your only hope of life; you are far away in the mountains; how can you reach the healing waters? Two ways lead there; the spring which bubbles at your feet forms a rivulet which we follow to a larger, and on to a river, a lake, and on through other rivers and lakes, till at last its accumulated waters pour into the ocean's bosom.

Another way is by direct railroad communication; which with all its comforts and facilities will take a poor invalid to the place of his desire in a few hours time. Both these ways lead there, but a feeble patient would not be long in choosing which way to go; in fact, only one way would be at all safe; death would doubtless overtake very soon on the one path, while hope would inspire on the other. Sinner! by all means go the quickest route; get into Christ the great ark of safety, as soon as possible. The advantages of this latter course: plunging into the healing waters we get strength, are at once made whole; the disease is removed, broken up; the whole man is invigorated; then are we only prepared to trace upward, and outward, from this sea, this ocean of God's love, all those various streams which flow into it.

Or instead of seeking to regain health by inhaling dew-drops with the flowers, go plunge at once in ocean's healing wave; and like the poor man at Siloam, be made every whit whole. Seek not to catch the sparks as they fly from God's holy altar, with which to fill thy censor, to offer before him; but go, as Christ our great high priest has bid you; go directly to the altar, fill thy censor with its live coals, then shall thine offering be acceptable in his sight. It is no peculiar theoretical belief which brings us into, or keeps us in favor with God; it is oil in the vessel, (the Holy Spirit in the heart, or man) which gives the true shine, or light.

Now, little children, beloved in the Lord, be ye all of one mind (not intellectually, this cannot be expected), or disposition, being filled with the Spirit, and abounding therein more and more. This, and this only will keep out division and schism; this only will draw in, and add to the church of God daily of such as shall be saved. Sinner and saint hear! All else is as a rope of sand, a shadow on the wall, or a mirage on the sky; false lights which only allure to blind, deceive and destroy! O remember the "one thing needful;" grasp it, O sinner; hold fast to it all ye his people; it's the only life-boat which will ever reach the immortal shore! Secure a safe passage, and make the glorious harbor of Everlasting Life.

WEST BATAVIA, N. Y., April, 1871.

UNSCRIPTURAL PREMISES.

BY S. COOPER.

WHILE there are conflicting theories claiming a Scriptural basis; it can be only self-evident that some must be unscriptural, and yet in some cases it may not be easy to show clearly a Scriptural basis for either side where there is not a plain, "Thus saith the Lord" to the point.

There has a number of articles appeared in the "Crisis," based upon a theory which first appeared under the head of "The Adamic Penalty," which is, "that the race," Adam's posterity, die for his sin; consequently, all must be raised to life, and those (the wicked) whose sins are not forgiven, must die again for their own sin. Is it Scriptural that one shall die for the sin of another? What saith the word? "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son; the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him."—Ezek. xviii. 20. "Wherefore as by one man sin entered the world, and death by sin, so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."—Rom. v. 12.

It is nowhere written that, one shall die "for that" another has sinned. "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established." Thus we see that it is unscriptural to say, one shall die for the sins of another.

But if we admit "the race die" for Adam's sin, as it is claimed by some, we are led to inquire, first, Was that sin unatoned for? If it was, the law has not released its claim; it "knows no mercy." "The wages of sin is death," to which there is no limitation made manifest for sins unatoned, unforgiven. The penalty is unlimited; the law has an unyielding grasp, as justice has consigned them to its penalty; they are dead for sins unpardoned; it is impossible for them to obtain forgiveness, as in the law of atonement, which required the offending or sinful party to be an actor in the transaction. Therefore they, "the race," can never have a resurrection to life.

But on the other hand, if Adam's sin was atoned for, it was forgiven; and the law had no demand (for his sin) upon him or his posterity. Therefore, the race could not die for sins forgiven; justice forbids it, But those who die in sins unforgiven, for them there is no atonement, no redemption. The wicked dead will never live again. "The wrath of God abideth on them," whether they die for Adam's sin, or their own sins unpardoned, it matters not: there is no resurrection to life for them.

Can the objectors show these statements unscriptural? But it is asked, Do not Christians die, suffer the penalty of the law for sin as well as the wicked, if the wicked do not die the second time? I answer, Nay: for "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." "The Lord preserveth all them that love him." "The righteous are in everlasting remembrance." Are kept by the power of God: taken from evil to come: are blessed, resting from their labors: sleeping in Jesus, will awake and sing. They are the friends of God. Says Jesus, "I call you friends . . . ye are my friends," etc. They are sleeping, resting under the watchful, preserving care of God. They are not as rebels suffering penalty, but as precious jewels kept by their heavenly Father; sleeping (their life being hid with Christ in God) until the great coronation morning, when they will awake and come forth with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads.

No one, rightly considering the ills, trials and conflicting scenes of this life; the watchful care of God over his sleeping, believing ones, and their triumphant waking can pronounce that sleeping state a "penalty" or calamity.

But, alas, how different with the wicked! Without hope, and without God, they lie down in sorrow and despair beneath the wrath of God, without a cheering promise of their waking again.

WOODSTOCK VALLEY, CONN., April 10, 1871.

FROM ELD. SAMUEL L. WALTER.

BR. STORRS: I give thanks to our Father that he has blessed you with increasing health, and with a "single eye;" and I hope it will ever so abide, for then your "whole body shall be full of light." I pray God "to give you understanding according" to "his word," so that we may all be blessed with "The Truth," and the true import of God's "Promise and Oath to Abraham." "I will bless thee . . . I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven . . . and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," etc. Its glory shines from all of "God's promises" to his dear children. I pray that all of his children may have a single eye, and seek for truth; so that the prayer of the LIFE-GIVER may be answered, in our complete "sanctification" by God's "truth," which is his word. I read and enjoy the repast, the weekly return of the HERALD brings to me. As a whole, it is "marrow and fat things;" praise the Lord.

I have been out here about three months: (it is a hundred miles from my home). I am not here for gain. I have not as yet received as much as it cost me to come here. I believe they would do well for me if money was not so scarce. There are quite a number that want the HERALD, but can't pay for it now; but hope they will be able, if the season should be favorable.

You may ask, How do you and your wife get along? I would say, the Lord provides, by putting it into the hearts of some that have this world's goods to help us by a donation or giving me work to do. I have earned about twenty dollars. And I could get more work, had they the material. I thank God and take courage. We shall "want no good thing." I'll trust my Father's word. Amen.

I was through this section of country over a year ago, and scattered the precious truth that there is no life out of Christ our LIFE-GIVEN Lord. The seed sown has come up, and in every place the Lord has raised up those who are ready and able to stand up for God, and demonstrate that "God is Love." At Hickory Hill they were to discuss this question: "Will the wicked dead live again?" There came out three ministers and wise ones, ten miles, to defend their dogma, quite unexpected to the little ones there; but they were more than a match for them. At the close of the debate, one of the champions for the Godless immortal-soulism, said he would meet Br. S. J. Banson at any of the places that he named. Br. S. J. B. not being there, his brother told him Br. B. would meet him on Saturday one week, at 10 o'clock, A. M. So it was settled. He got word of the appointment, and we rode twenty miles by about 10 o'clock; but the champion did not come; he had only ten miles to ride. It rained on Friday very hard, so that women could not come out; but the men came out from the neighborhood and filled the house. After waiting an hour and a half, by a unanimous vote I was requested to preach. So I tried to present man's nature and destiny; and in the evening, by request, I spoke on the resurrection, and had a good hearing. We had another attack from a man that had more zeal than knowledge. He took issue on the judgment, resurrection of the wicked, and eternal punishment. I gave him our views of the teaching of God's word on these points, and asked him to give us his views. He rose and was somewhat dumbfounded, and did not think we were as bad as represented to be; but he had over a hundred texts at home to prove the re-living of the wicked, but gave none. I urged him to give us only one. He came forward, took my Testament to find the one text. He sought for some time in Rev. xxii. I saw where he was looking and said, I think you will find your text in chap. xx. He turned to it, and read the last part about "the dead standing before God," etc., and said that "death and hell" was the place of punishment; and also "the lake of fire," and there Adam was cast. I showed they were called "dead," not dead folks made alive, etc., and told him that his place of punishment was thrown into or swallowed up his place of punishment. He said, that if death was all the punishment, he would just as live die as live. I said, you have sunk below the beast, for they do not want to die, and were always on the lookout for fear evil should befall them. I admonished him to study his Bible and be always ready to give "a reason" for what he believes. Their zeal has abated. The champion has requested us to come to his town and preach for them on the life theme, and promises to take good care of us. I shall go, the Lord willing, on Saturday. So truth is gaining ground in this country.

The cause of truth is gaining in Jefferson county. I preached on the "inheritance," and showed that the "earth was the inheritance," and that "the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth," and "the wicked shall be consumed away into smoke," etc. The next evening Eld. F. Osbourn preached. (I was present). He said, "God could not recompense the righteous upon the earth, because the earth should be burned up, and that the earth shall fall and not rise again." In his zeal to take them to heaven, and to show that the earth was all burnt up, he burnt up his "heaven," and left it impossible for God to "recompense" them in either place, according to his hypothesis; forsooth, they cannot be recompensed anywhere. In order to show that Psa. xxxvii. 20: "Consume" did not mean extinction of life, he quoted Psa. lxix. 13: "Consume them in wrath; consume them, and let them know that God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth. Selah." "And at evening let them return; and let them make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city." The ghost of these sinners that are consumed into smoke come back as dogs, etc. This shows how hard run they are for proof of their theories. I had the privilege of reviewing his sermon at the same place to the same people; truth shows the brighter compared with such garbling of God's infallible word.

In Wayne county there is a good number strong in the faith. I have preached in eight different places in this county, to good congregations, and the word has taken root and is growing; and the cry is, Come and preach at my house or school-house. I can't go to them all. Some one ought to be in these parts all the time. Things look cheering all around. I had a request to go to Xenia. I did so on the third Saturday in March. I preached eight times. I had a good hearing in the Christian Church house. I can assure you that my time was well occupied in answering the questions asked on various topics. No life out of Christ, caused many to ask, what the various texts mean that are thought to prove the resurrection of the wicked; also, about first principles. These were caused by my presenting faith as the condition upon which man must be saved, or get life from the dead; and being "baptized by one Spirit into one body," "which is Christ:" and without being thus in him, there is no principle in man to give him life: we must have the "Spirit that raised Jesus from the dead," or we can't have "life, according to the law of the Spirit," etc.

I found the labor of the seven days I was with them, answering questions, an over-tax on my strength. There is such melody and sweetness when God's word is spoken in its purity, that it strikes a responsive cord in the heart of such as hear; and they think us greater men than we are. They do not see that it is not the speaker, but God's truth that is great.

One evening, after I closed my sermon on the resurrection, from Paul's account, some ladies thought the sermon was too good to be my own, and thought the New Testament, out of which I read copiously, must be some one's printed sermon, and came up, after service, and took up the precious legacy that our Father has left us; and, to their surprise, found it only the New Testament. All that comes from God is grand. No wonder his word is as marrow and fat things when unmixed with the traditions of men.

I went down into the business part of the town, and two church-members pounced on me in the presence of a justice. They made all of Revelation literal, I did the best I could to convince them of the truth; but they hung on to their fables, and I left. They, after I was gone, were glorifying. The squire told them they could not hold a light to me, and that he was glad that they got such a drubbing. Two days after, two ministers came into the shop. These men were talking about me to the ministers, and the squire told them that St. Paul had come from the dead and was preaching in town. Very soon Br. Lee, a preacher of their own town, came in, and one of the brethren present said, If you have St. Paul here, St. Peter, too. Br. Lee is a "soul-sleeper," and has been for many years, but a believer up to this time in the resurrection of the wicked. He has been a bold champion for Bible truth. He was not afraid of the best of them: he was outspoken in the Bible class. He told them the lesson did not teach the immortality of man, so they appointed the next Friday evening to debate the subject. When the time came for the debate, there was not one minister out of five that proposed to debate the subject, present. The Baptist minister said that he was not going to be abused by Lee, for he had the best of the argument from the Scriptures; and yet he holds to the blasphemous dogma of immortal-soulism. Br. Lee stands out of the churches; he will not be truncked by any of them; he can't see how there can be a church without some organism. He has been associated with what is called the Christian; and there are a good number with us in Xenia; and others can't see why the wicked are not to be raised. I shall go there again before I go home.

I think good will come out of the effort. May the Lord grant it for his name's sake. I think men are coming to their right mind, and realize that they ought to think for themselves, and not let self-interested men think for them, who have to think in a certain way, or they will lose their bread and butter; that is what they can't bear. O that the cry may be heard from the East and West, from the North and South, "What is Truth?"

Yours, in hope of life eternal.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

GOOD FOR EVIL.

"IF thine enemy hunger feed him, if he thirst give him drink, for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head." There was once a little boy whom we will call Charles, grievously offended by another boy who had secretly destroyed one of his valued playthings, so he commenced laying plans what he could do in revenge for the injury received—his sister becoming acquainted with the circumstance, suggested putting a few coals of fire upon his head—Charles seemed to think that would look funny to see his enemy jumping and shaking the coals of fire off his head, and wanted to know how he could do it. She replied, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him," etc. He thought that would be no punishment at all. She told him if he treated the boy who had done him the injury kindly, he would not only be ashamed but feel worse than if he went angry and with hard words. He wanted to know what kind of coals to put on. She told him the boy who had done the mischief was fond of reading and had but few books; to loan him some of his. So Charles thought to try this plan, and when he met him instead of looking angry and speaking of the injury, he talked to him pleasantly about reading. He said he had read through all his books. Charles offered to lend him some of his new ones. The boy was completely overcome; this coal burned him. He confessed he had done wrong and was very sorry. Said he hoped he would never again do any thing to offend him. When Charles returned he told his sister the coal did burn, and if ever he lived to be a man, he thought he would set up a coal yard, for he found the coals not only burned up the ill will of enemies, but made the user of them warm-hearted and comfortable.

So let us even if we think we are not so much in error ourselves, try with the hot coals of kindness to consume harsh and unchristian thoughts one of another.—Selected.

"DO NOT GIVE IT UP."

A GENTLEMAN travelling in the northern part of Ireland, heard the voices of children, and paused to listen.

Finding the sounds proceeded from a small building used as a school-house, he drew near; and as the door was open, he entered, and listened to the words the boys were spelling.

One little fellow stood apart, sad and dispirited.

"Why does that boy stand there?" asked the gentleman.

"Oh, he's good for nothing!" replied the teacher. "There is nothing in him. I can make nothing of him. He is the most stupid boy in school."

The gentleman was surprised at this answer. He saw that the teacher was so stern and rough that the younger and more timid boys were nearly crushed. He said a few kind words to them; then placing his hands upon the noble brow of the little fellow who stood apart, he said, "One of these days you may be a fine scholar. Do not give it up, but try, my boy, try."

The soul of the boy was roused. His dormant intellect awoke. A new purpose was formed. From that hour he became studious and ambitious to excel, and he did become a fine scholar, and the author of a well-known commentary on the Bible; a great and good man, beloved and honored. It was Dr. Adam Clarke.

The secret of the success is worth knowing: "Don't give up, but try, my boy, try!" —Selected.

A VERY BAD MEMORY.—Father: "Mary, my love, do you remember the text of this morning?" Mary: "No, pa, I never can remember the text, I've such a bad memory." Mother: "By the way, did you notice Susan Browne?" Mary: "Oh, yes, what a fright! She had on her last year's bonnet done up, a pea-green silk, a black lace mantilla, brown boots, an imitation honiton collar, a lava bracelet, her old ear-rings, and such a fan! O, my!" Mother: "Well, my dear, your memory certainly is bad."

A BIBLE VIEW OF HELL:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This valuable work is a real Scriptural compend of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE FUTURE LIFE.

NOT long since, I was at a prayer and conference meeting, where the great theme was heaven, but though some seemed to be enraptured, my soul was pained. Heaven's greatest and most desirable elements seemed to have been in a great measure lost sight of. A mere heaven of pleasure may suit a Mohammedan, or an unthinking Christian, but it is not the heaven for me. I want no heaven of which the "Lamb" is "not the light of it," the all and in all of it. Myriads of things may and ought to enter into our ideas of that holy place, but that is the great central one. We want to be like Christ, and to be with Him, and without both, we care not for your heaven.

In another meeting, the majority of those present being children, a Sunday School superintendent, said to them, in heaven the meetings will not break up. His intention was to add to the attractions of that world.

In something of a similar strain, we sometimes sing of that blissful world,

"Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbaths have no end."

Such remarks are frequently made; and the impression is given that future life is an absolute and unchanging state—an eternal Sabbath, with only Sabbatic exercises. But are not such ideas repulsive to the thinking, especially if they are young? I remember of having heard of a person, who remarked, that he could not see what pleasure there could be in sitting on clouds singing Psalms. Doubtless, the only reason why such thoughts do not more frequently rise in men's minds, is because they think so little. They do not stop to think what an unchanging state must be. Perhaps, to many a thinking, unregenerate heart, an unchanging, unsubstantial, merely Sabbatic heaven, is only a little more tolerable than the lake of fire. Were it not that they cannot remain in this present state, and they are taught to regard heaven as a city of refuge from hell, they would not desire it. In their minds heaven may be the less of two evils, between which they must choose. No doubt, to many minds, its safety is the most desirable thing they can see in it. That may be the great and only reason why they want to go there. To the restless, roving, curious, and love-of-change disposition of man, a do-nothing-but-sing-Psalms world is utterly intolerable. Idleness soon wearies and kills. The continuance of the same thing, no difference what it is, soon satiates, cloys, and wearies. We want change, and we must have it or enjoyment, pleasure, and happiness, are out of the question. We must have it, or we are tormented.

Change is essential to happiness. This is true of the renewed and of the unrenewed man. It is innate, and neither grace, death, nor the resurrection will eradicate it. It is God-implanted, and must forever remain in us. Like the other original, grand characteristics of our nature, it is eternal, as eternal as our existence. A world where there would be no change, would be no good place for us. It would be a world of misery—utterly unendurable.

I know of no place in the Bible which tells us of an unchanged, unchanging, mere Psalm-singing future life. Such a state is not adapted to our nature; and certainly such ideas of it had their origin outside of the Holy Book. They appear to be stereotyped, but they are only handed down by tradition. I verily believe that they had their origin in the old Ptolemaic Astronomy. Men sought to make their Bible and their theology harmonize with that system. Whatever might be true or false, they were assured that that system of Astronomy was according to sight, and therefore could not be false. Could they doubt what they saw? Ah, they had not learned that even sight is often deceptive. They were sure they saw everything outside of this world moving around it, while it was itself immovable. They saw no motion in the earth, they felt none, and could they doubt their senses? They were assured that, by the word of the Almighty, this solid world is immovably fixed—hanging on nothing. As it was regarded as madness to doubt their senses, therefore the Bible and Theology must bend to sight. Though that system has long since passed away, much of the Theology based upon it, has been stereotyped, and remains. With many it would be well-nigh as impious to doubt that old Ptolemaic Theology, as it would once have been to have doubted the old Astronomy. According to that Astronomy, there could be no solid world but this, therefore, Theology much teach the same. Nothing outside of this world must have substantiality. The abode of the Adorable One, and the home of the blessed, must have no more substantiality, if as much as a cloud. They would not deny the resurrection, but the conclusion was that the resurrection body must at least be unsubstantial as its future abode. A recent writer has advanced the idea, that the spiritual body may be more unsubstantial than light. If the resurrected man is to be such a being, the substantiality of a cloud is not needed for his future abode; and his employments must be as visionary and unreal as himself.

Others seem to have had the idea that heaven is something like an island in empty space—perhaps, a luminiferous ether island. Around it they have placed battlements to prevent the inhabitants from falling off. The idea appears to have been current, that if one should be cast over these battlements, down he goes. That Satan, for his rebellion, was cast over them, and spirit as he is, down he went. How wonderfully those battlements of heaven have added to the eloquence of sermons; and what poetic effect it has given them — rhapsodizing the visionary and unthinking. Like many other things, which are better poetry than theology, those battlements have well-nigh become the indispensables of some pulpits.

But the Bible speaks of no unsubstantial heaven—of no ether island surrounded with battlements. It informs us "the righteous shall inherit substance"—not visions—not sublimated etheralities. It tells us of no heaven, as a home for the righteous, less substantial than our present abode. The risen, glorified Son of God, whose body could be felt and handled, and therefore must have been substance, ascended as it was to heaven. A substantial body must have a substantial abode. The changed, etheralized or sublimated bodies of Enoch and Elijah, ascended to heaven. They must have required a substantial abode. The resurrected bodies of the Saints will have substantiality, for they will be like the risen, glorified body of the Son of God. Their abode must be as substantial as themselves. The risen, glorified Saints will also require change. Our God-given natures will only be perfected—not destroyed, nor eradicated. That which we have that is God implanted, is innocent, and only needs perfecting.

The desire of change is innate or God-given, and therefore is right, if kept within due bounds. Indeed, it is essential to our happiness. There can be no happiness without change; and I am assured, there will be none, there can be none hereafter without it. To the holy, there will be no eternal sameness—infinitely far from it. No holy one will be imprisoned within the battlements, where they can have no change, and no employments except those which are strictly Sabbatic. The home of the blessed will not be a kind of celestial prison. The holy exercises of the Sabbath are delightful, but for any of them to continue so, they must be changeful, and not incessantly the same thing. No difference what it is, how pleasant or even delightful, it at first may be, sameness wearies—sameness becomes intolerable. Confinement and sameness would destroy the bliss of heaven.

Our blessed Saviour has expressly said of those who are accounted worthy of the resurrection, that they shall be "equal to" and "as the angels." Matt. xxii. 30; Mark xii. 35; Luke xx. 46. Angels are not shut up to one world, nor confined to one set of employments. It is true, all their employments are holy. To them, no others would be delightful. Anything unholy would be unnatural, painful and intolerable to them. The same will be equally true of the redeemed. Sin will have lost all its deceitful charms. It will have ceased to please. It will be perfectly hateful.

But there may be endless variety, and no sin in that variety. So there may be endless change, and no sin, no decay, no dimness, no alloy, no unhappiness enter into any one of those changes. There may be endless change, and each change a progression. The employments may be even more varied than they are in this life—incomparably more so and yet God be glorified in each and every one of them, and man be perfectly happy in each of them.—Selected.

THE GLORIOUS APPEARING.*

BY SAMUEL H. GIESY, D. D.

"Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ."—Titus ii. 13.

THE relation of the second to the first advent of Christ, it is to be feared, is not generally apprehended or appreciated. The proof of this lies in the fact, that it has dropped out almost entirely from our ordinary pulpit instruction. Regarded as an event at a distant, or, at best, indefinite period in the future, it is no marvel that just that posture of mind, which our Lord himself gave as one of the signs of the last times, should have come to pass, and, as a necessary consequence, all earnest treatment of the subject have disappeared from that place of divine teaching, where the watchman especially should be on the qui vive, in wakeful and momentary expectancy. Said our Saviour, "When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?"—the very question indicating just such a disappearance from the mind, even of the church, and of the world generally, of faith in the grand event itself.

In this particular, there is a wide difference between the modern and apostolic way of looking at this solemn fact. With the apostles, there was a deep conviction of what may be called its imminence, its impending character. And hence the uniform way they maintained in writing about it.

Intervening time disappears with persons writing under the direct influence of inspiration; God's Spirit, as it were, overleaping and obliterating the necessary lapse of ages. We know how this actually was the case in the earlier prophetic utterances. Take the prophet Isaiah, who, because of the definiteness with which he speaks of the Messiah's coming in the flesh, has been called the Evangelical prophet, and yet he lived seven centuries before the predicted event actually transpired. Thus, not in the remote future, but in the present tense, we hear him say: "Unto us, a child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon His shoulder; and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." Under this prophet's deep conviction of the certainty and imminence of our Lord's first advent, all intermediate time is wiped out.

In like manner, under the force of inspiration, our Lord's second advent, though centuries were indeed to intervene, was yet viewed and written of as a near event. Nor were the apostles wrong in this. For an event, which may happen any year, any day, any hour, must be regarded, and ought to be treated as an immediate occurrence. Is it not so in regard to the matter of man's own death? It is equally so in regard to the momentous event now under consideration. And, therefore, taking the apostle's representation in its literal sense—"the Lord is at hand"—we do only act the part of prudent men, when ordering our life continually under this impression, and, in the several spheres wherein God has placed us, are found always both vigilant and diligent. It is St. Peter who thus earnestly exhorts: "Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless."

There is also another particular, wherein the modern differs widely from the uniform apostolic way of looking at our Lord's second advent. How generally, in the minds of Christians even, is it associated with feelings of dread. It is the one great event of terror in the future. Not so, however, in the minds of the apostles, and the early church. By them it was hailed, in the sorest trials, in threatened martyrdom, as the one great source of comfort, the one ground of surest consolation. And so in the text itself, you find it spoken of as the Christian's hope, aye, his blessed hope. "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." But intending to revert to this thought again, in its proper place, we ask your attention, as first in order and importance

To the personalness of the great event referred to in this passage, the reappearing of our blessed Lord.

To get rid of the personal return of Christ to earth, some have regarded this and kindred passages as teaching a provisional, others a providential, and others a spiritual manifestation. To refer it to the multipled and constantly extending provisions of God's rich grace, the preaching of the gospel, the wider circulation of the Bible, missionary conquests, and the spread of Christianity, is, any one ought to see, flying right in the face of this uniform representation, the visibility of Christ's presence in the ever-recurring mention made by the inspired writers of this coming. Says St. John, in his apocalyptic vision: "Behold He cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him."

Such other passages as these: "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come;" "Be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh," are taken as indicating that providential visitation—death—in the uncertainty of its precise date and circumstances awaiting all men. In this alone, however, the two events have something in common. Both alike are imminent, an event which any moment may happen. But after all, it is only in the way of accommodation, that these and such like passages can be used to press home the constant need of personal readiness for the day of death. However needful such warnings and the preparation involved, it must be admitted that the application of them to a subject not primarily intended, though in some particulars even fitting it, is an extremely unfair and dangerous way of dealing with Scripture. The sacred word in this way, becomes a nose of wax, just what this or that man chooses to make it. On examination, it will be found extremely doubtful whether death is ever referred to in Scriptnre as a coming of Christ. Even if that were the case, the two events are calculated to excite widely different feelings in the Christian mind. No one has expressed this difference more strongly than Baxter. He says: "Death appeareth to me as an enemy, and my nature doth abhor and fear it, but the thoughts of the coming of the Lord are most sweet and precious. Christ's servants can submit to death, but his coming they love and long for." How much these words of the author of that immortal book, "The Saint's Rest," sound like the customary way the apostles had of speaking of our Lord's coming. In full view of the scaffold and the axe, we hear the noble Paul exclaiming: "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day, and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing." And in another epistle he says: "For our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."

Nor does it come to the actual demands of the great truth involved in the case, to make the promised reappearance of Christ on earth to mean nothing more than a spiritual manifestation of His presence. It is not one and the same with Christ's coming to make His abiding presence in the cnurch, in the fulfilment of these precious words: "Lo, I am with you always even," &c. Nor is it one with the spirit's presence and power in the world, first signally displayed on the day of Pentecost. Nor is it one with the Spirit's efficaciousness in the sinner's call from darkness into gospel light and peace. It is not with the Spirit's mission, that this and kindred passages are concerned, but the coming again, in majesty and glory, of the person of the Son of God, who formerly had, in lowliness and rejection, walked the earth. Clearly enough the passage before us refers not to any provisional, or providential, or spiritual manifestation of Christ, but His actual return in personal form.

In this regard, the second is of a like character with the first advent—personal. All the prophecies of that gracious event for four thousand years, stretching onward from the Serpent-Bruiser of Eden to Isaiah's distincter "Prince of Peace," and Daniel's "Son of-Man," and St. John Baptist's "Coming One," were, as you all can readily call to mind of this personal character. Ah! the hopes and yearnings of the Jewish heart gathered, as every one must feel who will study the ancient Scriptures, around a person and not a spiritual abstraction — a divine manifestation merely. That ancient people of God looked and longed for One, who stood out before their faith as the Messiah—the "Sent of God," "the Anointed of the Lord." Things such as dreams are made of, would not have satisfied their longing, expectant heart: nothing short of Him whom Haggai boldly names "The desire of all nations."

What, in those dealings of God with the ancient world, came forward in representation and full expectation under a truly and strictly personal form, at length, in the incarnation of Christ, became such actually in wondrous reality. What have we here? "O earth, earth, earth hear the word of the Lord." "When the fulness of time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman." "The word," who St. John tells us, "was with God, in the beginning, and was God, was made flesh, and dwelt among us." O, this was the mystery, hid for ages, made known now to a waiting world. This was He of whom prophets had written, and for whom expectant centuries had looked—Jesus, the Son of God, the Christ.

The second advent must be alike personal in its form; not a providential coming of Christ, not a spiritual manifestation simply, but a visible reality. Nay, not this alone, but more, the return of the same identical being, put to death in the flesh, and taken up to glory. He must be the same who, in the "yesterday" of eternity, dwelt in the bosom of the Father: the same, who in this transitory "today" appeared in a suffering form—the same who now, in the great "forever," occupies a seat with co-equal power, on the throne of the Eternal.

We find this identity of person in the first and second advent entering clearly into Scripture. Thus on the mount of ascension, to the disciples and multitude in wonder and disconsolation following their Lord's retreating form, the angels declared: "This same Jesus who is taken from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." And so the Lord Jesus himself, in His parting words, plainly and comfortingly, said "I," "I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am. there ye may be also." St. Paul also says: "To wait for His Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus, who delivered us from the wrath to come."

HOW TO LEAD A SPIRITUAL LIFE.

How is the spiritual mind to be kept spiritual? Will a renewed heart "keep sweet" of itself? or will grace live within us without watching? Will spirituality grow without tillage of the heart-garden?

To these questions Christian experience says, No! Conversion brings a man into a new state—"all things have become new;" but yet there is a stiff undercurrent running toward the old state. No converted man, however thoroughly renewed by the Divine Spirit will stay converted unless God watch over him and he watch over himself. Conversion is simply the turning of the heart from sin to the Saviour; and, unless the heart holds fast to Christ and Christ hold fast to it, that heart will drop away into self-indulgence, pride, unbelief, and besetting sins. Paul would not have remained Paul for four-and-twenty hours if Divine power had not kept him. "Not I, but Christ that liveth in me." "I can do all things, through Christ which strengtheneth me."

What are the essential things to maintain spiritual-mindedness?

Prayer, of course, comes among the foremost. Not saying prayers; but praying. A dull, formal, monotonous repetition of devout phrases every night and morning puts the conscience to sleep, just as surely as a low crooning tune puts a baby to sleep, in a cradle. But genuine prayer is quite a different thing from that. It is the soul's keeping the track open, and maintaining a constant intercourse with God. Prayer is just as vital a thing to my heart as are the water-pipes in my house that connect with the Ridgewood reservoir. A double office belongs to the conduit-pipe of prayer; it serves at once as the inlet of grace, and as the outlet of gratitude. I thank God for what he gives; and I receive the gifts to be thankful for. And our prayers do not smell enough of the sweet holy fragrance of gratitude. For a sinner to be anywhere out of perdition is a matter for thanksgiving; but to be actually on the highway to heaven, with the love-light of Jesus' face streaming on us, is enough to make one's "feet to be like hind's feet," and to set us leaping like the roe. "In everything give thanks."

Prayer, then, is the channel for gratitude and penitence to flow God-ward; the channel for grace and strength to flow from Him into our dry hearts. When the channel gets clogged up with doubts and unbelief, or gets frozen up with selfishness and indifference, the supplies stop, and death begins. Just as soon attempt to keep up a blooming and fruit-bearing piety without perpetual prayer, as to set your geraniums into full flower by locking them in a Greenwood vault.

I have always observed that backslidings begin with a neglect of prayer. "Why don't the water run in my house to-day?" I send for the plumber; and he says to me: "Friend, the connection is broken." Woe to that professing Christian who has broken his connection with his God!

I sometimes think of prayer as a celestial telegram. Our messages go upward with the speed of thought. The return of mercies flow downward with the promptness of Divine love. Sometimes the answer anticipates the request. Sometimes the answer is delayed; then we can only wait. Sometimes it comes in a startling shock—like a death-messenger over the wires. But it is all right; God makes no mistakes. Faith says, "I put myself in connection with the God of love, I must take just what his wisdom sends. Thy will be done!"

Ah! there is something far worse than to receive dispensations of trial from yonder Father of lights. It is to have the telegraph of prayer so utterly out of repair by disuse, or so broken down, that all communication stops, and the soul is cut off from heaven. But a healthy Christian's spiritual telegraph is ever busy; it worketh by the electricity of love. Up into the All-hearing ear floweth the constant stream of confession, penitence, desire, gratitude and petition; and downward cometh the "grace sufficient," the strength equal to the day, the joys in the Holy Ghost. Then, brother, pray without ceasing. A true child of grace was never born dumb.

The second essential to spirituality is watchfulness. "What I say unto you, I say unto all—watch!" Christ knew perfectly well to whom he was talking. In coupling together prayer and self-watching, he married the sovereignty of God to the Christian's free agency. Never yet have we seen the heart that could be trusted without oversight. It must be a close, weary, wakeful watch. If you were set to keep a bird sitting unfastened on the palm of your hand, you would know what is meant by keeping your heart with all diligence. Have the arm of godly resolution ready—ready to seize it the moment it attempts to fly away into sinful indulgence. Do not take off your eye one instant. The price of a spiritual life is "eternal vigilance." The lusts of the flesh will steal silent marches on us; temper will start up like an unchained mastiff, and bite before we are aware; the unruly tongue gets loose; pride gets the reins, or some other besetting sin is on the move. "Therefore, I say unto you all, Watch." Watch the sly approaches of the tempter. Watch the thought-cradles in your own soul wherein the infant purposes are nursed. Watch over your own resolutions. Watch the leading of God. Watch for opportunities to do good. Watch for the coming of your Master. While the Martha of your industry and your benevolence is busy within, let the Mary of your devout vigilance be ever on the lookout for the coming of your Lord. Blessed are those servants whom, when the Master cometh he shall find watching!

"Beyond the watching and the weeping,
Beyond the waking and the sleeping,
Beyond the sowing and the reaping,
We shall be soon.
Love—rest—and home,
Sweet home!
Lord! tarry not, but come!"

A LIFE OF TRUST.

FEW Christian men there are who have not encountered trying seasons and circumstances in life, which, for the time being, have taught them the nature of trust, and led them to exercise it in a marked and high degree. They have called upon God in the day of trouble, with an humble faith which they never knew before. But if their trouble has passed away, their peculiar sense of dependence has gone with it. If day after day passes by, unmarked by any unusual trial, it is unmarked alike by any unusual conscious exercise of trust. Christians can exercise simple, unconditional trust; they can commit themselves unreservedly to God, and realize that their all is in his hands occasionally—when, as we might say, they are compelled to do it; but to live a life of trust in a living present God, is, apparently, a rare and difficult attainment.

Or, if some attain it in regard to spiritual matters, there still remains a difficulty in extending it to temporals. We may be able to realize every day, in regard to our spiritual interests, that it is not we that live, but Christ that liveth in us; we may have grace given us every day to triumph over the ancient enemy, legality, but to exclude boasting as to our salvation and growth in grace, when we can realize no similar dependence on God for our daily bread, for the support of our families, or for our success in life. Even in much of our labor for the kingdom of God, especially for the secular side of it, we may walk very much by sight, and not by faith, depending upon effort more than upon fervent prayer, losing heart or growing unduly elated by the fluctuating tokens which meet us from without, rather than strengthening ourselves in calm communion with and dependence upon our God.

Men have been discouraged from a practical carrying out of the principle of trust into their daily lives, and their efforts for the cause of Christ, from the fear of running into the opposite evils of presumption and fanaticism. To take the promises of Scripture in reference to the hearing and answering of prayer, with any great literalness, has seemed to them contrary to the dictates of common prudence and common sense. Hence there has grown up in connection with the Lord's work, all the complicated machinery of expedients for procuring the needful means, which the world employs, in carrying forward its objects. And we begin to believe that both in regard to the temporal wants of the Christian, and the means needful for carrying on the work of the Lord in the world, Christian people have espoused to a criminal degree the principles and policy of worldly wisdom. They have shrunk from an excess of pietism, and have become entangled in naturalism. The Christian world of to-day, carried away with the active spirit of the age, is in danger of trusting in work, instead of working by trust.

Nevertheless, the church has not been without bright examples of the life of trust. They have been found in the humble and private walks of life; in unknown instances of the hopeful endurance of poverty, in which the necessary wants of the believer and his family have been supplied in answer to prayer, and in the patient, happy temper of the confirmed invalid, and the life-long sufferer, where unwavering, submissive trust, has converted their sick chambers into the banqueting house of the King, with the banner of his love spread over them, and all who drew near them, in the same spirit.—Selected.

A NEW YORK telegraph dispatch announces the death of Mr.—— "senior member of the oldest liquor house in America." What an epitaph! He may have been a rich man, and a perfect gentleman, a kind husband and father; but what mathematician can estimate the untold amount of unhappiness. sorrow, distress, wretchedness, woe, misery, and disaster that has been distributed to all parts of the land by that "oldest liquor house."

Extracts from Plato's Phaedo.

BY F. W. BURBANK.

"Do we imagine death to be anything?" "Something surely," rejoined Simmias.

"Whether is it anything else than the separation of the soul from the body? And is this death, the body being apart by itself, disunited from the soul, and the soul disunited from the body, existing apart by itself? Is death anything bnt this?" "Nothing else than this," he replied. . .

Cebes rejoined, "All else that you have said, Socrates, appears to me to be advanced with reason, but those observations upon the soul, meet amongst mankind with the strongest disbelief, being afraid (as they are) lest, on its departure from the body, it should no longer exist, but should perish, and be annihilated upon the same day on which a man dies; and being dispersed immediately on its separation and egress from the body, like a breath or smoke, it should vanish, and have no further being." . . .

"Does the case then stand thus between us, Simmias? If those things which we are constantly speaking of really exist, the beautiful, the good, and every essence of a similar kind, and to such we refer all those objects that come under the senses, being aware that these essences had a previous existence and were our own, and with them compare these objects, it follows of necessity that as these exist, so our souls also exist before we are born." . . .

"Therefore, on the approach of death to man, that which is mortal of him dies, as it appears, but that which is immortal departs safe and incorrupt, having withdrawn from death." . . .

"But they are involved, as is natural, in similar dispositions to those which they may have indulged in during their former life."

"What kind of dispositions do you mean, Socrates?"

"That those, for instance, who have been devoted to the exercise of gluttony, insolence and intemperance, and who have taken no thought to check them, should be clothed with the form of asses, and such like beasts, is natural enough; do you not think so?"

"You say what is highly probable indeed."

"But that those who have set the highest price upon injustice, tyranny, and violence, should be clothed in the form of wolves, hawks, and kites. Into what shape else can we say that such should merge?"

"Without question, into such shapes as these," said Cebes.

"Is it then evident in all other instances whither each soul departs according to the similarity of its practices?"

"It is evident," he replied; "how should it not?"

"Are not those, therefore," said he, "the happiest amongst this class, and do they not proceed into the happiest region, who have practiced those popular and social virtues which they call moderation and justice, which result from habit and exercise independently of philosophy and reflection?"

"In what respect are these the happiest?"

"Because it is probable that they shall transmigrate into a like social and civilized class; of bees, perhaps, or wasps, or ants, or even back again into the same human species, and upright characters shall be produced from them."

"Probably so." . . .

"With difficulty, indeed, could I persuade other men that I do not regard my present condition as a calamity, when I am unable to convince even you; but you are apprehensive lest I should be more morosely disposed now than during the former portion of my life. It seems, too, that I appear to you inferior, in the art of divination, to the swans, who when they perceive that they must die, though given to song before, then sing the most of all, delighted at the prospect of their departure to the deity whose ministers they are. . . But I believe myself to be a fellow-servant of the swans, and consecrated to the same divinity; . . nor am I departing life with less good grace than they. . . ."

Remarks.

These extracts are given from Stanford's translation of Plato's Phædo. It is the record of a dialogue between Socrates and his friends just prior to his death. Plato held with Socrates the pre-existence and transmigration of souls. According to Stanton, Plato held that after purification by transmigration the soul was again re-absorbed into the divine essence; for he claimed that the soul is an emanation of the Divinity. So says concerning Socrates—"His doctrine of death's being no affliction, but, on the contrary, a passage to a happier life, made considerable progress. Some philosophers gave such lively demonstrations of it in their lectures, that the greatest part of their disciples laid violent hands on themselves in order to overtake that happier life."

The arguments of the divines (?) of this day, are but a repetition of the exploded arguments of the old heathen philosophers in favor of inherent immortality. We have every reason to thank Him who has brought Life and Immortality to light through the Gospel, and to seek for them by a patient continuance in well-doing.

Yours, in hope.

THE fullest conviction of the truth of the cause in which we may be engaged, is no security against our sliding into falsehood; unless we are sedulous in forming and cherishing a habit of loving, and renouncing, and strictly adhearing to, truth.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, MAY 3, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

Is the Identity Lost in Death?

A FRIEND writes us, "I heard a sermon on the immortality of the soul, in which the preacher dwelt some time on the point, 'If man died as a whole, then their identity would be lost:—therefore the dead would have to be recreated.' He asks, if we cannot give a condensed note of our views on that point."

We can. Such preachers "do err not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God." If David could say, "I am fearfully and wonderfully made." . . "Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect: and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them, Psa. 139: 14-16, surely, a Christian may say, 'Though man died as a whole, his identity would not "be lost": his identity is just as safe and secure in God's hands after he is dead—if He pleases to preserve it—as before he came into life at first. Calling it a "recreation" does not frighten us; nor does the cry of "absurd" or "impossible"; for we have learned "what God has promised He is able also to perform"; and He needs no scholastic dabblers, with their inventions of worldly wisdom, to help Him bring "again into existence" (Septuagint of Job 14: 14) those who "shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, even the resurrection from the dead." Lk. 20: 35. It is really sickening to hear men, who profess to believe God is infinite in wisdom and power, talk as if they knew what He cannot do! They seem to think they must help Him out of difficulty, by furnishing a soul, of some sort, that does not or cannot die; so that infinite knowledge and power need not be overtasked to preserve the "identity of the dead! Alas! by worldly wisdom men never did and never will find out God. God has pledged Himself to raise "the dead in Christ," and that is enough. If they were not "dead as a whole," then "as a whole" they need no resurrection, and cannot have one. The identity of the righteous is that of members of Christ's body; and their life is hid in Him, and when Christ, who is their life, shall appear, then shall they also appear with Him in glory. See Col. 3: 3, 4.

For what are we Answerable?

WE are answerable for nothing but what is in our power. We are answerable for our own conduct, because we have power to control and govern it; but we are not answerable for the conduct of others, because we have not power to control and regulate them. They may do evil when we have done for them all in our power. We have the power to instruct people, but have not power to make them learn. We have power to entreat and urge them to do good, but cannot compel them to be good. We have the power to set them a good example, but cannot compel them to follow it. Goodness must be the result of their own free choice, and no one can make men good against their choice or without their choice. If men will not choose to be good, no one can make them so.

The best we can do towards making others good, is to be as good as possible ourselves. In seeking after perfection of knowledge and virtue, we both secure our own felicity, and do the best in our power towards promoting the conversion and salvation of others.

Some seem to think we are in danger, if we follow truth without reserve, of getting so far forward, that others will be unable to follow us: and they accordingly advise us and entreat us to move slowly in our pursuit of truth, and to be more moderate in our discoveries. But are none to deal out strong meat? Are all to occupy themselves in serving out milk, and must they serve out milk forever? No such thing. Let every one deal out to the large family of faith, all that the great Father may deal out to him. Then let the babes take their milk, and let the men take their stronger food, and let each one have his portion of meat in due season. It is foolish to think of putting off the declaration of the whole truth till people are fit for it. There is nothing can fit people for the reception of truth, but the truth itself. Men will always object to some truths, however long we may delay their declaration. Men will never be prepared to hear us declare the whole truth, however long we wait. If we tarry till men are willing we shall never declare to them the truth at all. We must take them as they are, and if we cannot cure them by the truth, we must kill them by it; if their intolerance and pride will not let the truth prove to them the savor of life unto life, we must allow it, however painful the thought may be, to prove to them the savor of death unto death.

We are getting more and more out of love with the system of worldly expediency than ever. We think the best wisdom of the Christian is to tell all he knows, and to let God attend to the results. We feel inclined to give to others what God may give to us; men and sects may dislike to hear it; but we shall speak as we believe God has taught us. It is time to hew down the idolatry of man worship and throw it into the fire; it is time to grapple with the monster fairly, and either kill or be killed. We would not act rashly; would use no harsh expressions; would use no violence: but we would do homage and truth; would speak plain out; would let truth out of her dungeon, and allow her to go forth unshackled and free; we would empty our heart, and not spare till we had filled the whole world with light.

Truth and Error.

ERROR is mortal; but truth lives forever. While error lives, it lives on sufferance only; but truth lives of itself: it is incapable of death. Error is at every one's mercy; but all the powers in the universe cannot destroy truth. Error lives by concealment chiefly: if it be tracked and discovered, it dies. Truth can live every where: it can bear the fullest exposure; and the brighter and fuller the light falls on it, the more sprightly and vigorous it becomes. Many errors live in consequence of having taken the names of truth, and clothed themselves with some of truth's garments: but when truth resumes her names, and claims again her garments, error will perish. And truth will be doing so by and by. She is beginning to look round her, and to make known her claims. She has lived much in retirement in days past, and has been too modest in her pretensions; but she is coming forth to the light,—she is presenting herself more openly, and waxing bolder in her claims. She is blessed with a more numerous offspring also than heretofore, and many of her children seem resolved their venerable parent shall have her rights. They are resolved that error shall be stripped of her stolen garments, and deprived of her stolen names, and presented to the world in her own unsightly nakedness; and that if she cannot live on her own means, she shall not live at all. They are resolved that she shall be tracked to her last hiding place, forced from her last disguises, and that truth alone, whose right it is, shall live, and reign, and flourish, through all the dwellings of mankind.

No Excuse for Sin.

CHRIST taught that we should give up everything, even to the most useful members of our body, rather than allow ourselves to be driven into sin. "And if thy right eye cause thee to offend, pluck it out and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. And if thy right hand cause thee to offend, cut it off, and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell,"—gehenna—be utterly destroyed.

This comes very close. But anything is better than sin. Sin is our eternal ruin. Some people seem to think, that if they cannot avoid sin without giving up their trades or callings, and sacrificing their incomes, their sin is excusable. Christ teaches that sin, known sin, is never excusable; and that he who will not sacrifice both his calling, his income, his health, and his life, rather than transgress Christ's precepts, will die the death. This is a serious doctrine for people who are following trades which are injurious to their fellow-men, or who are under employers that require them to do things that are contrary to the gospel. It is, in fact, a serious doctrine for all. We cannot alter Christ's words, so that if we are living in any known sin, however needful the sin may seem to be to our worldly interests, we must alter our conduct, or die the death. Sin is lack of harmony with God. None such can live with God.

Is There a New Luther in Europe?

IN a recent debate in the German Parliament, Baron Von Stauffenberg, speaking for Bavaria, and alluding to the political complications which had resulted from the two ecumenical decrees of July, 1870 (one of the universal power and the other of the divine infallibility of the pope), said: "In the Bavarian constitution, we distinguish between purely religious and purely secular concerns. The dissension in the Catholic Church is daily increasing. We stand at the beginning of a movement which will become as world-renowned as the reformation. Though the right man has not yet made his appearance we are sure that Providence will send him at the right moment. Ere long we may hear the question raised, 'Which is the true Catholic church?' I do not say this to offend any one, but it is one of those things which must be said. You will sooner find the square of the circle than reconcile the papal pretensions with that religious liberty you affect to ask for. Let all creeds be as free as they are are in America." The significance of the Baron's utterance lies in the fact that he is not a Protestant, but a Catholic.

As soon as the project of the Ecumenical Council was mooted by the Jesuits, it was resolutely met and logically opposed by many of the ablest Roman Catholic scholars, professors, and prelates in Europe—eminent (we might almost say preeminent) among whom was Dr. Dollinger, dean of the chapter of Vienna;—a man well advanced in years, and who, for a whole generation or more, has been a learned authority as a historian and theologian in the Roman Catholic communion. His own Archbishop joined him in the original protest against the proposed dogma of infallibility. Moreover, Archbishop Dupanloup in France was a strong coadjutor in the same preliminary opposition. But the Jesuits were determined on a victory. The decree of infallibility must be passed. The programme of the ecclesiastical manipulators must be carried out. The future statesmanship of the Church must be directed from within, and not from without, the Jesuit lines. The pope was old; his successor must be soon chosen; the Jesuit party would be strong enough to elect their own candidate against all opposition; the time was ripe to invest the future pope, whoever he shall be, with an authority to legislate for the whole Church without the aid of any further ecumenical or other councils; and accordingly, as a means of securing to themselves the unrestrained future administration of the Roman Catholic Church throughout the world, the Jesuit party called the great council of July last, and made it declare, in defiance of human reason, that the pope's mind is infallible, and the pope's power universal.

So many eminent Romanists had protested against these decrees in advance, that as soon as the dogmas were fulminated, the position of these objectors became peculiarly interesting. Would they submit or rebel? Some of them submitted—like the Archbishop of Munich, who had originally joined Dr. Dollinger; and like Archbishop Dupanloup in France, from whom his many protestant admirers expected a manlier course. Others refused to stultify themselves, and, with Dr. Dollinger at their head, have now protested with "a voice heard round the world." We say Dr. Dollinger is at their head, because this position is accorded to him by the Archbishop who, a little while ago, acted with, and now acts against, this eminent Romish protestant. The Archbishop, in putting his friend and former co-adjutor "out of the pale of the church," speaks of him as "the spiritual head of the whole movement against the Ecumenical Council." This is a sufficient acknowledgement of the importance of the man against whom the church has let fly the arrow of excommunication. Moreover, the Archbishop, who knows the greatness of the man, understands also the greatness of the movement; for the pastoral letter goes on to say, "The open opposition of a man whoh as hitherto deservedly filled high positions in church and state, has given the matter the aspect of a formal revolt against the Roman Catholic Church."

Dr. Dollinger, at the head of this revolt, sustained, as he is, not only by forty-four out of sixty-two professors in the Munich University, but encouraged by a large minority of thoughtful and influential Catholics throughout Europe, confirms Baron Van Stauffenberg in saying: "We stand at the beginning of a movement which will become as world-renowned as the reformation." Perhaps also the excommunicated professor may make such a use of his abilities, his position, and his opportunity, as to fulfil the Baron's expectation that Providence would send the right man at the right moment," and that the man for the emergency may prove to be Dr. Dollinger himself.

It cannot be denied that Dr. Dollinger's opportunity is as great as Martin Luther's. Is he equal to it? The question is, whether in addition to being a man of books, he can be also a man of action. Scholarship is one thing; iconoclasm is another. A man's thoughts may go freely forward to the very vanguard of reform; but his laggard action may linger far behind. It takes nerve, audacity, prescience, and genius to head a great moral movement. It may be, as the Bavarian Baron fears, that the right man has not yet appeared—the man, we mean, who shall rend asunder the Catholic Church. Certain it is that this Church must be dashed and broken. A new protestantism is to spring out of the existing Romanism. Whoever may be the chief of the Roman Catholic reformers, we hail their new reformation. In advance, we salute the coming Luther of the Nineteenth Century. Perhaps, when the greater man appears, his Melancthon will be Dr. Dollinger.

The above is taken from "The Golden Age," a new paper recently started in this city by Theodore Tilton; who is editor and publisher. The paper is a large quarto of eight pages. It is both secular and religious in its character, professedly unsectarian in religion. Terms $3 in advance.

The article we copy above is one of interest. We can assure our friend Tilton "the right man has not yet appeared, that shall rend asunder the Catholic Church." We agree with him, that, "Certain it is, this Church must be dashed and broken:" but the work will wait till "the right man" appears; and if friend Tilton can receive the saying, he will find the person in "the man Christ Jesus." "The man of sin" (the Romish power, called, "that wicked") is to be "consumed with the Spirit of the Lord's mouth, and shall be destroyed with the brightness of his coming." 2 Thess. i. 8. Then "the right man" will appear, and a corrupt "Protestantism" will share in the plagues that fall on the "Mother of harlots;" for it has imitated her abominations in its teaching of many of her corrupt and blasphemous doctrines, whereby the "name" of God has been "continually blasphemed," In fact Protestantism, to an alarming extent, has patterned after Romanism, and has placed "the traditions of men" above the oracles of God. But every corrupt system of religion is doomed to fall before "the coming man,"Christ Jesus. Till the appearing and personal advent of the "same Jesus," who was "taken up into heaven, shall so come as He was seen" to go into heaven, "evil men and seducers shall wax worse. and worse deceiving and being deceived." 2 Tim. iii. 13.

Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

"And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise."—Luke xxiii. 42, 43.

IN order to an intelligent examination of these texts, it will be necessary to first consider the term paradise, and see whether the current theory, that the word is used in the New Testament to denote the intermediate state of the saints, has any foundation in fact, or whether it is an assumption merely, having no better object for its adoption than the meeting of an emergency.

Our Rev. author, adopting the popular notion, affirms: "Paradise is a place of happiness in hades."—P. 117. He asserts that the soul of Christ went there. He further says of this place, that "it may be called heaven." —P. 190. That it is an easier matter to make assertions than to support them by facts or sound logic the above-quoted remarks indicate. We will see whether such an affirmation concerning paradise is justifiable.

The term paradise, Heb., pardes, Gr., paradisos, signifies, literally, a garden or pleasure-ground planted with trees, flowers, etc. Dr. Adam Clarke, in his notes on Gen. ii. 8, states that Wilmet supposes it to be a Persian word; and the Dr. says, "in Arabic and Persian it signifies a garden, a vineyard." The Septuagint render Gen. ii. 8, thus, "God planted a paradise in Eden." Dr. Albert Barnes says, paradise is a word of Persian origin, and means a garden, particularly a garden of pleasure, filled with trees, shrubs, fountains and flowers. Dr. Owen remarks:

"The word is a strictly Oriental one, signifying a park or pleasure-ground. The word is used by the lxx. for the garden of Eden. Whether it is of Arabic or Sanscrit origin, is uncertain, and immaterial to the present point. It is sufficient that it was a word in universal use among the Eastern nations to denote beautiful gardens, pleasure-grounds, parks, etc. . . . As the paradise in Eden, the primeval place of beauty and happiness had been closed to the human family after the apostacy, our Lord seems to have selected this term as expressive of the fact, that a higher and more blessed paradise was now to be opened to the race; that the paradise lost was now to be regained, and rendered accessible to all, who by faith would so unite themselves to the second Adam, as to entitle them to be with him in blessedness and glory."

Whatever the origin of the word, it is certain that it was extensively used by various nations in the East. Xenophon calls the parks and hunting-grounds of the Persian monarchs and nobles, paradises.

Just such a garden, a paradise was created by God in the beginning, and given to man, conditionally, as his abode. It was a sample of the condition to which the whole earth would in process of time have been brought by Adam and his posterity had man by obedience developed a character in harmony with God. "And God blessed them" (Adam and Eve) "and God said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth."—Gen. i. 28.

To a race enjoying Edenic advantages, the whole work of subduing the earth and making it like the pattern furnished by the Creator would have been easy, delightful and glorious. By disobedience, however, sin entered, and the curse fell upon man, and upon the ground for his sake. Unto Adam God said, "Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life: thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee. . . . In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground. . . . Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden" (paradise) "of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken."—Gen. iii. 17, 18, 19, 23. Thus it is seen that when, after the fall, the curse was pronounced, the paradise of Eden ceased to be. As it was a pattern or sample of the perfection to which the race would, had not sin entered the world, have brought the earth, so may it still be regarded as the type of what the earth will be, as the inheritance of that spiritual race whose head is Christ, the second Adam.

Since the fall, there has been no such paradise in existence, because the curse has not been removed. The two cannot exist together. When there was a paradise, as an inheritance of sinless beings, on the earth, there was no curse; but when, in consequence of disobedience, sin entered the world the curse was pronounced, and so while that remains there can be no paradise. If it is found that the word of God brings to view a time when the curse will be removed, we may justly believe that paradise will be restored. If in addition to this we find inspiration portraying a time of future paradisaic peace and glory on the earth, a reasonable exercise of faith will grasp it. But if, at last, we find the Holy Spirit proclaiming it, and giving visions of its actual establishment in heavenly beauty and glory on the earth, then we are bound to expect its restoration. The word of God does plainly declare that there will come a time when "there shall be no more curse."

Nebuchadnezzar saw in vision a great image representing, as declared by inspiration, a line of great and powerful kingdoms located on the earth. These kingdoms ended with a division into ten parts, ten smaller kingdoms, or powers. "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."—Dan. ii. 44. As these prophetic kingdoms were all located on the earth, so must the universal and everlasting one which the God of heaven will set up be located on the earth also. "And the kingdom and dominion and greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom."—vii. 27.

This everlasting kingdom is the kingdom of Christ, the "stone" which, as seen in the vision interpreted by Daniel, "was cut out of the mountain without hands, and" that "brake in pieces" all the others, and "became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth." When this kingdom has been established, and Christ has subdued the nations, then will be heard the great voices, saying, "The kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever."—Rev. xi. 15. At this time, too, will be accomplished that which God spake by the mouth of His prophet, Isaiah: "For, behold, I create new heavens, and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered," (because of the perfection and glory of the latter) "nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create."—Isa. lxv. 17, 18. Of the promised land it is said: "And the desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by. And they shall say, This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden."—Ezek. xxxvi. 34, 35.

The whole earth is promised to Christ for a kingdom, and to the saints for an inheritance. "Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion. I will declare my decree. The Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me; and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession."—Psa. ii. 6-8. "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this."—Isa. ix. 6, 7. "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke i. 32, 33.

Will there be paradisaic perfection and delights at that time? Will the righteous triumph and rejoice? In his days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth." Psa. xxii. 7.

The Spirit portrays in exalted strain the peace and glory that will be enjoyed upon the renewed earth (paradise restored) by all the redeemed ones. "Righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fatling together. . . . The cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. . . They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."—Isa. ix. 6-9. All this is but a sample of the very much that is said respecting the state of things on the earth when that (paradise) which was lost in Adam shall be restored in Christ.

Let us now see whether the future restoration of paradise has been surely set forth by the Spirit. Many years had elapsed since the death, resurrection and ascension of Christ: the gospel had been preached to various nations, and the Christian religion was rapidly increasing when John, an exile on Patmos, received a revelation from him that liveth and was dead." The revelation was of "things which must shortly come to pass;" and it opened to view the events of various periods reaching to the personal return of Christ, and the setting up of the heavenly kingdom of which we have spoken. "He that hath an ear," saith the messenger, "let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: to him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which stands in the midst of the paradise of God." When paradise existed in the beginning, the tree of life stood in the midst of it; and in the passage just quoted, a promise is made to them that overcome, and it is that they shall eat of the "tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise."

The book of Revelation is prophetic. The things that were revealed to John were then in the future; they were things which should "come to pass." When John heard the above words of promise he had not yet come to the paradisaic part of the vision, but was simply told of a blessing that awaited the faithful. He saw kingdoms strong and mighty set up and cast down. He beheld woes, and plagues, and judgments terrible inflicted upon nations and peoples, and saw great anti-christian powers annihilated. He saw the faithful subjected to persecutions bloody and diabolical, and he finally beheld "a new heaven and new earth," and the "new Jerusalem coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. . . . In the midst of the street of it . . . was there the tree of life . . . and there shall be no more curse." We have, then, the unfailing word of God for it, that paradise shall be restored, but not until the Lord shall gather out "all things that offend, and them which do iniquity." We have now seen that paradise ceased to exist at the close of Adam's Edenic experience, and that it has not yet been re-established, but will be when "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ."

We do not overlook the only other instance in the whole Bible of the use of the term paradise. That instance is 2 Cor. xii. 4: "How that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words which it is not lawful for a man to utter." As evidence that some orthodox theologians, at least, do not regard Paul as claiming that any part of him had actually been admitted into heaven, we quote from Dr. Adam Clarke. He says:

Schoetgen "has shown, that ascending to heaven, or being caught up to heaven, is a form of speech among Jewish writers, to express the highest degree of inspiration. . . . If we may understand St. Paul thus, it will remove much of the difficulty from this place, and perhaps the unspeakable words, verse 4, are thus to be understood. He had the most sublime communications from God; such as would be improper to mention."

The Greek preposition rendered "up," in this text, is eis, and properly signifies at. . . . It sometimes means being at, either as close beside, or actually within . . . But it likewise denotes motion or tendency toward an object, so as to arrive at it; and then may be rendered to or into when applied to place: Bible vs. Tradition. That this was a vision, Paul himself declares in ver. 1: "I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord." He saw two things in connection, viz., paradise and "the third heaven." And this paradise is just what John saw, on Patmos. He was, like Paul, caught toward it, so as to behold it, and see something of its glory.

We have seen what paradise is; now let us consult Peter regarding the "third heaven." He says, "by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water: whereby the world that then was" (before the flood) "being overflowed with water, perished: but the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word, kept in store, reserved unto fire. . . . The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up (this language has, we believe, reference to the destruction of the present condition of things, otherwhere expressed as the gathering out of "all things that offend, and them which do iniquity.") Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth."

Dr. Clarke and others understand, and we think rightly so, "heavens" in the foregoing, as also in other passages, to relate to the atmosphere, etc., which surrounds the earth. What has Peter told us? Why, that the first heaven and the first earth were destroyed by water, "the flood;" that the second heaven and the second earth, now existing, shall be destroyed also, and God has promised, after that, "new heavens and a new earth."

Paradise and the "third heaven, then, are co-existent. We have seen that the preposition eis, rendered up, in the passage, denotes motion or tendency toward an object so as to arrive at it, and may be rendered to or into when applied to place. Paul, in his vision, seemed to be transported beyond intervening time and events, to paradise and the third heavens, and saw them and the glory of them just as if they already existed. L. C. T.

A Christian's Course.

We give the following extracts from sermons of "Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, D. D.," preached before the University of Oxford. Some of our amazingly timorous professors of religion, and such as think there are no further advances in the knowledge of truth that can be made, should ponder them well. This eminent minister says:

"'It makes all the difference in the world whether we put the duty of truth in the first or second place.' Yes; that is exactly the difference between the spirit of the world and the spirit of the Bible. The spirit of the world asks, first, 'Is it safe, is it pious?' 2d, 'Is it true?' The spirit of the prophets asks, first, 'Is it true?' 2d, 'Is it safe?' The spirit of the world asks, first, 'Is it prudent?' 2d, 'Is it right?' The spirit of the prophets asks, first, 'Is it right?' 2d, 'Is it prudent?' It is not that they and we hold different doctrines on these matters, but that we hold them in different proportions. What they put first, we put second: what we put second, they put first." . . . "What is it that the prophets recommend to us? Not eccentricity, nor singularity, nor useless opposition to the existing frame-work of the world, or the church in which we may find ourselves. Not this—which is of no use to any one—but this, which is needed by every one of us, a fixed resolution to hold our own against chance and accident; against popular clamor and popular favor; against the opinions, and the conversation of the circle in which we live." . . . "In the Mussulman or the Hindoo, the consciousness of the presence of God makes itself felt in the entire abstraction of the mind from all outward things. In the fanatic, of whatever religion, it makes itself felt in the disregard of all the common rules of human morality. In the Hebrew prophet, it makes itself felt in the indifference to human praise or blame; in the unswerving fidelity to the voice of duty and of conscience; in the courage to say what he knew to be true, and to do what he knew to be right. This is the Hebrew prophet, this is the Christian man; is the best sign of the near vision of Almighty God: it is the best sign of the real presence of Jesus Christ, the faithful and true, the holy and just, the power of God, and the wisdom of God."

Two Spirits Contrasted.

BY THOMAS READ.

"As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of a slave to be brought again into fear, but ye have received the spirit of adoption enabling us to cry: Abba, Father. And this (auto) self-same spirit [of adoption] testifies together with our spirits [or understanding] that we are the children of God."—Rom. viii. 14-16.

These two spirits may be contrasted thus: The slavish spirit, under the influence of the teachings of tradition, and wrought upon by fear, and influenced by the terrible character falsely given to the God of love, looking up to heaven exclaims: "Master, master, thy power and thy threatenings, are a constant source of terror to me, and while thou holdest in thy hand that terrible whip of eternal torments, I submit myself to thee, and will do what thou requirest me to do!" How many who call themselves Christians know not of what spirit they are. For the gospel was not given to frighten men, but to instil a principle of love to God and love to man; that instead of perishing in death, as the wicked do, and we all were doing, God gave us his only beloved Son, that whoever believes upon him, might not perish but have everlasting life. "If it were not for the doctrine of eternal torments," said a professed Christian, a member of the M. E. Church, "I would not be a Christian at all." How many in the professedly Christian churches are actuated by this slavish spirit, let the lukewarmness and the backsliding of many testify. But we may seriously inquire, are they Christians at all? And whence did they obtain this slavish spirit? Paul positively declares of those that are led by the Spirit of God, that they have not received the spirit of a slave, or the spirit of bondage, to be brought again into fear. And he makes such a spirit the very opposite of that spirit of adoption that characterizes the true Christian. We love him because he first loved us. He is led by love, not driven by terror.

Now view the results of the spirit of adoption that characterizes the true Christian. This spirit, instead of recoiling in fear at the power of God, looks up to heaven with filial confidence and exclaims with reverence, "Father, Father, I have received so many mercies at thy hand, thou hast made me and preserved to the present time, and when I had made myself vile by sinning against thee and deserving to perish, thou didst provide thy only beloved Son to die as a sin offering, through whom I have received the forgiveness of my sins and the precious promise of everlasting life by the resurrection at the coming of Christ my Saviour; how much, therefore, can I do to express my gratitude and love to thee, my greatest benefactor?"

What a contrast is here. One spirit, cringing, terror-stricken, and disliking the service of his Maker, because perchance he has been taught that God inflicts unutterable and unending torments upon the creatures he has made, and wishing to avert his anger, therefore he reluctantly submits to serve him, but has little love or respect for his character. While the other spirit, delighting and rejoicing with childlike confidence in the pleasing service of a God of love, and always solicitous to gratify his kind Father, finds his service perfect freedom, and himself joint heir with Christ and a son of the living God, patiently waiting for the glory to be revealed in the kingdom of God. The one spirit degrading its possessor to a slave, frightened by man's tradition; the other spirit ennobling its owner to a son, rejoicing in God his Father, whose undoubting hopes are founded upon the words of the unchanging God.

Father, Father! shed abroad thy love in our hearts more copiously.

The Passover in the West.

BY JAMES STRINGER.

BR. STORRS: The Brethren of Lawrence and Dore counties met in Conference, April 4, 1871. The object of the meeting was to get together and consult each other on the propriety of taking the Lord's Supper but once a year. The idea was new to some; others, it seems, had investigated and were fully committed. The house was called to order by G. Evans, who was called to the Chair. The object of the meeting was then made known and freely discussed by the Brn. A committee was appointed to make preparations for the keeping of the feast on the following day, April 5.

The Brn. met at 9 o'clock A. M. A minute of the preceding meeting was read and the following was offered by A. F. Service, that a report of this meeting be sent to the "Restitution" with the request that it be published; also, one to the HERALD OF LIFE with the same request.

The Committee reported, that, after services, a meal would be prepared, at the close of which the symbols would be taken. We then listened to an instructive discourse by A. F. Service: subject, the Passover.

We then retired to a private house for the purpose of celebrating the Lord's death. Br. Plummer then made a few remarks, suited to the occasion.

It will be seen from this that the Brethren in this vicinity have adopted the annual celebration of the Lord's death. It seemed to be the prevailing sentiment that we could not celebrate the Lord's death on his resurrection day.

Three years ago the writer had never heard the truth preached; in fact, it was a new thing in this country two and a-half years ago. But since that time the glorious gospel has been proclaimed, and has effected much good. Yes, eighteen months ago the cry was "Let them alone; they will soon die out." But today the truth is making rapid strides in these parts. Yes, the Lord has blessed us with many good brethren. The sects are being marked up to the highest pitch, and are now struggling to keep their craft from being taken away from them. Some oppose the truth, while others not having the hardihood to deny it, nor the manly courage to believe and obey it, are tossed about with every wind. How long till hope shall merge into reality? May God speed the day when heaven and earth shall be made vocal with the joyful acclamations of that heavenly choir, shouting "The kingdoms of this world have become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ." Let us watch, and ever be ready to hail that day with joy.

What is meant by Meat in due Season?

BY J. S. GORTON.

As there is no personal honor due to men because they are able to give a correct exposition of a text of Scripture, there should be no unkind, or anything but charitable feeling toward those who differ from us in understanding, unless we know in their lives they dishonor God! We were sometime in our history unconverted, even to some truths, which now appear so simple that we cannot understand how we ever could have believed otherwise than as we now do in regard to them.

Even our beloved Paul once believed he was doing good service when he was fighting against him: but God, who knows the hearts of all men, saw in him a branch that should grow on the true vine and bear fruit to his glory.

There are some who are contentious and obey not the truth. Such are soon known and will be dealt with after the gospel plan; but God will do it. There is a promise in the scripture to those that seek. None really seek unless they want to find, and God knows who they are, and says to us, give a reason of your hope to every one that asketh with meekness and fear. We do not know God's plan to convert our brother, but we can many of us, look back on the time when He in his great mercy gave us milk that we might grow, and be able after awhile to eat strong meat; and we thank his eternal name that his word says, the path of the just is as a shining light; and until the perfect day shall dawn we may grow, through his mercy and grace.

What is meat to God's people? That which shall feed and nourish them and cause them to grow up into Christ who is their living head.

A knowledge of God's purpose has been meat to the Church in every age. The object of our God in revealing his secrets to the prophets, whatever their nature, was that the church might have something to feed upon, and thus be sustained through the long dark pilgrimage of her earthly history.

When the history of the Jews as a nation, was about to end, God fed the church upon meat that caused them to flee into the mountains. and thus be preserved a seed in the earth. Knowledge of the resurrection of the dead has been meat for the church always, and especially when they were being put to death. It sustained them as nothing else could have done, as they remembered the promise of the Master that he would raise them up at the last day.

There is no plainer teaching of scripture, than that, when our Lord is about to come in his glory his church will be fed with a knowledge of it, and be sustained and strengthened that they may endure the trials of the last days. Without this meat they would be as likely as any to be unduly engaged in the business of life and its cares, and thus be taken in a snare. The command of the Lord provided for this when he said, take heed yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be to overcharged. The text of Scripture that promises reward to the Good Servant, who shall be found giving meat in due season, when the Master comes is found in bold contrast with the text that shows the fate of the evil servant, who says in his heart my Lord delayeth his coming.

The meat in due season must be the knowledge of Christ's coming; otherwise, there would be no force in the language.

God has always given his people something to stimulate them to do his bidding: and every man that has a hope of seeing Christ, and being made like him, will purify himself, even as he is pure; and all God's people will rejoice when they get the meat that shall give them a knowledge of his near approach, and cause them to awake out of sleep—and no one of them will want the Lord to delay, but all of them will raise the anxious prayer, Come Lord Jesus, and come quickly.

Amen: even so come Lord Jesus.

NEW YORK, April 12, 1871.

From Eld. Samuel L. Walter.

BR. STORRS: I am, through the mercy of my heavenly Father, in good health, and am hopeful of immortality in my Father's unsuffering kingdom, where we will "reign in life by one, Jesus Christ."

I went to Juna, as I wrote you, and found the people all opposed to the glorious truth of No life out of Christ. Our host, Mr. West, must have a discussion with Br. Branson, of Keenville.

Subject—"Resolved, That the Scriptures teach all men will be resurrected to life, or everlasting existence."

Mr. West, the affirmative, was sadly ignorant of the Scriptures. He, in opening the discussion, never told what was the subject, but he was here to advocate a doctrine as old as time. Next what his opponent believed, and what he would say about this new doctrine, and denounced it as a damnable heresy, etc. Br. B. called him to order. The moderator told Mr. W. that he was out of order: then West read the proposition, and gave the following as proof, "How say some of you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." He said it would not do to say that all, here, did not mean all. Then the old story about the souls under the altar, "that were slain for the word of God." Then Rev. xx.; then Matt. xxv. 41; then x. 28; and lastly, he said the rich man's immortal soul and spirit died, and lifted up his eyes in hell torments: then to give him perfect victory, he tried to tell a fable, and some anecdotes; but failed to produce a laugh, and quit before his time was out.

Br. S. I. Branson then rose and made some cutting remarks on the course that West had taken in his opening; then he gave the true meaning of all the texts that W. quoted, and showed that they did not prove the resurrection of all the dead to life, etc., but were against the re-living of the wicked; then he gave an abundance of testimony from God's word that the wicked will not live again. West, in summing up, had to bring me into his argument, for effect. He turned and pointed at me and said, he did not know what this old, gray-headed man expected to do by preaching such damnable heresy, and I will advise him to take his Bible and God's word and preach them, etc.

At the close, I had a chance to speak for myself, which I did. I told them my object was always to preach God's word, because it was truth, and not fables. And my object in doing so was to vindicate the character of my Father from the foul slander which the doctrine of eternal torment cast upon him, viz., that he was a vindictive tyrant. He was not; but was the "God of Love," and all his acts were the outgushing of his love to his creatures, and proclaimed vividly to all, who looked at them with a single eye, "God's love." Dr. E. Beecher had said that, God's benevolence and justice could not let him torment us in hell for the sins of this life; and in order to make eternal torment justly inflicted on the sinner, must have had a pre-existence, and failed to secure heaven; hence God's love caused him to give us another chance to escape hell; and this earth is a kind of hospital, where he has sent the bad men and devils to be cured; and if not cured here, then he could send them to eternal torment; and good men, of all ages of the church since this doctrine has been preached, have been tormented by it. But we did not like to see men wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction.

I had a good season on Sabbath in preaching to a good and attractive congregation, among whom were ministers, lawyers and doctors. By request I spoke from 1 Cor. xv. 22. I trust good may be the result from our labors.

The life views are received by some here. I find those who can't see that the wicked will not live again, and die again after getting a little torment, because they think that punishment means torment. I believe truth will triumph out here. It makes men think and read God's blessed book. Amen.

Yours, in hope of life.

Truth Invaluable.

"WHAT is truth?" said the Roman Procurator to Jesus—Whatever may be the true explanation of his meaning, the infinite importance of the abstract inquiry cannot be a subject of debate; at least, among Christians. Religious truth is, of all treasures, the most valuable; and he only who makes its search the chief labor of his life, appreciates his responsibility to God and himself.

But divine truth comes not at every call There are certain indispensable conditions to be observed by him who knocks at her gate. The natural will must be subjected to the Divine. "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine." The gaze must be fixed heaven-ward; the things of earth must lose their attractiveness; the pride of the animal nature must be checked—the haughty crest lowered; the Spirit of God must be a welcome guest and an abiding inmate of the heart,—if we would "know the things that are freely given to us of God." "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

The words of the wise man—"Buy the truth,"—have not been deprived of their deep significance by the lapse of three milleniums. The truth is to be purchased; not with money, altogether, but with time—ease—worldly honor; especially the latter. "How can ye believe," said the Master, "who receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from the only God?" "The friendship of the world is enmity with God." Let it perish, then, with the world! Sell it for truth.

Some prevalent errors should also be discarded or avoided by the truth-searcher:—trust in the wisdom of men; undue reliance of the "Fathers" and the great names of the divinity schools; too much respect for the preconceptions of Self & Co.; opposition to free investigation; etc.

Although Pilate's question did not elicit a response, the emphatic answer is on record. In that transcendent prayer which forms such an appropriate conclusion to his last and most thrilling discourse, the Son of God said: "THY WORD is truth." His words but echoed the Psalmist's: "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." The aged Paul reiterates the sentiment to Timothy: "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."—Happy is he who believes that it is even so; who is proof against the insidious attempts of modern skeptics to impeach the Divine authority of the Bible; who can distinguish the pure record from the corruptions introduced in the sacred text by human ignorance and weakness; who has learned how to compare "spiritual things with spiritual," according to the apostolic practice, and thus to insure himself against the possibility of mistaking the errors of men for the truth of God.

The Bible, then, is the standard. The Bible alone is the standard of appeal: fully containing the will of God so that we may not compare any writings of men, though never so holy, with the divine Scriptures; nor may we compare custom, or the great multitude, or antiquity, or succession of times or persons, or councils, decrees, or statutes with the TRUTH OF GOD.

The Bible being the repository of truth, it becomes every lover of truth to "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest" its divine matter. "It is not enough," says Thomas Chalmers, "to entitle a man to the name of a Christian, that he professes to believe the Bible to be a genuine communication from God. To be the disciple of any book, he must do something more than satisfy himself that its contents are true—he must read the book—he must obtain a knowledge of its contents." Stephen Olin remarked to the same effect: "It will not do to float along with the current, and submit questions of so profound and intense interest to idle tradition, or human authority, or church pretensions, any more than to the rash temerity of our reason. . . . I by no means satisfy the demands of so high an obligation by ascertaining what is the current or popular opinion, or what is the voice of the fathers. . . . My business is to learn what is the mind of God. His own account of the matter is in my hands, and there I must search for his doctrine, armed with whatever resources diligent, thoughtful, prayerful study, and good books, and learned, simple-hearted, God-fearing teachers may be able to supply. I specially desire not to be misunderstood on this most important point. The gospel not only tolerates—it imperatively demands of every Christian that he should seek diligently to know the true import of the Bible."

Next in importance to the discovery of truth comes its dissemination. It is the bounden duty of every one to faithfully declare, and use every available means to spread, whatever of truth he may have acquired, and he is called to it by every tie that binds him to humanity. Divine instruction is too precious to be hid under a cover, or buried in the earth; hence, it should be held forth to the children of men, even at the risk of its rejection by many. Ezekiel was commanded to speak the words of Jehovah to Israel whether they would hear or whether they would forbear. The disapprobation of the world has no terrors to him who is supported by the consciousness of the Divine acceptance; one smile of God will expunge a thousand human frowns. Let no one be content, then, with the mere acquisition of truth, but

"On! let all the soul within you
For the truth's sake go abroad!
Strike! let every nerve and sinew
Tell on ages—tell for God."

THE principle of persecution—besides being wholly at variance with the spirit of Christianity—acts also, as a kind of specific poison to sincere belief. Like a pestilential atmosphere, it makes gradual and imperceptible advances in debilitating the system, and tainting the inmost springs of life, more or less speedily, according to the constitution of each individual; and carries off its victims, one by one, without external blow, by a secret internal decay. For in proportion as men are accustomed to regard it as right that outward profession should be enforced, they will come to regard the inward belief, which cannot be enforced, as insignificant. Conformity will be regarded as the great object, and truth as a matter we need not be concerned about.—Archbishop Whately.

The Open Door.

Within a town of Holland once
  A widow dwelt, 'tis said,
So poor, alas! her children asked
  One night, in vain, for bread.
But this poor woman loved the Lord,
  And knew that he was good;
So, with her little ones around,
  She prayed to him for food.

When prayer was done, her eldest child,
  A boy of eight years old,
Said softly, "In the Holy Book,
  Dear mother, we are told
How God, with food by ravens brought, Supplied his prophet's need."
"Yes," answered she, "but that, my son,
  Was long ago indeed."

"But mother, God may do again
  What he has done before;
And so, to let the birds fly in,
  I will unclose the door."
Then little Dirk, in simple faith,
  Threw ope the door full wide,
So that the radiance of their lamp
  Fell on the path outside.

Ere long the burgomaster passed,
  And noticing the light,
Paused to inquire why the door
  Was open so at night.
"My little Dirk has done it, sir,"
  The widow, smiling, said,
  "That ravens might fly in and bring My hungry children bread."

"Indeed!" the burgomaster cried,
  "Then here's a raven, lad;
Come to my home and you shall see
  Where bread may soon be had."
Along the street to his own house
  He quickly led the boy,
And sent him back with food that filled
  His home with humble joy.

The supper ended, little Dirk
  Went to the open door,
Looked up and said, "Many thanks, good Lord!"
  Then shut it fast once more.
For though no bird had entered in,
  He knew that God on high
Had hearkened to his mother's prayer,
  And sent this full supply.

Baptism.

BY B. J. BURNETT.

Br. La Fayette Norris, Dear Sir: I notice in the Herald of March 29, some querying in reference to "what Law are Christians under?" And if I read my brother Norris correctly, I believe he would leave us to infer that baptism is only a carnal ordinance, or figment of the carnal commandments contained in the ordinances of the first covenant. And if his conclusions are correct, our brother reasoned well. But on the other hand, if we can show that baptism was instituted by an event that vastly excels any, and all others known among men, then I hope as "honest men we shall agree" to look this matter square in the face. Now brethren please consider this: I am not aiming to become a teacher in the household of faith, as if I were a somebody; no such thing; but I shall deem it a great favor if I am allowed to present some of the reasons for my faith and hope in God, that are to my mind exhibited in the formula of this baptism; particularly as I believe in only one baptism proper, and that it was divinely instituted by our Lord Jesus in his death, burial, and resurrection.

For I notice St. Peter's expose of Noah's voyage in the Ark: "Wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water; the like figure [said he] whereunto baptism doth also now save us, . . . by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." And in noticing this, I remember that every living soul in the ark, either of man or beast, were all included under the one and same sentence, to "destroy all flesh in whom was the breath of life:" but all the willing and obedient came up into the ark, and then Divine mercy shut them in secure from the impending death of evil unbelievers wherein they passed through an ordeal, of which divine mercy has pre-ordained, in his economy of redemption, to accept of the humble penitent as literal execution of the sentence to death, by willingly complying with this formula in figure or likeness of death; this is what St. Peter denominates, "The like figure whereunto baptism doth also now save us; . . . by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." That is, the eight persons "saved by water," in the ark, were saved by a likeness or figure of that baptism which doth also now save the penitent sinners; hence it must be the baptism of our Lord Jesus. And we are all willing to admit, I hope, that our salvation became a possible fact, only through the resurrection of Jesus Christ: and that is precisely the words of Peter concerning this saving baptism. This is also the teaching of St. Paul, "And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain: ye are yet in your sins." Again: "Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." These words secure to us the event referred to by St. Peter, as the baptism that saves the church.

With this I now hasten to show, by the voice of our Lord Jesus, that his death, burial and resurrection was by himself denominated a baptism when he said: "But I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I pained till it be accomplished."

Now brethren, can you be at a loss to know what it could be that gave our Lord such constant pain until it should be accomplished? I myself believe you are not. Hence we will now notice our Master's reply to the request of James and John: "Ye know not (said he) what ye ask: can ye drink of the cup that I drink of? and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" This places the matter in a still clearer light; for it links the cup of anguish with his baptism for our offences; and still more, it also locates the event beyond all peradventure to be just what St. Peter terms it, namely: the baptism that "doth also now save us;" that is, when our Lord was "put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit," it is easy, while we contemplate this great event, to comprehend the aptness of the saying, that he was the first-fruits of them who are resting from their labors, being the first-born from the dead. Although the righteous of all ages had gone down under the power of death, still none had been raised up to eternal life, until Jesus our Lord had conquered death by his own baptism into the realms of the dead, from which he was raised by the glory of the Father.

Such was the stupendous event that our Lord denominated his baptism. Although this baptism was necessarily peculiar to himself, still it represented most perfectly the ordeal of death, in which the church are now resting. But the great halo of glory is found to surround the fact, that he arose as the first-fruits of them that sleep, or, as a pledge for the redemption of all who sleep in Jesus. He redeems from the power death, as it is written: "If we believe that Jesus died, and rose again, even so, them also that sleep in Jesus, will God bring with him."

Such is the great event, that the Lord himself commands every one born of the Spirit, to commemorate by being baptized in a figure of it. And in order to show that we are in strict accordance with St. Paul, we shall quote his own words: "Putting off (said he) the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ: buried with him in baptism." Now, in the above, we find, not only what it is that qualifies one for baptism, but the order of baptism also; for first the "body of sins" must be "put off" by the "circumcision of Christ;" and, of course, that is the "circumcision of the heart in the Spirit;" it is being "born of the Spirit," as "Isaac was;" and then if we are controlled by apostolic order, all such are to be buried with Christ in baptism; or, in other words, buried in figure of Christ's own baptism.

Who does not see the completeness of order, and the effectiveness of this doctrine to assuage all opposing theoretic dogmas which have engendered strife and contention until now? Therefore, if we accept our Lord's words as relating to his own death, burial and resurrection, when he said, "Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of? and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" then harmony may be restored; then the enmity, subterfuges of men will be laid on the shelf, and the everlasting covenant of God vindicated, and the kingdom of God, proper, will be sought for, and accepted. But as this matter now stands, the church have lost sight of the significance of baptism; and in this dilemma they yielded to the spirit of contention about words to no profit.

But now we have a sure refuge from all partial or perverted representations, either of the formula, or of the word to express it; for when our Lord was "put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit," according to his own words, we recognize in this stupendous event, the baptism that saves the church by a resurrection from the dead; then who can object to a formula that, in figure, expresses the fact, that Christ was so buried for our sins, and raised again for our justification, and at the same time perpetuate the fact, that because of the first sin, the church also must succumb to the penalty of death; but they die in Christ; they sleep in Jesus; and as such he will raise them up again at the last day.

These are things that baptism doth in a most perfect manner exhibit to the minds of men. And baptism does still more than this, I believe; for I notice such sayings as these: "put ye on the new man;" and "having put on the new man." "But put ye on the Lord Jesus." "For as many of you, as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ." "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into His death? Therefore are we buried with him by baptism unto death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." These words of St. Paul are clear, firm, and to the point, for they squarely set forth the facts we are contending for, namely: that the ordeal of baptism is representative of events in the past, and also of events to come. Of the past it is said: "we are buried with Christ by (figure of) baptism into death;" and "know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death?" And of the events to come, it is said: "For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall also be of his resurrection." Such words form the ground of my hope; for they teach me to observe all things that our Lord commanded, and when I hear him say: go . . . teach all nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, I conclude they were buried in figure of Christian death, and raised again in likeness of his resurrection, and as a pledge of our being so raised up again "at the last day." And that I am correct in saying that baptism has a special reference to the re-living of the church, I shall refer again to St. Paul, who said: "else . . . what shall they do which are baptized for the dead? If the dead rise not at all, why are they then baptized for the dead?" That is, what shall they do, or, what have they done which were baptized for, or in remembrance of the dead, if they are not raised at all? or, why do they in baptism represent in figure the resurrection of Christ the head, and the church His body, if there be no resurrection at all, why are they baptized?

A Few Thoughts on Baptism.

BY D. J. ELLSWORTH.

There is perhaps no subject upon which religionists are so sensitive as that of baptism; and none perhaps from which it is so difficult to turn the mind from the way it was first led.

Having seen and felt the arguments upon all sides of this question, we propose to examine the matter very briefly, to offer a few suggestions, and inquire of the Source of Light, and note the instructions given to those who received them from the lips of the Great Teacher.

It is not our purpose to speak decidedly upon this subject; for we are not possessed of strong convictions in the matter, while we are assured that the only way of arriving, sooner or later, at the truth, is to be willing to learn: to "prove all things," and "hold fast that which is good."

We desire to present a few words and suggestions, which may be of help to some, who, like ourselves, are inquiring for "The one Lord, one Faith, and one Baptism."

We find that, under the Mosaic dispensation, the rite of baptism was administered to Gentile proselytes of the Jewish faith. The mode of baptism we shall not speak of.

Coming to the baptism of John the Baptist, we find that the Jews sent priests and Levites to him, to inquire, "Why baptizest thou?" What office do you hold? The inquiry was not, What new rite is this? but why do you administer it? What was his answer? "I baptize you with water, unto repentance; but, He that cometh after me is mightier than I. . . . He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." John also gave the reason why he baptized with water. It was, that He who was to come, "might be made manifest to Israel." John declared that he knew Him not; and the signal to him was, "That upon whom thou shall see the Spirit (in a certain form) descending and remaining upon him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost." While it appears that the signal, to draw the attention of the people to Christ, was the baptism of John the Baptist, with water, as he said.

After Christ had finished his ministry, the plan of salvation accomplished, and the great sacrifice made, it was declared by one who received the instruction from the glorified One, "There is one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism." This is certainly plain language; and for any one to say there is or may be more than one baptism, is to give the inspired apostle the lie.

On page 177 of "Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge," we find some "reasons urged by Robert Hall (a Baptist) to show that the baptism of John was a preparatory rite, and not to be regarded as a Christian ordinance." He says, 1st, "This baptism took place under the Jewish dispensation. The Jewish dispensation continued in force till the death of Christ. Then the veil of the temple was rent in twain. Then the great sacrifice for sin was offered, and the typical sacrifices ceased. It was then that Christ blotted out the handwriting of ordinances, that was against us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to His cross. Col. ii. 14. Our Saviour lived under the old dispensation, and was a strict observer of the institutions of Moses; and all that was done in the church previous to His death belonged properly to that dispensation. This certainly is strong presumptive evidence that the baptism of John was not a Christian ordinance."

2d. "Christian baptism originated in the express command of Christ, Go ye and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. No such origin can be claimed for the baptism of John, who baptized some time before he knew Christ. He ascribes his commission to the Father. John i. 33."

From what we may gather further from this writer, he allows and holds to water baptism. We are aware that many of our brethren do not believe in water baptism at all, but that the baptism of the Holy Ghost was wholly to supersede the ordinance practiced in the early days of the apostles. This is the question we should like to have firmly settled for ourself. We know others who desire a clear conviction of the matter, and it seems that there should be a better understanding of the subject.

That it was practiced by the apostles to a greater or less extent, and that in one case, at least, after the baptism of the Holy Ghost, cannot be denied; and that they did acts (which they should not,) on account of their early Jewish learning, and under pressure of popular opinion, is equally true.

Christ's salvation was for all people, to the ends of the earth; but it required a miracle, thrice repeated, before Peter could comprehend the fact, notwithstanding all that he had been taught by his Master while with him.

We have found the object of John's baptism, being a signal to the people of Him that was to be manifested. We refer again to the case with Peter, and we find he was directed to go and preach to a certain household. While he was speaking unto them the words of life, he says, "The Holy Ghost fell on them, as on us at the beginning. Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that He said, John indeed baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost."

Peter says nothing now about baptizing them with water, for the Spirit that he had been baptized with, brought to his remembrance what he should have understood before.

We find that on an occasion just previous to this, while Peter was preaching, he beheld the Holy Ghost come upon certain ones, who had not been baptized with water; and then, remembering the word of the Lord, commanded them to be baptized with water.

We cannot suppose it was an injury to them, but it seemed very unnecessary and out of place, if we may so speak.

The teaching of Paul was certainly against baptism with water, and as he had the fulness of the gospel committed unto him, and he shunned not to declare the whole counsel of God, we may be safe in following his example.

As it was in his days, so now: "We have many things to learn, seeing we are weak."

Why be Sad?

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

Why be sad when the King is so near
  To redeem us from sorrow and mourning?
Look up, dear pilgrims! the signs do appear
  That warn us of the coming of morning.

Oh how sadness wrings the human heart! Is there a single person living that never felt its pangs? Persons in all conditions and stations of life, even the pleasure-seeking worldlings do not escape its overwhelming tide.

I often wonder why the Christian heart should be sad; but when I look at the cause of such feelings there appears no grounds for wonderment. Sin, sorrow and death hover over the pilgrim's pathway like a fearful tempest. The turbulent tide of evil increases each day; and kindred and friends and professed followers of the Saviour disappear in its current, and are rapidly borne down the broad way to destruction. These things make the Christian heart sad, and I often think they would make the heart of an angel sad were they associated with such things.

But why be sad? Look at the grand scenes of divine glory and felicity just before us to which we shall soon be introduced! Think of an eternity—an endless age that we shall dwell with Jesus in a land where the mingled scenes of sorrow and weariness that we now experience will never enter, nor "come into mind." Sadness, which may now pervade the heart, will then give way to the anthems of praise, which will ever ascend in honor to the Lamb who hath redeemed us. And "with joy shall we draw water out of the wells of salvation." With such a precious, heart-cheering prospect, why should sadness ever be allowed to take possession of the heart? I sometimes feel sad—I cannot help it; but when these scenes with panoramic power, come before my mind, the feeling of sadness disappears in view of the anticipated glories of the "rest" that is just before us.

Oh why should we be sad when we know that Jesus is coming so soon to redeem us? Let us look up and rejoice that our redemption draweth nigh. Looking up is an attitude of joyous expectation. Then why feel cast down? The lambs of the flock are perhaps looking to you for encouragement. Do not dishearten them by an appearance of sadness. Drown your feelings of sadness in the great fountain of God's gracious assurance, that "all things work together for good to them that love" him, and show to the world that you rejoice in the near approach of the Messiah's advent. Have a smile of cheer for the sorrowing; a kind word of admonition for the erring; a heart of loving pleading for the sinner; strengthen the weak, and give light to those who are in darkness. This will be doing God's work. Should we be sad in doing His work, knowing how great a reward shall be bestowed on us—even "a crown of life?" The cause of God demands cheerful, diligent, earnest laborers. Then, dear pilgrims, let us look up to the crown that is laid up for us, if we prove faithful to the end, and labor on in the assurance that our reward is sure.

Children's Department.

Mother.

BY HIRAM P. MAYO.

What is home without a mother? We may be worth thousands, but if we have no mother we are in one sense of the word beggars. When troubles cross our path we rush to the one who reared us from infancy and unload our bothered mind. We look upon her as our guardian angel. She is never tired of working for us. And when we are in gay society we hardly cast a thought for the one who is praying for us at home, and mid pleasure and enjoyment we never think of the one who is working for our happiness.

What a thoughtless world! With what an undividable pride does the mother watch her children springing forth into manhood and womanhood. She can hardly realize her once little ones now about to confront the battles of life which she has gone through. Even in manhood a mother's word had the same power over her child as in childhood. In case of sickness she would remain by the bedside of her child until the last, regardless of her night's sleep. She will sit gazing upon the much-loved yet fast decaying one, praying to God to spare her beloved child.

If all others desert her she will remain. If perchance the suffering is troublesome, not a murmur will cross her lips, but she will consent to her wishes willingly, thinking she will soon be free—her moments are numbered. She knows she will be no more. She kneels and prays, Oh what agony must be hers as she watches its last expiring breath; her prayers are ended, her child is past suffering: the mother dries her tears and weeps not, but feels thankful for those great and precious promises in God's word, whereby she is able to say, "I sorrow not as those who have no hope."

Proud Animals.

There was once a cow, so proud that she would never go into the barn at night, unless she was allowed to walk before the other cows. When this was mentioned to her owner, he would not believe it, and, with some friends who were visiting him, went out to see the experiment tried of letting the other cows go in before her. The cow seemed indignant, ran one way and another, and resisted persuasion and force. After trying some time, the gentleman began to think the dairy-maid was right. She said there was no way but to turn out the other cows. This was done, and the proud lady at once walked in with a satisfied air, while her mates quietly followed her.

Now, little folks, what do you think of such a disposition? Is it attractive and pleasant? We laugh at it in a dumb animal—there, it is only foolish; but just as foolish, and sinful besides, in human beings.

Even in a cat, it once cost the life of her poor little kitten. Do you wonder how this could be, and say you don't believe it? These stories are not "made up," but quite true.

Pussy had three or four little kittens, all very pretty, except one. That was black, and in her estimation did not equal the rest. Pussy was a great pet in the family where she lived, had plenty of sweet milk, and a warm bed in an attic-chamber. Her owner went up to see her kittens every day. The poor little black one was found cast out on the cold, hard floor. Not thinking but that it had fallen out by accident, pussy's kind friend gently replaced it in her bed. The next time she went up stairs, the little thing lay again on the floor. So the unnatural mother persisted in doing; she would not nurse it, would not let it stay with the rest; and after trying in vain to induce her to take care of it, her owner out of pity, had it drowned, thinking that not so hard as to perish of cold and hunger.

If pride, in a dumb beast that knew no better, could do so much harm, we may be sure it does no less when we indulge in it ourselves.—S. S. Gazette.

A Drop.

I saw just now a pleasant sight under my window. It is raining as only it knows how to rain in these Southern places. I am busy writing; my people have started on their once-deferred pic-nic, and I am to join them by and by. But the sudden clouds have put a damper upon Nature, and new disappointment into the little people, if not the big. So I am somewhat distracted, and leave my table and go to my window every now and then.

Just now cheery child voices drew me to my lookout again, and from my second-story study I looked down upon two children under the trees. They were just parting.

One of them was a little white girl, with an umbrella; the other a little black girl, with a large market-basket. They had separated a little before I really saw who and what they were; and there seemed to be some of that turning back for which children are so famous. I heard the little girl call, "I'm ever so much obliged to you, Ella," and Ella's cheery answer was, "Oh! you are very welcome;" and then I saw it all. The neatly dressed white girl had seen the colored girl going by, and had taken her umbrella and escorted her home; and as she stood for a moment making some rather damaging attacks upon the pavement with her patent shower protector—a little effervescing of her child-heart—I could not help thinking what a sunbeam she had thrown across her little colored sister's way; and that sweet spirit that toned itself out from the two voices was out of two hearts, both made the happier by the little doing. And I think, as it always is, that the doer was the happier.

Here where I see so much, on the part of the old as well as young, of contempt and ill-will and ill-doing and harsh words toward those guilty of only a dark skin, the incident may appear more marked than it will to you, who happily cannot realize what I have every day to see and feel. Still I do not believe the Millennium has come to the white children since I left the North, and the lesson of a hearty kindness will not be lost, I trust, upon some who have yet to learn, what I know many old people never have learned, the beauty and the gladness that come of living by "the Golden Rule," and making the way of the walk through life glitter with little deeds, as bright and sparkling and abundant as the flashing dew-drops along one's path these June mornings; but as enduring as these are fleeting.—Selected.

A Bible View of Hell:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY.

BY JOSEPH LACIAR.

[The following communication was originally written for the "Times," at Bethlehem, Pa. An article in that paper, by one signing himself "BEREAN," was the occasion of drawing out this from Br. Laciar, of Mauch Chunk, Pa. It was declined by the "Times" on account of its length; and was sent to us, just before our sickness, and has laid by till now; but the matter is no less interesting because written last autumn.—EDITOR.]

EDITOR TIMES: Dear Sir: I read with much interest an article in your paper, on inquiries into the "Doctrine of a Future State," and think it would be interesting to a large number of your intelligent readers, if now and then articles on religious questions of this nature, would appear in its columns. There are not a few persons, in every community, who have but a limited opportunity of making known their views on religious subjects, if these views vary in doctrine from the traditional standard of the denominational sects: and as the investigation of a subject is the only way by which truth is elicited, it would afford many an intelligent reader some gratification if more secular papers would show the liberality of permitting Christians, who differ in faith from the generally inculcated doctrines, to express their ideas, and the results of their zealous investigations of the holy Scriptures; for, the want of charity with which the religious press is conducted excludes all opinions except such as may be made to harmonize with the various orthodox views; and years of experience in witnessing this illiberal spirit affords us but little hope that things in this direction will have any improvement through the present generation, so that well-disposed followers of the Lord, who do not find what they regard as the truth among the sectarian ranks, must feel contented with such advantages as are through other sources placed before them; knowing this that there be not many masters ruling over us; but one, even he by whom all of us should stand or fall; and well has the apostle Paul said, "Without charity the rest profiteth little."

If men are in error, those professing to hold the truth should bear in mind that they are not warring against individuals,—against their fellow-men, and neighbors; but, against towering principles; against the powers of darkness and error; and for Christians to array themselves against these, there is but one weapon that can be wielded successfully, and this is the one, and the only one given by the Holy Spirit; even the word of God; this is that "sound doctrine which cannot be gainsaid," and is found all sufficient, when skilfully handled, for the annihilation of all doctrines not in harmony with the teachings of Holy Writ. And this, also, is the only method or standard by which to prove all things; and whatsoever is proved we do well that we take heed to, as being good—the truth—and which is in harmony with the divine mind and will. Let Christian men then take heed how they prove things, lest they displace the Head of the church by their traditions.

"What about the Future State?"

This question opens a subject to which no person of any hope or belief can well be indifferent; and to a sincerely inquiring mind, the solution of the question propounded, affords one of the greatest sources of comfort that can be opened in the acquisition of the knowledge of spiritual things; and we venture to say, that there are a number of Christians (some of whom have fallen asleep) whose inquiring minds have led them into an investigation of this very subject, and who are now rejoicing with joy unspeakable, on account of the convictions and light that they have arrived at, as to the true hope or state of man in the future age; and who are now among the most zealous workers in the cause of Christ, endeavoring to light up the path into a future state, unto poor fallen humanity, who are to be its subjects. The want of many in not being able to see plainly the condition of the Future State is a want of conformity to the reasonable harmoniousness of the word of God, as, also, the want of the exercise of this faculty in its application to the comprehending of the revealed perfections of God! Come now and let us reason together.—Isaiah i: 18. Here is the mind of the Lord as to what he would have us do,—exercise that reason which he has implanted in us; and to respond to this invitation of the Lord we should even be ready to say in the language of Job, "Surely I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to reason with God."—Job xiii: 3. Thus is the invitation of the Lord to every one of us; and thus in the language of Job should we with ready minds give ear; and in this manner should we endeavor to conform our minds to the nature and perfections of the mind of God.

Human nature knows what love, justice, knowledge, virtue, joy, peace, etc., are,—knows how they can be appreciated; and we perceive by experience and revelation that the meaning of these words, in their broadest and fullest application, is, that as the attributes of God, and for man to reason with God, it became necessary for him to conform his mind to the great principles implied in His perfections. Many Christian men, in their teachings, are constantly making hostility in the revealed love, justice, etc., of God, by applying certain forms and actions in the Divine Government of the Universe over which Jehovah rules, which makes reason revolt, because the human mind is capable of comprehending that oppression, revenge, injustice, etc., all, can only emanate from a tyrannical form of government; whether of Divine or human origin; therefore, when in any of the administrations of Jehovah's laws they appear to our understanding to involve any of these principles, it should become evident to the mind that our reasoning is at fault, and in fact is proof that we in such matters have not reasoned after the manner of the Lord, as all his forms of administration must harmoniously hover around that central attribute, "Love." From this unimpeachable foundation, it becomes at once evident, to the reflective mind, that the notions and doctrines embraced by the great bulk of Christians, are entirely at variance with this great attribute; in the character of which the good Lord reveals himself to the best interests of poor humanity. Yea, "He so loved the world," etc.

Now, as "the Lord is the same, yesterday, to-day, and forever more," it is an undeniable truth, sustained by these words of inspiration, that in whatever manner, or way, the ruling of God's vast domain may be done in the future; and whatever disposition He will make of the creatures which by his law of generation have been brought into this world through the ages past, such disposition will certainly be made, in such wisdom, as will bear with it the Divine Love of the Creator; for it is "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever more;" the possibility of revenge, hatred, or a hopeless tyranny entering into, or being practiced over a portion of animated beings, in the future administrations, is altogether inadmissible with that reason which the Lord has called upon man to exercise, when He says, "Come now and let us reason together;" as such attributes are only existing in the carnal depravity of humanity, where "wisdom and love" are not the central guidance. Now the manner by which any human being will enter upon a future existence, of consciousness, must, as we conceive, be brought about in one of two ways: He has either got that existence already in him, as a compound of his nature in this life; or, it will depend upon a law, or power, proceeding from the Creator, if the latter is correct; then such as will inherit that life will be ushered or born into it, not in like manner; but after the same principle as all animated beings are brought forth into this life—without their knowledge or even consent; and so far as human understanding goes to comprehend the principles of life in our present existence, it affords us no good hope of a future life; therefore, the hope of such a life must be derived from a knowledge or promises revealed to us by the Creator. If he has not revealed anything at all that our minds can understand, then we are entirely without hope; for all that can be learned through the Philosophy of natural law, working in our natures, is, that man is brought forth by the same laws of generation by which all animated beings, and even vegetations are developed and governed; that he is a subject of decay and death, wrought by the effacing fingers of nature and time. Yea, like the flower of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, (withered), or in his nature, like the beasts of the field and has no pre-eminence over them, "As the one dieth, so dieth the other."—Ecc. iii: 18, 19.

It is very generally believed that man is possessed of a dual being; one of which is deathless in its nature, and that upon the deathlessness of this nature depends the hope of a future existence. If this is the truth of the matter, then it must be revealed to man in God's Book, as nature does not reveal it; and if taught in the word of God, it will be an easy matter to find it; and the question of a future life is solved; for that which cannot die is, certainly, already entered upon a state of eternal existence.

The first we read in the word of God concerning the creation of man, is found in Gen. 2, showing that he was formed out of the dust of the ground. Was he alive? No. What was done to make him alive? And God breathed into his nostrils (a living soul? no; but) the breath of life, and man (the being whom God had made of the dust) became a living soul. Here is no account of an immortal soul being breathed into man; as Christians generally contend for; but, the breath, breathed into that which was made of the dust, was what made the being a "living soul"—or being. And this account of a living soul, created by God, has been still further corrupted by theologians, by the presumption that it was an immortal soul! We are glad, however, that the credit of this way of assuming and interpreting or corrupting scripture, falls to where it belongs, as it can be readily traced to its origin. We have no account of any declaration on this subject that goes to substantiate this colossal perversion, dated prior to the one which says, "Ye shall not surely die,"—Gen. iii. iv. If this passes for truth, rather than the words of God, who said, "Ye shall surely die," for out of dust ye are made and unto dust ye shall return again, let a thinking mind judge. But suppose the phrase "living soul" could be construed so as to mean an immortal, undying soul, the erroneousness of such a construction will appear so glaring, that it cannot pass the readers' notice; for it follows that all animals and creeping things, are possessed of the same element for the same words are applied to the living beasts of the field. Although this is not so apparent in our English translation. The words in the original are nephesh ha'yah,—"living souls;" and in the first chapter Genesis, are used four times as applied to beasts, fowls, etc. This proves that the phrase a "living soul," may be applied as the proper personality of any creatures whose life depends upon the breath inhaled; which man can no more do without than the creatures here spoken of. So then according to the popular belief, we have proved that there are "immortal" souled beasts and creeping things, as well as man. This might be considered sufficient testimony, to unsettle the traditional ideas of the equality of man's being; but we will proceed to give more testimony in reference to man's entire mortality.

In the first place, the language, "immortal soul,"—"never dying soul,"—"the soul which cannot die," etc—terms so familiar with Christians, and which are sounded from nearly every pulpit in the land, do not occur in Holy Writ. This may be thought an unsustained assertion, even by many well-disposed Christians, who think that such familiar terms can be found on nearly every page; but we know whereof we affirm, and aside from the mere assertion, we will pledge a bounty, or at least a confession of our ignorance, to any one who will undertake to find it, and be successful. It is not there, but stands like many other things in the traditions of men; and as we find that the contrary is taught throughout the blessed volume of the Book, we do well that we take heed. We will give a few passages on this point, showing that souls are capable of dying, and destruction. "The soul that sinneth it shall die."—Ezekiel xviii. 4, 20. "He shall save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins." James v. 20. "Thou hast brought up my soul from the grave; thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit."—Psalm xxx. 3. "Let my soul live and it shall praise thee."—Psa. clxxv. "To deliver their soul from death, and to keep them alive in famine."—Psa. xxxiii. 17.

We might greatly multiply testimony, but here is sufficient to show that the whole of man is capable of death and of going into the grave; and that souls are subjects of destruction, let us look at a few more passages; such as this, for instance, "And that day Joshua took Makkedah and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof; he utterly destroyed them, all the souls that were therein."—Josh. x. 28, 32, 35, 37, 39. "Lest he tear my soul in pieces, rending it like a lion: while there is none to deliver." Psa. vii: 2. "And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any work on that day; the same soul will I destroy from among the people."—Lev. xxiii. 30. Along with such plain Bible teachings as this is, the idea that a living soul is a separate and immortal entity in man, is altogether inadmissible: and to say, as some people do, that the soul cannot be destroyed, is a direct contradiction of scripture, and we should suppose that he that can create can also destroy; as, also, the language we have quoted proves; for here is Bible doctrine that is hard to be mistaken in its teaching, directly substantiating the belief of the entire mortality of man's component parts, or constitution; and to construe such passages so as to convey the idea of "never dying souls"—"immortal souls," etc., seems to be wilfully putting "darkness for light" which we trust few wish to be guilty of doing.

Thus it appears that a "future life" or state of consciousness does not have its foundation or dependence, (as is presumed) on the popular doctrine of the immortality of the soul; but if attained at all, it must be done by an agency, or interposition of the Creator in bringing about a revival into life, from the dead; for we have shown, that the doctrine, as attained through the presumed immortality of a soul, is left altogether groundless, being unsustained by scripture, and therefore cannot be reasonably solved upon any ground which affords such pilgrims as are searching after a better life,—an eternal one—any satisfactory or reasonable hope; because this hope has not any scripture essence in it, and therefore the "title" of "A gospel hope," cannot be applied to it, but it stands a very towering traditional hope, the foundation of which was laid by the great enemy of the human race, who engraved upon it with his diabolical fingers, the inscription, "Yes hall not surely die;" and as every part of the structure bears the same inscription, whether done by Pagan, Papal, or Protestant architects, we need not wonder that the workmen have become skilled, and the multitudes are ever ready to cry, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." By this stupendous tradition, of man's being possessed of an immortal soul, the doctrine of our Lord and the Apostles, of a resurrection from the dead, has lost its power and necessity, so that it has well nigh become a dead letter, passed into oblivion; but, "truth crushed to earth will rise again." Basing our hope then upon a revival again into life, by a resurrection from the dead, we trust we shall be able to produce the plainest kind of scripture in proof of such belief, being none other than the one promulgated by our Lord Jesus, and the apostles, constituting none other than the genuine "gospel hope;" if so, it must be sustained by a "Thus saith the Lord;" and as man is the direct subject, or inheritor of its benefits, it is an interesting and all-absorbing question for us to ask, "if a man die shall he live again?"—Job xiv. 14. Revelation alone can give a satisfactory answer to this to our inquiring mind. No reply of human philosophy or presumption avails anything here. Let us see therefore what response the word of God affords us.

"If a man die, shall he live again?" Let our elder brother speak: "He that hath the Son of God, hath life." "I will raise him up at the last day;" "he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." Here is a reply to the question from the blessed Saviour himself, that expresses in language so positive that there will be a living again (from the dead) and at the same time showing who will (viz., believers) and who will not (viz., unbelievers) attain to it, that it seems impossible for any one to be misled in its teachings. But in order to multiply evidence, and to show beyond peradventure that the gospel hope—good news—glad tidings, of a future life depends on a resurrection from the dead, we will see what the will of God was in sending Jesus. This we think is a strong hold, a column upon which we may well feel safe to rest, when we know what the direct "will" of the good Lord is in a certain matter; and so we will, with child-like confidence, approach our heavenly Father, asking Him, "What was thy will in sending the Lord Jesus into the world?" The Lord who ever loveth the creatures whom he has created, will not leave us without a definite, and comprehensive reply. Hear what His Son (who knoweth fully the will of the Father) says: "This is the Father's will which has sent me; that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing; but should raise it up again (when?) at the last day." "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day."—John vi. 39, 40. "No man can come to me except the Father which hath sent me draw him;" (being drawn to Christ through the Father by believing what the Father had spoken through the prophets concerning the Christ, and also the Father drew them through the miracles which he wrought in Christ") and I will raise him up at the last day."—Verse 44. "He that eateth of this bread, (be a partaker of Christ) shall live forever." (What becomes of those who are not partakers of our Lord? O, say our orthodox friends, they will live forever also! only in misery). Here is the "will" of the Lord made manifest; and we ask, does it look like the theology of our day, which says, that the will of God in sending Jesus was to save an immaterial entity, called the soul, from misery, fire and torments!

Here, in one chapter, are shown three or four passages in which the promise of a resurrection from the dead is made to believers, and not to be attained until "at the last day." And to the unbelieving Jews, Jesus says, "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life," showing in all of these passages that the "will" and love of God is to give "eternal life" to a fallen and sin-bound race; and also that the giving of this life is a conditional gift, viz.. to the followers of Jesus.

Let men therefore take heed as to what they teach as a "future hope," making void by their traditions the "will of God;" and as Tyndale has well said in reply to the Papist Moore, "Ye by your sending souls into heaven, hell, and purgatory, make void the arguments wherewith Christ and the apostles prove the resurrection from the dead." What more truthful assertion was there ever made; for the popular doctrines of going to heaven, hell, etc., at death, does altogether make void the necessity of a resurrection, making it an encumbrance that could well be dispensed with. It having, however, been proved that this is the only hope of a future life held out to us in the teachings of the "Book of Life," it follows that man must be in a state of unconsciousness from the time he dies until resurrection day: if so, we will be likely to find something on this point; such language as this, found in Eccl. will do. "The dead know not anything, . . . there is no work, nor knowledge, nor device, nor wisdom, in the grave whither thou goest."—Ecc. ix. The contemplation of such language as this, or as in Obediah, "Be as though they had not been,"—verse 16, might make the weak in faith, or such who think and believe that the dead are praising the Lord, weak in their hope; but it is necessary for man to see his own weakness and inability to attain, of his own self, an immortal life. And that all depends upon the LIFE-GIVER, Jesus; "for there is no other name given by which men can be saved." And David testifies that, "the dead praise not the Lord; neither any that go down into silence."—Psl. cxv. 17. Here is evidence showing that when men die they go (to heaven, etc., singing songs and praises unto the Lord? no; but) down to where silence reigns, and where none praise the Lord. Were this all that was revealed to us, then would we ourself feel like the apostle, who said, in case there was no resurrection from the dead,—"Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." But, blessed be the Lord, He has fully revealed His purposes through Jesus, who gives us the glorious, heart-inspiring promise, that "they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, . . . neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Paul says that "Jesus is the first fruit of them that slept."—I Cor. xv. 20. "Christ the first fruits; afterwards they that are his at his coming."—Verse 23.

But what of the wicked, who are not Christ's at his coming? Oh! when will that solemn, and yet joyful time to the saints, come, when the trumpet shall sound, and the dead in Christ shall be raised *in*corruptible, "for this corruptible must put on *in*corruption; and this mortal must put on immortality."—I Cor. xv, 52, 53. But will the wicked share in this revival into life? if so, then they will likewise be the "sons of God;" for they who will be so, are called so, because they are the children of the resurrection; but hath God promised, or threatened it? No; but there are some who are not accounted worthy to receive a resurrection: and why? Because the sting (sin) being unremoved before they died, as a consequence, they are stung to death for eternity; for the sting of death is sin; and as God pays the wages due to every man, therefore, "the wages of sin is death."—Rom. vi. 23. We will here ask the question; where in the word of God it can be found, that the wages of sin is an eternal life in misery and torments? Nothing of the kind can be found. We read, however, in addition to the "wages of sin" being a state of death, such passages as these, "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead."—Prov. xxi. 16. "Man that is in honor abideth not; he is like the beasts that perish."—Psl. xlix. 12. Yea, "like the brute beasts . . . they shall utterly perish in their own corruption."—2 Peter. ii. 12. Isaiah speaks in like manner concerning certain wicked ones; hear him: "They shall lie down together; they shall not rise, they are extinct; they are quenched as two."—Isa. xliii. 17; and hear Jeremiah, "In their heat I will make their feasts; and I will make them drunken, that they may rejoice, and sleep a perpetual sleep and not awake, saith the Lord. Also read Job xxiv. 19, 20, and Isaiah xxvi. 14, in speaking of certain evil Rulers, says, "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise," etc., but immediately proceeds in verse 19 concerning the condition of God's people, "Thy dead men shall live: together with my dead body shall they arise," etc.

Here is a mighty and easily comprehended contrast concerning the hope of both classes, made by one who was not one of the least of the Prophets. Paul in writing to the Romans concerning their corrupt manner of living previous to the reception of the gospel, says, "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed; for the end of those things is death."—Rom. vi. 21. In writing to the Corinthian brethren concerning the want of faith in some, in regard to the resurrection, his argument is that "if there is no resurrection from the dead; then is Christ not risen; and if Christ is not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain . . . ye are yet in your sins. Then they also (as well as the wicked) who are fallen asleep in Christ, are perished."—1 Cor. xv. 12, 13, 14, 17, 18. So "let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die." Can language be more conclusive in showing that his only hope of escaping from perishing, eternally, depended upon his hope of a resurrection from the dead, of which Christ was the first fruits—a sample of what the harvest will be? and as none have been brought out of their graves since, it seems certain that all who have fallen asleep in Him, are in silence (in fact just as if really asleep) until the resurrection trumpet will sound; when they will rise incorruptible, immortal, clothed with eternal life, which is the gift of God through his Son Jesus. Paul says, in substance, that if Christ was not raised from the dead, then we were without hope, and to expose my life in preaching a dead Christ is vanity, the gospel a failure; then let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die without any hope of being revived into life again. But after having showed that Christ was raised and is the first fruits, he proceeds with his epistle, that as in Adam (the earthly man, carnal nature) all die; so in Christ, (the heavenly man, spiritual nature) all are made alive. Here some might raise objection to the all by saying that it has reference to both good and evil. A little investigation, however, will show that the all has reference to all who are in Christ—to none of such who are in Adam's nature—unregenerated. He that is a partaker of Christ, is in Christ; and he that is in Christ is become a new creature, and all that are in Christ shall be made alive: none others, for they would not come to Christ—the LIFE-GIVER, that they might have life; but are stung to death by sin, not having come to Christ to have this sting removed.

It will be seen from what evidence has been produced that the state of man in death is a state of unconsciousness; and as we have affirmed concerning the entire silence of the scriptures on the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, so now we affirm, that there is not one single passage in the Bible that speaks of Christians "going to heaven" when they die. It stands altogether in the traditions of men. Yea, it is an absolute presumption; and the contrary is so positively taught in Holy Writ. Jesus himself says, that no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven: even the Son of man which is in heaven."—John iii. 13. And if any righteous man, who has died, had the favor of ascending into the heavens, we should suppose that David stood in such favor; nevertheless, he, even, is not there, as may be seen by referring to Acts ii. Here Peter states that "David is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day."—Acts ii. 29. "For David is not ascended into the heavens," etc. —Verse 34. How absurd and even wicked then it is, for some Christians to make prayers unto the saints, when one like Peter declares in direct language that they have not ascended into heavens, but are in their sepulchers. And how absurd even to suppose that men know more, when deceased, than they ever did while alive, when the Bible says, they know not anything, no wisdom nor knowledge nor device, etc. Yea, "man's breath goeth forth; he returneth to his dust; in that very day his thoughts perish."—Psl. cxlvi. 9.

Here is a Bible doctrine of man's condition while dead; the belief in their entire unconsciousness is fully in harmony with revealed truth. We do not see how an impartial mind, seeking after truth, can form any other belief. The doctrine of "going to heaven at death" does indeed seem to be the quickest way of getting there; but seeing that it is unsustained by God's word, what does it amount to as a matter of truth? It is of no weight whatever; it is not a good, substantial hope; and as the "gospel hope" is something entirely different, being immortality by a resurrection from the dead, at the last day, we wonder that Christian men can exhibit the tenacity of clinging to such a theory as they really do; the error and barreness of the belief has been, in these days of light on the word of God, as clearly manifested as anything could well be done. So also in regard to the destination of the wicked, at death. The much-preached-of-place, as explained by popular theology, is presumed to be one of about the same magnitude, or rather larger (considering that few be saved) than heaven; and in the peculiarities attending the presence of its inmates, it is supposed to be the reverse to the enjoyments of such as are supposed to have gone to heaven.

Now, we verily admit, that the Bible does indeed reveal a "going into Hell;" but, unfortunately for our orthodox churches, it speaks of the righteous going there as well as the wicked. "The term "Hell" is a Saxon word; this work stands as a translation of the Hebrew word, "Sheol;" and the Greek word "Hades;" and in plain English, the grave, or state of death. That it signifies grave, is also admitted by Cruden, in his "Concordance," where he says, "This word ("Hell") most commonly signifies the grave, or the place or state of the dead." This we should suppose was sufficient evidence to shake the faith of sincere Christians in their belief of the Orthodox traditions of "Hell." Nowhere in our whole translation is this word employed, but what the word "grave" could properly be placed in its stead. And that they are interchangably used, is well-known to any reader of the Bible; as in 1 Cor. xv. 55, "O death, where is thy sting; O, grave, (or hell; see marginal reading) where is thy victory?" So, also, Rev. xx. 13, "And death and hell (or grave, see mar.) delivered up the dead." So also in speaking of Christ, the Psalmist says, in Psl. xvi. 10, "For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine

Holy one to see corruption;" and in chapter xlix. 15, in speaking of the same event, says, "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave." That these passages are one and the same in their meaning, "Cruden" even admits by placing it thus: "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell:—thou wilt not suffer my body to putrify in the grave." And the Psalmist, in speaking to God of his enemies, says, "Let death seize upon them; and let them go down quick into hell" (or the grave; see margin). Thus we might keep on multiplying evidence, but we fear it is labor lost with such who have made a deep-seated prejudice the ruling principle of their doctrine; while such who are given to following truth, wherever it may lead, will not require "line upon line" to distinguish between God's truth and the traditions of men. A simple faith and comprehension of a "Thus saith the Lord," is a matter capable of being solved by the weakest of us, and an example of this kind is prominently placed before us, which we will not pass by without noticing, for the narration, as given of it, not only touches the inmost chords of our affection, because of the extreme human love which Jesus exhibited on this occasion, (for "he wept") but at the same time gives a full manifestation of the correct hope of the future life, and the power of Christ as the bestower of that life. Here is an open and unreserved outburst of feeling upon a matter which had taken deep effect in the heart of poor Martha, as may well be seen by the pitiful manner in which she announced the death of Lazarus, "Lord if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." Thy brother hath gone to heaven! Is this correct? It is the consolation which the theological teachers of our day extend to the bereaved family of one who has died! But is it a Bible consolation? No; verily. He that knew the wants of the human heart on such occasions, knew well how to apply the healing words, "Thy brother shall rise again." This is the true hope. And to show that Martha had embraced this hope, she answers, (why Lord he is now alive in heaven! no: but) "I know that he shall rise again (when?) in the resurrection at the last day." Here is a form of belief—a vital faith exhibited, which differs as widely from the notions of going to heaven at death, as night is from day; for the conversation shows plainly that Martha had not the slightest idea or belief that any part of her brother was elsewhere than in the grave; and the manner of his resurrection proves that her belief was the right one; and after she had made the confession to Jesus of her belief, of the revival again of her brother, at the last day; Jesus makes no reserved statement as to how this was to be brought about; but proceeds at once by saying, "I am the resurrection and the life. Whosoever believeth in me, though he were dead (yet is he alive! so orthodoxy would have it: no; but,) yet shall he live again."—John xi. 25. And to prove his words, they proceed with a multitude of witnesses, many of whom were Jewish friends of the family, to the tomb of Lazarus to raise him from the dead. After the stone was removed from the sepulchre, and Jesus had offered a prayer unto the Father, he calls Lazarus, not from heaven, but, from the grave, saying, "Lazarus come forth:" and he that was dead came forth bound hand and feet. To say that an immortal entity, called the soul of Lazarus, had gone off towards heaven on a four days journey already, is not given by the slightest intimation; and a doctrine of such a kind in the face of such a record as that given of the raising of Lazarus, we cannot refrain from saying looks like a perfect absurdity, as bare of proof as anything ever was.

But another case; the making alive of the Widow's son, recorded in Luke vii. 14, 15. As they were entering the gate of the city they met a funeral. It was that of a young man. He revived him out of love,—he had compassion on his mother, for she was weeping as she came along; and the heart of our blessed Lord was moved; without any hesitancy he proceeds to remove the burden. Without any further ceremony he came and touched the bier, and they that bore him stood still. Jesus says, "Young man I say unto thee, arise." And he that was dead sat up and began to speak; and he delivered him to his mother. The effect was immense; it spread throughout all Judea and the region around. Was there following this spreading of the miracle Jesus had wrought, any commotion produced by rumors spread around as to what wonders and enjoyments the young man had seen while he was dead? or, an account of the great enjoyments experienced during the four days that Lazarus was absent? There should, and no doubt would have been, if the popular belief of "going to heaven at death" was a true one. We have no doubt that they would have been able and permitted to give a full account of all they had seen; and as the matter stands, in the light of scriptures, had we the opportunity of conversing with them on this subject, we have not the least fear that their testimony would be in harmony with revelation. A weighty proof that "the dead know not anything," and that the followers of Jesus must wait until "He who is our life shall appear," when we shall see him as he is, for "we shall be like him."—1 John iii. 2.

Hasten, O sinner, to Jesus for thy safety, and comfort thy heart with the blessed promise of a future eternal life through him who has purchased you by the sacrifice which he made of his own life, and who hath promised "unto them that look for him, shall he appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation."—Heb. ix. 28. For this same Jesus shall come in like manner as he went.—Acts i. 11; Matth. xxiv. 30, xxvi, 64; Mark xiii. 26, xiv, 62; 1 Thess. iv. 17.

May we be found of him in peace, and be accounted worthy of a resurrection unto life, if dead; or a change, if alive at His coming; and unto Christ, the LIFE-GIVER, be all the praise, honor and glory, for the ages to come. Amen.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, MAY 10, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

"THE IMAGE OF GOD."

An image of any person or thing is a representative or likeness of that person or thing. It may be in one particular, or in many. This must be determined by what is said on the subject. The image of God is spoken of in relation to men in Gen. i. 26, 27; ix, 6 and 1 Cor. xi. 7. It is spoken of Christ 2 Cor. iv. 4, Col. i. 15, and Heb. i. 3. These embrace the principal texts on the subject. Our inquiry is, In what consisted the image of God in which Adam was created? We shall not, in this article, attempt to refute other opinions, but simply to present that which seems to us most likely to be the truth.

It is in the first text mentioned we have a clue to the subject we seek to understand. We suggest then, that as that image seems to be defined in one word, viz., "dominion"—that it consisted in independence—the right to control and direct his own actions without forcible interference from any quarter; necessarily responsible to his Creator, but to none else. This independence gave him the right to exercise authority over all inferior creatures and things; hence he had, on earth, unlimited and unqualified "dominion." Thus he was in the image and likeness of God. This pre-eminence—or Godlikeness—he should possess as long as he acted in unison with his Creator, and did not subject himself to any creature. If he did lose his independence and become subject to any creature, it could only be done by a voluntary act: no power in the universe of creatures could compel him to surrender that independence which constituted him Godlike.

That this "image of God" was that which placed man above the authority of other creatures, and deprived them of the right to interfere with man's life, seems clear from what is said after the flood in relation to the matter. Gen. ix. 5, 6—"Surely your blood of your lives will I require: at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; and at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man. Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." The reason for this is distinctly stated—"for, in the image of God made he man." For any creature to deprive man of the right to control and regulate his own actions, without interference, as would be the case by forcibly taking away his life, thus stripping him of his independence, was an act of contempt of God, to be punished by the death of the perpetrator of the deed.

Again: in 1 Cor. xi. 7, there is a manifest reference to the fact that man was still recognized as the image of God in authority, or dominion, implying the independence of which we speak; though that independence is now vested in Christ—the second Adam—"the head of every man;" verse 3; and only in him can it now be possessed. The first Adam lost his independence in the hour of temptation, and surrendered it up to his tempter; and became enslaved by the evil power; "for his servants ye are to whom ye obey."—Rom. vi. 16. Our first parent thus subjected himself to creatures—lost his dominion—and the earth is not "subdued" by him, but man is a servant and doomed to eat his bread by the sweat of his face. He is but a slave, till made free by the second Adam; which freedom implies two things—deliverance from the service of the tempter, so as not to be under bondage to him; and deliverance from the consequences of his enslavement, viz., from death. To accomplish this work the second Adam was constituted in the image of God—is "the express image of God's person."—Heb. i. 3. [See also Col. i. 15 and 2 Corth. iv. 4.] He is invested with that independence which the first Adam possessed; which, if he—the second Adam—maintains, all who believe in him, and are thus united in him, the head of the new creation or re-creation, shall also attain to the lost honor and independence, regain Paradise, and live forever.

Thanks be unto God and our Lord Jesus Christ, the second Adam did maintain his independence, and has received full dominion—all power in heaven and in earth being committed to his hands; so that the triumph, victory, and deliverance of all united to him, and abiding in him, is certain. Again, we say—"Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Whatever may be said of the image of God in other respects, we apprehend the true import of the phrase in Gen. i. 26, 27, is that which we have given; and that it necessarily imports nothing more. Man was made to have "dominion;" therefore made independent; and in that consisted the likeness and image of God: that independence he surrendered to a creature—a tempter, and became a servant—a slave. He can only be recovered by the second Adam—he cannot gain independence, nor be reinstated in dominion only in the right, and by means of the second head—Jesus Christ. The Gospel of Christ, is the good news that the second Adam has overcome the tempter—has regained the right to dominion; and that all who will acknowledge him as the head of the new creation, and become his followers—abiding in him till the time appointed by the Father—shall share in his glory, and become his associate rulers in the Kingdom of God, now shortly to be set up, on the very territory where the first Adam lost his independence and dominion.

Truly these are "glad tidings." Let us see to it that none of the gaudy flowers that the world may hold out to allure us from following Christ, our Lord and Head, ever turn off our minds from the glorious prize of our high calling. Let us not faint, nor grow weary in the conflict, for ere long "the Master will come and call for" all his members. Oh, that the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ may shed on us abundantly His Holy Spirit, and strengthen us with might to overcome, that we may enter upon that eternal enjoyment promised to all who triumph in the present conflict.

THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTIANITY.

"It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you are spirit and are life."—JESUS.

These words were the utterance of him who "spake as never man spake." They are worthy of deep consideration. No reflective mind will adopt a sentiment as the design and intention of a speaker whose known views do not harmonize with it, even though the words might bear such a construction. The general and known sentiments of the speaker must be taken into the account where his words might seem to convey a different meaning; and no construction must be given his words which contradicts his clearly known views.

Christianity has certain great principles which underlie its whole frame-work. Any interpretation of the frame-work which does not harmonize with these foundation principles must be a mistaken view of the words.

The first foundation principle of Christianity is "God is love." This principle underlies all his dealings with men, as revealed in the gospel; and hence it is added—"He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him." This principle, then, is to regulate all our actions towards our fellow-creatures, as it regulates all the administration of God towards the works of His hands. Nothing is to be attributed to God, as His direct action relative to His creatures, that is not in harmony with the divine principle of love begotten in us by the gospel, or which is contradicted by sanctified reason. To suppose otherwise is to make the letter and spirit of Christianity opposed one to the other. Whatever makes such a conflict, in our interpretation of the words of Scripture, must arise from a misunderstanding of the words themselves.

The followers of our Lord heard him say, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." When they heard this language, "many said, This is a hard saying; who can hear it?" They overlooked the spirit of the words, and hence stumbled and fell. Had they stopped to reflect, instead of resting in the seeming meaning of the speaker, they would soon have learned that Jesus' words had a sense and meaning entirely the reverse from their construction. But it happened with them as with many since, their first impression governed their conduct, and it was useless to call their attention to the spirit of our Lord's words; for after all his explanation, "many of his disciples went back and walked no more with him." So inveterate is prejudice or preconceived notions.

Those who overlook or disregard the spirit of Christianity, will stumble and fall into the most absurd and God-dishonoring notions of His designs, administration, or government; such notions as only prevent the full, or even partial, development of love in themselves, and retard, if not entirely overthrow it in others; while they will drive many away from Christianity altogether, by the harshness which they find attributed to the gospel.

Few of the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE will doubt but that such has been the result of the doctrine of eternal sin and suffering; sin and suffering where reformation is impossible; and which is without design to benefit the sufferers. Sin and suffering which can be of no benefit to any being in the universe, so far as we have any knowledge by revelation or otherwise. Our sanctified reason and love both revolt at such an administration; and, happily for us, we have been led to see that though some of the words of Scripture seem to favor such a doctrine, yet other Scriptures give evidence of the falsehood of such a doctrine; and the spirit of Christianity is totally opposed to such a construction of its words or letter.

Let the reader ponder these remarks and he may find them equally applicable to other traditionary notions which are built upon some expressions of Scripture, supposed to have a meaning which is equally opposed to the spirit of Christianity, and as much outraging reason and love.

BACKSLIDING IN OLD AGE.

Did it ever occur to you that Christians were more apt to backslide and fall into open sin in the latter part of their religious course than in its earlier stages? It is a startling announcement, but I think you will find it true. Look at all the cases of backsliding recorded in the Bible. Did they not, every one of them, occur late in life? There was David. In the days of his youth and early manhood, a patron of faith and devotion. In advanced life, guilty of murder and adultery, and still later of pride and self-conceit, in numbering the people. Look at Moses. The great sin of his life committed when just about to enter the promised land. Look at Hezekiah, the good king Hezekiah. In his early days, zealous and devout. The last fifteen years of his life (a special gift from his God, and therefore one would think to be specially consecrated to him) bringing "wrath upon himself and upon Jerusalem." So too with Josiah. So too with Jehoshaphat. And look around at the cases of grievous backsliding within your own observation. Have they not, almost every one of them, occurred late in life? I mean, after many years of Christian profession. This fact (is it not a fact?) seems to teach several lessons of deep and solemn importance.

1. It accounts for another fact which has of late forced itself upon my attention, viz., that in the case of very many of God's people, their heaviest and most numerous trials come late in life. God, in his tender mercy, sends the trials to save them from falling away from their steadfastness, and bringing reproach upon their cause.

2. These cases, recorded in the Bible and confirmed by observation, ought to make Christians, as they advance in life, more and more watchful and distrustful of themselves.—Parish Visitor.

The foregoing remarks on "backsliding in old age," are worthy of consideration, so far as they admonish us who have advanced in life; yet we think the writer is under a serious mistake in several particulars. It is a melancholy sight to see an aged person backslide, and it is as rare as it is sorrowful. Most backsliding is in the early stages of a religious life. Multitudes "run well" for a time who are soon "hindered." "Many of his disciples went back and walked no more with" Jesus, when he had taught them of life only through himself. See John vi. 66 and connection. This was in the early stage of their discipleship, and not in "old age." Peter denied his Master when not more than thirty years of age. Judas betrayed Jesus about the same time of life, probably. We repeat, by far the greatest numbers of backsliders are found in early life, and from the more recent converts to the religion of the Bible; and it is seldom that a man who in early life devotes himself to the service of God, and advances steadily to "old age" in that service, backslides; yet such events do sometimes occur, and they show us that at no period of Christian experience can we with safety cease to watch and pray, or indulge the idea that our past devotion to God is any excuse to be remiss in our last days. Some who have been eminent in talents and labor have fallen in "old age" by the flattery they have received for previous services; they have been lifted up with pride and been ensnared to their wounding. But as a general rule, a life truly devoted to God from youth, with a consistent Christian walk to "old age," will not be likely to be stained with wickedly departing from the Lord. It is true "that in the case of very many of God's people, their heaviest and most numerous trials come late in life;" not however for the reason assigned by the "Visitor," but because as nature returns towards the helplessness of childhood the veteran pilgrim finds himself unable to maintain that buoyancy of spirit he did in manhood's maturity, so that depression of mind is a natural result, and great trials accompany it. Or, if such is not the cause of their trials, they may be accounted for on the ground that before the ultimate crowning of their graces with glory they are matured by greater trials than they could well have endured in their early Christian experience. It is true that the fall or backsliding of an aged Christian would attract more attention and bring more reproach on the cause of Christ than that of persons in their early pilgrimage.

The "Parish Visitor" in noticing the cases of Old Testament saints overlooked the fact, that it is only the shortcomings of eminent men he has noticed; and it is remarkable that they failed no more, considering the partial light of their dispensation. "The great sin of Moses' life" we hardly think was "committed when just about to enter the promised land." It seems to us, we might look back to his youthful days, when he slew the Egyptian on his own impulse, and find his zeal for the Lord venting itself in no ordinary sin.

Truly, however, "Christians, as they advance in life," ought to be "more and more watchful and distrustful of themselves." Long experience ought to have taught them, that without the grace and Spirit of God they can no more maintain a Christian walk, in "old age," than in the first year of their Christian experience. An entire leaning on God in Christ, and an earnest seeking the Holy Spirit's aid should characterize us who are near "old age;" that our "end may be peace."

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

HAVING seen that there has been no paradise, as a habitation for man, in existence since that created in the beginning ceased to be, let us consider the promise of Christ to the thief. It is not, of course, pretended that the text furnishes direct evidence of the immortality of the soul, or even of the existence of an immaterial soul entity, but supports it by implication. Our Saviour, it is said, promised that the thief should be with him in paradise that day, and as both of them died and were buried, it follows that they had soul entities which went to some paradise—a theological one, for instance. As the promise was made to a personality, one would naturally suppose some other inference would be drawn from the language, for if only some immateriality met somewhere, the event could not be reasonably considered a fulfilment of the promise, for that was made to a person, and it was that that person should be with the person of Jesus. Any claim, therefore, that the promise involves the idea of consciousness between death and the resurrection, is based upon the assumption that man possesses an entity capable of conscious existence separately from the body. Thus the thing has first to be assumed in order to make texts seem to teach it.

It is said, Christ died, it is true, but his soul lived on; it went into hades, a place of conscious existence. Is it so? Listen to the testimony of the Spirit of the Living God: "Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth: my flesh also shall rest in hope. For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell (sheol), neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption."—Psa. xvi. 9, 10. David spake these words by the Spirit of God; and lest some should fall into the error of supposing he spoke of himself, we turn to Peter, who says that David "is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day. Therefore being a prophet, and . . . seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither did his flesh see corruption."

That in which the Spirit declared God would not leave the Christ soul, is sheol. Sheol is not a place, but a state, it is the grave in general sense, i. e., the state of death.

"The learned Tremellius, who was a Jew by birth, and professor of Hebrew at Sedan, where he died in 1580, translated the Syriac version of the Bible, the oldest version extant, into Latin. He uniformly rendered the Syriac synonym for sheol into Latin, by sepulchr-um, i, o, u, (the different endings showing only the different grammatical constructions) which means the sepulchre, grave, or tomb, excepting in one single instance, Psa. xlix. 4, last clause, where he has rendered it, infernus, hell, because he thought that the wicked could not be consigned to the same place as that from which the soul of the Psalmist was redeemed. Yet he acknowledges that sheol, in most places, meant the general receptacle of the dead.

"In the French version, the word sheol is usually translated sepulchre, and only once enfer, hell, in Job xi. 8, where it has no relation to the dead, but is contrasted with the height of heaven."—Bible vs. Tradition.

Sheol is not a place of conscious existence. "For in death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave" (sheol) "who shall give thee thanks?"—Psa. vi. 5. "Let the wicked be ashamed, and let them be silent in the grave" (sheol).—Psa. xxxi. 17. "Like sheep they are laid in the grave" (sheol). "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave" (sheol). Are sheep conscious in the state of death? Like sheep the wicked are laid in sheol, consequently they must be unconscious. It will not do to say that the bodies of the wicked are laid like sheep in the "grave," for the Psalmist says the wicked themselves are thus laid; and, according to the popular theory, the undying soul is the man, the sinner. In order to help the popular theory concerning man's nature David should have said, "like sheep the remains of the wicked are laid in the grave." Of course, he would have been at variance with himself, and would have stated that which was not true, for the wealthy sinners of whom David speaks, whose "inward thought" was "that their houses shall continue forever, and their dwelling-places to all generations;" who called "their lands after their own names," had stately funerals, and were, in that respect, laid in the grave more like kings and princes than "like sheep."

"For the grave" (sheol) "cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee."—Isa. xxxviii. 18. Sheol, says Mr. George, is the same as hades, and there the righteous do "praise" and "celebrate" God. "For there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave" (sheol) "whither thou goest."—Eccl. ix. 1. Our friends on the other side of the question contend that there is wisdom, knowledge, and device in hades, the Greek term which represents the Heb. sheol. "If mischief befall him by the way in which ye go, then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave" (sheol).—Gen. xlii. 38. Would the loss of a son cause good old Jacob to go sorrowing into this happy intermediate state, this "heaven?" All must see that sheol, into which the soul of Christ—Christ himself, went at death, is a state of unconsciousness.

The author of the work we review, having brought evidence to prove that some Jews believed hades to be an abode of departed spirits, remarks: "Peter, speaking of David's prophecy, says, 'He seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell,' (Hades, the place of departed spirits.)" We presume it will not be further contended that sheol is a place of conscious existence, since we have abundantly shown otherwise; and hence the reader will perceive that the position of this writer renders necessary the use of hades in the foregoing quotation from Peter. The fact is Peter was talking to Jews particularly: "Ye men of Israel, hear these words:" consequently he would be likely to speak to them in their own tongue, or, quoting from Psalms, would at least be likely to use just the words which David used. He would not, therefore, use the term hades, but sheol, the recorder of Acts having afterward used the term hades as the proper representative of sheol. Peter said to the "men of Israel," "Because thou wilt not leave my soul" (the term rendered soul expressing the whole Being of Christ) "in sheol, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." There is "no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in sheol." So says the word of God.

Is it still affirmed that hades is a state of happy consciousness? that it is, as contended by our author, the abode of departed spirits, and may be called heaven?" Paul declares that the righteous will, at the resurrection, come out of their graves, and shout the triumphant song, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave" (hades) "where is thy victory?" Is there any one so simple as to believe that Paul intended by this language to represent happy existences coming out of heaven and shouting over their deliverance, saying, "O heaven, where is thy victory?" And yet the theory of Mr. George would have us believe it. It is settled beyond reasonable controversy that Christ was in sheol between his death and resurrection, and could not, therefore, have been with the thief in any place of conscious existence.

Mr. G., speaking of the words, "his soul was not left in hell, neither did his flesh see corruption," says: "Mark the distinction between soul and flesh." We venture the opinion that few if any, not blinded by prejudice, can read this text in the original and fail to see that the terms soul and flesh are synonyms, and represent the whole person of Christ. David said, "Because thou wilt not leave my soul in sheol, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." Is it for one moment supposed by any advocate of the popular theory that soul and Holy One mean two different parts of Christ? They are too wise to admit that the body, a mere senseless tenement, according to their theory, was the Holy One, and thus open the door to a possible inference that the soul (their idea of soul) was not holy.

Remember, Peter spoke to Hebrews, and, it is reasonable to suppose, used Hebrew terms. If this be so, the term which he used in saying, "his soul was not left," etc., was nephesh, a word of which Parkhurst declares he could find no passage where it undoubtedly means the spiritual part of man, or what is commonly denominated soul.

Murdock's Syriac translation reads: "And he foresaw, and spoke of the resurrection of Messiah, that he was not left in the grave, neither did his body see corruption. This Jesus hath God resuscitated; and we are all his witnesses."—Acts ii. 31, 32. Take notice, the Syriac has he instead of the E. V. words his soul; and it has grave, instead of hell. This is correct, for Christ himself went into the grave; Christ himself died, and was "resuscitated." Although the proper meaning of hell rightly enough expresses that of grave, its theological meaning is a gross perversion. Hades, rendered hell in the text, means grave, as the Syriac has it, and, we venture to affirm, is not once used in the Bible to denote a place of separate conscious existence of any part of man.

There is absolutely nothing connected with the text, Luke xxiii. 43, that gives any countenance to the idea of the existence of a conscious entity between death and the resurrection, except the punctuation, and that only as the reader assumes the very thing the text is wanted to prove. The comma being placed after thee, the sense of the text is that the promise of Jesus would be fulfilled the day it was made, hence it is concluded that as Christ and the thief both died (though the theory we oppose denies that either Jesus or the thief died; only their tenements, their "remains,") there must have been some part of each which existed in consciousness, and were together in paradise.

If the comma be placed after to-day, the sense will be that the promise was given that day, and would be fulfilled at some time then future. Thus it is obvious that upon the punctuation depends all the argument that advocates of the doctrine of man's immortality seek to draw from the text. We must not overlook the fact that while the words are the words of Jesus, the punctuating is done by the translators, the original bring without it. There was no approach to a regular system of punctuation until the sixteenth century.

Those who contend that the text, just as it stands, correctly represents the promise of Jesus to the thief, and that it implies consciousness in death, are compelled, as we have said, to assume, first, that there is a part of man which does not die; and second, that there is somewhere a place called paradise, to which this undying part repairs at the death of the other part. The former, we assert, is wholly unjustifiable in view of the fact that the word of God always represents man as mortal, and the race as perishing, naturally, and the latter we have shown to be untrue.

Paradise, says Mr. George, "may be called heaven." Then God must be there. But Jesus, after his resurrection, said to Mary, "I am not yet ascended to my Father." It is replied to this: "what we assert is, that the Saviour and the thief had each a distinct entity, called the soul . . . that these souls, after their departure from the body, were together in paradise." The assertor of this must surely overlook the fact that the me with whom the thief was promised to be, is the same me whom Mary was told not to touch for he had "not yet ascended," etc. If an immaterial entity was the me, how could Mary touch it? The idea is somewhat absurd. As the soul is asserted to be the man, the real personality, it must, of course, have been the "I" which had "not yet ascended" to the Father; and yet it is affirmed that Christ's soul did go to heaven the day of the crucifixion. We hope to be preserved from ever being thus brought into conflict with the testimony of Christ. What a cruel theory to be ever leading its patrons into such dangerous errors. In no sense was there fulfilled such a promise as it is alleged Christ gave the thief.

But there was a promise, and it will surely be fulfilled. What was it? Jesus had for years been teaching that at a future time he wonld come and reign as king. For example: "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all his holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory."—Matt. xxv. 31. Of this fact the thief was probably not ignorant, and doubtless being impressed that Jesus was no deceiver, he cried unto him, "Lord, remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom." What an idea they must have of Christ's kingdom who assume that it is located in hades! We have seen that the establishment of Christ's kingdom will be the re-establishment of paradise; so the Saviour's promise, "thou shalt be with me in paradise," is in perfect harmony with the prayer.

Lange's Commentary says, the thief "represents to himself the moment when the Messiah comes in his kingly glory to erect his kingdom upon earth, and desires that he then, awakened from the grave, may enter in with Him into the glory of his Lord." Consonant to this is the following from Archbishop Whately. He says: "Observe that 'into thy kingdom,' is a mistranslation; it should be, 'in thy kingdom.' The meaning is, at thy second coming in triumphant glory."

Whately further says, the malefactor looked "for a kingdom of God which the death of Jesus was not to destroy, but to complete; he understood that in some way or other, the Christ must suffer these things, and enter into his glory." Other learned and eminent commentators admit that the thief expected his prayer would be answered at some future time. We are compelled to the conclusion that, strange as it may seem, the malefactor was the first to perceive any thing of the deep meaning of the superscription over the cross, and was the first to herald the Lord's royal dignity; and that, too, at the very moment when the Messianic hope of the apostles themselves, though they were directly instructed by Christ, was most terribly shaken."

We have seen that Lange, Whately and others, including, we believe, Scott and Barnes, either hold or admit that the thief expected his prayer would be answered when Christ should set up his kingdom, or at some time subsequent to the day of crucifixion. This position could only be adopted by these men upon two principles. Either they must in their own minds place the comma after "to-day," the idea thus being that Jesus that day promised the thief should be with him at some future time; or else they must accept the term "to-day" in the strict sense of this day, a proper thing to do, as it may justly be so translated; the meaning thus being either just the same as in the other case or that this referred to the day of the establishment of Christ's kingdom. When people find fault with us for taking some account of the punctuation and showing a manifest error in it, they forget that the service which they compel the text to yield to their theory is based wholly on the punctuation.

We believe the term paradise, in the text, refers to the heavenly paradise which is to be established on the earth at the coming of Christ; and that Jesus gave the thief the promise of being with him at that time. While the text admits of several reasonable interpretations, and all in perfect harmony with the view of the unity of man's nature, it cannot be used in support of inherent immortality without first assuming the very thing to be proved, thus doing gross violence to some of the most palpable principles of Scripture exposition.

When paradise shall be re-established; when the hills shall laugh in their beauty, and the valleys sing the Redeemer's praise; when the "wilderness shall be glad," and the "desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose;" when the whole earth shall be robed in garments of unfading loveliness, and become one broad highway of holiness, one great paradise with no spot on all its wide extent to send up the wail of sorrow; when the "throne of God and the Lamb shall be in it," and the redeemed shall "see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads;" when "the ransomed of the Lord" shall "come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy," then will all Divine promises be fulfilled: then will faith and hope be swallowed up in the full fruition of paradisaic glory.

Our Lord and Master said, "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth;" and God, by the mouth of His prophet, had long before promised, "the meek shall inherit the earth, and delight themselves in the abundance of peace." The meek do not now delight themselves in abundance of peace, nor will they until Zion's King shall destroy them that corrupt the earth, and shall establish a peace based on universal Christian brotherhood, and perfect knowledge of and obedience to the Divine will. It is here that the "Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory;" and where our blessed Lord and Saviour reigns as king, and rules in righteousness, there will the saints find it ineffable delight to be. May all our readers so live that they shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, for thus shall an entrance be secured into immortality and glory. Let us by both precept and example do all we can in inducing others to join us in earnestly and faithfully striving to possess at last that unspeakably blessed prize, life in the eternal kingdom soon to be set up.

Sin and Grace.

BY ELD. T. K. ALLEN.

"But where sin abounded grace did much more abound."—Rom. v. 20.

How has sin abounded? Has it not overspread our whole soul? "The whole world lieth in wickedness." "Wisdom that descendeth not from above is earthly, sensual, devilish." "Men love darkness rather than light." "The heart of men is fully set in them to do evil." "Out of the heart of men proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornication, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness." Paul says, "The works of the flesh are idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, sedition, heresies, envyings, drunkenness, revelings." To Titus he says, "We ourselves, also, were sometime foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another." Were not all our passions, propensities, tempers and affections inordinate and evil? And did not pride, anger, self-will, malice, and unbelief reign in us? Were we not shut up in a prison of sin, bound to our lusts and passions? And when the Spirit of God strove with us, did we not resist all his influence, and vexed and urged him to depart for many long, rebellious years? Well, my brethren, we were the servants of sin then, and were free from righteousness; but now being made free from sin, we become servants to God; and holiness shall overspread our whole soul, so that all our tempers and passions shall be governed and regulated by the Holy Spirit that dwells in us, casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ; and we shall have love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. We shall therefore be all holy; and as once we resisted the Holy Spirit, so now we shall have power to resist all the wiles and devices of the devil; and temptations and suggestions to evil shall all be overcome, and shall find no place in us; until, like our divine Master, we can say, "The prince of this world cometh and hath nothing in me."

O then, beloved brethren, who are looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, let me exhort you to purify yourselves, even as he is pure; "cleanse yourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit." "Reckon yourselves dead indeed to sin; and that moment you will be alive to God. O begin, begin to reckon now. Fear not: believe, believe, and continue to believe, so shalt thou continue free. For it is retained as it is received by faith alone; and whoever thou art that perseveringly be ievest, it will be as a fire in thy bosom; and in spreading the sacred flame of love thou shalt be saved to the uttermost. As sin abounded, grace shall much more abound. As once you had your "conversation in time past in the lust of the flesh, fulfilling the devices of the flesh and of the mind, and were by nature the children of wrath even as others, so now, no evil thing shall remain.

Do you believe the report? Come, Jesus is offered to thee as a perfect Saviour, as an all-powerful physician. O then be perfect; this moment be made whole. O admit Him who has been knocking for admission until his head is filled with dew and his locks with the drops of the night.

'Tis done, the great transaction's done;
I am my Lord's and he is mine;
He drew me, and I followed on,
Charmed to confess the voice divine.

WINONA, MIN., April 28, 1871.

Prayer of Jesus on the Cross.

Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.—Luke xxiii. 34.

We have just done contemplating the agony of Jesus in the garden, and those "prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears," unto Him who alone was able to help. Consequent upon these, and doubtless, in answer to them, there seems to have been a remission of his sufferings. But that remission was but temporary, only sufficient for the powers of nature to rally, and for faith and fortitude to acquire further needful strength. Such was the tenderness of the Redeemer's spirit; such his keen sensibility to suffering, that had he not been favored with some alleviation, the lamp of life would, probably, have been extinguished ere the purposes of Infinite Wisdom had been accomplished.

That unknown and amazing agony ceased. But the tragical scenes of that eventful night went on; each one contributing to, and urging forward, the momentous catastrophe which was to follow. Jesus is betrayed—mocked—arraigned—scourged—crowned with thorns, and condemned to the death of the cross.

To that cross he is, at length, nailed; and there, on the accursed tree, the Saviour of the world now hangs. . . . .

While the measure of his sufferings was fast filling up, and it would seem impossible that he would not be wholly absorbed in his own intense pangs, his eye fell upon one—she was a spectator of the scene; she was poor—homeless—friendless—wretched—forlorn. For the moment, he forgot his own agony; and, with all the tenderness and sympathy of an affectionate son, he commended her to the care and kindness of the "beloved disciple," who was also near. "Woman," said he, "behold thy son?" "Disciple, behold thy mother!"

When or where, in the annals of filial love, was there a parallel to this? And, yet, in that bosom whence proceeded that filial love, there was a deeper, holier current; a tide flowing forth, and having for its object those who were now mocking his agonies, and thirsting for his blood. "Father!" said he—though that Father's face was hid from him, and he might no longer pray for himself, nor for a mitigation of his own personal sufferings—yet he might pray for his murderers—for the mockers of his pangs—and he does pray: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Hark, how he prays! The charming sound
Dwells on his dying lips,
And every groan and gaping wound
Cries: "Father! let the rebels live!"

The "Evangelical Prophet" had, seven hundred years before, foretold that he would "make intercession for the transgressors," —Isa. liii. 12; and here that prophecy is fulfilled. He had himself inculcated the love of enemies—the forgiveness of injuries—and prayer for those who should despitefully use and persecute; and the rule which he had prescribed for others, he now illustrates by his own noble and sublime example.

The question has been raised: Whom did Jesus embrace in his supplication for forgiveness? Two distinct classes were accessory to his crucifixion—Romans and Jews. The former were the immediate agents; the latter, the instigators. Both, however, were ignorant of the enormity of their guilt. Paul says, "that had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory." This ignorance Jesus urges as a reason why God should pardon them. In respect to the Romans, they were really ignorant that he was the Son of God; nor had they, perhaps, any means of distinguishing between him and the malefactors who were crucified with him. But the Jews were better informed; at least, they knew that he was innocent, and they might have learned his true character. The prejudices, under the influence of which they regarded him, had the effect to render them incapable of fairly estimating the evidence which he adduced, that he was the true Son of God. They were, therefore, guilty, especially the rulers, who were better situated to inform themselves as to his true character. All, indeed, might have arrived at the truth—for the light shone bright and glorious, but they loved darkness better than light, because their deeds were evil.

It was, however, a time of love and compassion when Jesus was on the cross. It was right that this "morn of mercy" should be signalized by the voice of prayer, ascending from Him who was expiating human guilt. It was a glorious act—thus to antedate, if we may so speak—the application of his blood, to wash out the deep moral stains of those who were about to shed it. It was a pledge and presage of the efficacy of the atoning work of Jesus. If he could ask blessings on the heads of murderers amid the agonies of crucifixion—how might he not be supposed to intercede when the bitterness of death should have passed, and the glorious work of expiation should have been accomplished.

To the men of the world, such kindness and compassion may seem inexplicable. They are governed by no such motives: are influenced by no such love: can feel no such duty. But here they may learn, from the example of Jesus, what his religion inculcates. Is it difficult so to act? That may well be granted. It is difficult. To bear reproaches and persecutions with patience; to bless those who are seeking our ruin; and, more than all, to pray in kindness and sincerity for them, is difficult. But Jesus did it: Stephen did it: Paul did it: and thousands, governed by the same love, have thus honored the sublime and glorious inculcations of the gospel.

What a different world had this proved, had the example of Jesus been strictly followed, since he presented it on the cross! Ah! those fires of revenge—intense and consuming—had never burned; those persecutions—those murders—those midnight assassinations, had never polluted the pages of our history. Those wars which have made wives widows, and children orphans, had never been waged. The walls of a thousand dungeons had not reverberated with the clanking of the chains of the incarcerated victims of revenge; nor had they started at their curses upon the guilty authors of their sufferings.

Well, disciples of Jesus! let the world pass on, and continue its revengeful fires, if it please. Let passion rage; let anger burn; but let us, taking a lesson from the precepts and example of Jesus—like him pity; like him pray; like him forgive. Is this difficult? Yes; difficult, but not impossible. By grace we can accomplish it: by grace we can do all duty and practice all self-denial. Let this prayer daily, hourly ascend to Him who has set a sublime and glorious example, and he will help us to follow it.

Make us, by thy transforming grace,
Dear Saviour, daily more like thee!
Thy fair example may we trace,
To teach us what we ought to be!

Oh, how benevolent and kind!
How mild!—how ready to forgive!
Be this the temper of our mind,
And these the rules by which we live.

From Daniel L. Osborn.

[THIS brother, Findley's Lake, N. Y., writes us that he and his son, 19 years old, have been very sick, taken on the 11th of March with typhoid fever, and confined to their beds five weeks. Some days unconscious, and were expected to die; but, by the blessing of God, a good physician, faithful watchers, and good nursing, they are now improving, and desire to give all praise to GOD and our LIFE-GIVER. He says he has not held any meetings in public for some time, but hopes to do so after he gets able to work. The following letter he sends for the HERALD OF LIFE.]

TO THE CHURCH OF GOD, SCATTERED ABROAD, Greeting: May grace, mercy and peace be multiplied unto you, through God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. Thus the apostle shows his love for those of like precious faith, who, Peter says, are kept by the power of God. O how cheering and encouraging the thought: kept by the power of God unto salvation; and he says, Wherein we greatly rejoice, though now for a season we are in heaviness. I greatly rejoice in God, by whom we are kept unto salvation—Life. Yes, hallelujah to Jesus, who has so loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood. Yes, glory to God and the Lamb.

Do not let us be cast down by trials. Peter says, the trial of our faith is more precious than gold, though it be tried by fire; (referring, perhaps, to a future persecution of the church, under antichrist. See Dan. xi. 3. And they of understanding shall instruct many; yet they shall fall by sword, by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days. Perhaps Matthew refers to the same. See Matt. xxiv. 21; Mark xiii. 19. For in those days shall be affliction such as was not from the beginning of the creation, neither shall be. I think that affliction is yet to come to pass.)

Though our faith may be tried as by fire, it is that it might be found unto praise, and honor, and glory, at the appearing of Christ. Whom having not seen, ye love; . . . yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. Yes, brethren, to-day is my joy unspeakable. Let all that hath breath praise the Lord, for he is good, and his mercy endureth forever. Wherefore he says, Gird up the loins of your mind, (keep these things in memory), and hope to the end for the grace or favor of life by Jesus Christ at his revelation.

Then he goes on, in verse 18, and tells us what we were redeemed with, viz., The precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot. Redeemed, bought from the law by Jesus, who, Paul says, was made under the law, and by so doing, and by dying and also developing a character in harmony with the Father, he came into possession of life by the power of his Father, and to give life to all them that believe on him.

Cheer up, pilgrims on this world's highway. The rejoicing news greets our ears, He that believeth in me, (Jesus), I will raise him up at the last day. Yes, glory to God in the highest, on earth, peace and good will to men. If the angels were so rejoiced in view of the benefits which were about to be received, as a whole, through Abraham and his seed, especially to the believer in Christ, shall we not be permitted to sound out the same? Glory to God in the highest. Yes; let the inhabitants of the rock sing; let them shout from the top of the mountains.

It is then, brethren, by faith we come in possession of the hope of being raised up by Christ at the last day. Faith is evidence. Paul kept it. How? By keeping in memory the evidence that Jesus was the Son of the living God. We hear him saying, 1 Cor., Ye are saved (have, and shall have life), if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you; else ye have believed in vain; your faith will profit you nothing. What is to be remembered, by which we are saved? This seems as important a question as any which can possibly be asked; one on which our salvation (future life), depends; at least, associated with others; such as salvation by obeying the truth and by faith, which seems to be the correct idea. What is it that Paul preached? That which I received, how that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures; that he was buried and rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures. 1 Cor. xv. 4, 8. Please read and remember, for on this seems to hang our hope of a future life. The way to remember is, read and continue to repeat.

From L. W. Bragg.

BELOVED OF THE LORD: Who love him, and his speedy return to earth to take us to himself in immortal beauty, and eternal glories. This is truly a high calling of God in Christ Jesus, that we may walk in the highway of holiness, a way contrary to self, the world, flesh, and the devil. All worldly hopes and glories are accounted as dung and dross for a saving knowledge of Christ, by our faith in him. Never did I more fully feel the need of a gospel separation from self and the world, in every point, than now. Its deadly influence is like the charm of the snake upon its prey. Pleasing and almost imperceptible until the victim is beyond recovery. Sad indeed is the reflection that hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of Advent people who apparently are rejoicing in the good hope through grace of a glorious immortality at the appearing of Jesus Christ, will find, to their sad and awful disappointment, that they have had friendship with the world.

We have entered upon a time when it is argued that we must be consistent Christians by somewhat conforming to the times and maxims of this age. But Br. Paul exhorts us to redeem the time, for the days are evil; and to present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is our reasonable service; and be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of the mind, that we may prove what is that good, acceptable, and perfect will of God. Peter says, Be ye holy in all manner of conversation. Because it is written, be ye holy, for I am holy: and without holiness no man shall see the Lord. The pure in heart shall see God. But, O, how very different is the standard of Christianity of those who once walked the self-denying pathway to glory, seeking to know from God only, but have lost sight of the pillar of light, and therefore know not whither they go. They have become strangers to vital godliness, and can look upon those who are struggling and striving for the old paths of holiness, as being wild, fanatical, and losing their Christian influence. But still I feel to pray with the poet, "Nearer my God to thee; nearer to thee." O for living faith that brings the daily testimony that my ways are pleasing to the Lord, seeking the honor that comes from God only, humbling myself under his mighty hand, that I may be exalted in due time.

Dear pilgrims in the land, let us once more rally around the standard of purity and holiness to the Lord, in all things; heeding the exhortation to the Laodicean Church, to buy gold tried in the fire, and white raiment that we may (really) be clothed, and anoint our eyes with eye-salve, that we may see. May we not get faint-hearted, should the Lord in his great love to us, rebuke and chasten us: but let us be zealous and repent.

Pray for me that I through rich grace, and love divine, may safely reach the harbor and with you join in the song of final and eternal triumph over the world, the flesh, and the devil, singing grace, grace to the rock of our eternal salvation upon the glorified shore.

From a pilgrim and stranger, rejoicing in hope of immortality and eternal life, when the great LIFE-GIVER comes.

CORINNA, ME., Apr. 1871.

From C. R. and O. A. Percy.

BR. STORRS: After an absence of seven months we are again at our own home in Norwalk, and feel to render new thanks to our heavenly Father for his constant care over us during the time. We have had our health improved much; and have visited our friends in Springfield, Holyoke, Mass., in New Hampshire and Vermont; then, best of all, have had the privilege of spending a part of the time with our parents in Northern New York; and while we could plainly see that time and age was making such a change in their loved forms, yet they were strong in God, and were looking forward with delight to the time when their bodies should be changed and made anew. When we parted with them, we could but commit them into a Father's kind care, and ask that they might be kept through the storms of life, and at last we could meet where parting never comes.

Yours, in hope of life in the future, with all the dear ones scattered o'er the earth. O, how we love to think of the time when this earth will be free from sin, and every one be heard singing praise to Him who sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb. God's own time and way. His will, not ours. Amen.

SOUTH NORWALK, CONN., May 6, 1871.

An Appeal.

TO THE BRETHREN AND FRIENDS OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, Greeting: We have commenced putting our Camp-ground at Springfield, Mass., in order for the Fall Meeting, and now need the funds subscribed for that object, and any other donations which may be made by brethren and sisters for that purpose. We shall need about a thousand dollars as soon as it can be placed at the disposal of the Treasurer. Br. J. C. Day is on the ground with help, employed in clearing away for the kitchen and boarding-house; building seats for the main circle, etc.

Now brethren let us come up to this work as nobly and promptly as we have done heretofore in sustaining our precious HERALD OF LIFE. I am quite sure that we have only to make the appeal for the necessary funds to carry forward this work, and they will come into the treasury. Send forthwith, dear brethren, "as the Lord hath prospered you," to Br. Geo. K. Carroll, Treas., 58 White st., New York.

The amount received will be found credited to the donors each week in the HERALD.

We desire and expect that, if the Lord will, we shall have a Camp-meeting in August, that will be such a feast of fat things as we have never enjoyed. All believers in Life only in Christ, throughout the country, will look forward with pleasure and gratitude to God that they can come together to hear on the great themes of the Gospel of Salvation, without fear of giving or receiving offence.

Let us have, by the grace of God, the best meeting ever yet held. To this end let us labor and pray.

CHRISTIAN VIGILANCE.

A CHARGE to keep I have,
A GOD to glorify;
A nat'ral, mortal soul to save,
Or it will surely die.

To serve the present age,
My calling to fulfil—
O may it all my powers engage,
To do my Master's will.

Arm me with jealous care,
As in thy sight to live;
And O, thy servant, Lord, prepare,
A strict account to give.

Help me to watch and pray,
And on thyself rely,
Assured, if I my trust betray,
I shall forever die.

BABYLON THE GREAT: HER FALL.

BY J. D. SHERIDAN.

DEAR HERALD OF LIFE: In great feebleness of body I make the attempt of writing you a few lines, to express my joy and comfort in receiving your weekly visits during the past three months of my illness, as I should have been very lonely without your visits, on account of the neglect I have felt from the passing crowds, who appear to shun me on account of my belief.

I am alone here, in my views that there will be no future life only through connection with the LIFE-GIVER. Consequently, I have received very few calls during the past winter; and I have suffered very much from a disease in my throat, limbs and feet; able to get out but very little. But as the HERALD comes weekly to cheer my drooping spirits, I feel unable to contain myself without responding to the many encouraging words and lines contained in your pages, especially the letters from the dear pilgrims who are scattered far away from me, and many of them from each other. Your words to me are like water to a thirsty soul: and although you are far away from me, and strangers in the flesh, yet as I read your communications, it seems to me that we are one in spirit, and I hope that the time is not far distant when the good Shepherd shall appear to gather the scattered sheep, for Jesus himself says to the Jews, "And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one Shepherd." Will that not be a blessed gathering? May the Lord, by his good Spirit, give us all grace to prepare for that happy meeting.

DEAR EDITORS: I feel some reluctance in troubling you with more of my scribbling, feeling sure that you have plenty of correspondents who are better able to interest your readers than I am.

But hearing so much said by persons of widely different views on the subject of the fall of Babylon, and the "Great City," I have long felt constrained to write out a few thoughts of my own on that subject for your consideration. If they should be thought worthy please give them a place in your columns. I wrote them down the 11th of last December, and have not been able to copy them since.

HAS BABYLON FALLEN?

"And the great city was divided into three parts; and the cities of the nations fell."—Rev. xvi. 19.

In the Old and New Testament, the church, Jewish and Christian, are often symbolized by the word "city;" also as "virgin, woman," "Zion," and "Daughter of Zion."

The apostate church is, also, symbolized, as the "Great City," "Woman—Babylon," and "Mother of harlots." All who carefully read the word will agree with me thus far, so it will be unnecessary to quote Scripture as proof of the statements that the "Great City," in the above text, symbolizes the apostate church or woman borne by the "beast," will hardly be questioned by any one who has examined the subject.

And as words do not always convey the same meaning, we will first consider in what sense the "Great City" has fallen; when she fell; how, and when she was divided?

As the "Great City" is the symbolic body of the fallen "Woman," or apostate Church, her fall must evidently be taken in a spiritual sense.

In the latter part of the first century, the faithful and true witness testifies of the primitive Christian churches, or of the different branches, he says, "I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love. Remember, therefore, from whence thou art fallen." Here she (the mystic woman) is represented as being in a fallen condition.

Again, he says of another branch of the same body: "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot. I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth." That she did receive this treatment from the Lord, by having her "candlestick removed out of its place" or, that the Holy Spirit was entirely withdrawn from her, we have only to trace her history down a few centuries, and we may see how destitute she was of that Spirit, and how low she had fallen.

In "A. D. 956 the Greek Church chose for their head and patriarch Theophylactus, at the age of sixteen years, he being given to sporting, and fond of the chase, kept more than three thousand dogs, and nearly two thousand horses."

Verily, could she fall much lower? If we can judge the stream by its head, the waters must have been very impure, at this time: it can hardly be expected that the stream would rise higher than its head. "It is related of him, that while celebrating divine service, on a holy Thursday, he, being informed that a favorite mare had foaled, immediately suspended the service, and went to the stable."—D. E. Cormenin.

But to follow this "mystic Woman," or "Great City," down the stream of time a little farther, we will take a view of the Western branch, or Latin Church. "During the reign of Pope Pius V., while undertaking the reform of some of the irregularities of the priests, he was expostulated with by the Cardinals, on the ground that it would be ruinous to the interests of the church to expel any of the 45,000 prostitutes who were then kept at Rome; for in such a case the clergy would practice sodomy; and also it would be ruinous to the apostolic treasury, as that was one of its greatest sources of revenue."—D. E. Cormenin, page 241, vol. ii. Truly the "Great City" "has fallen, and become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and the cage of every unclean and hateful bird."—Rev. xviii. 2.

My readers are aware, no doubt, that it was after the fall of Babylon, that the "kings and merchants of the earth commit fornication with her, and make themselves rich through the abundance of her delicacies."

That "the Great City" will fall in another sense, cannot be denied. The Church is also symbolized as a house. Read Mark xxiii. 37–39: "Behold your house is left unto you desolate." Our Saviour says, "A house divided against itself cannot stand."

I will now endeavor to show that the mystic woman, great city, or adulterous house, has been "divided into three parts; and that the elements of division are still working in her, which will cause her entire overthrow, or bring her to nought; like a "mill-stone cast into the sea," it will rise no more; or a house divided against itself, it must come to nought.

I will now quote as a witness, an extract from a letter written by the Bishop of Orleans to the Archbishop of Mechlin, during the sitting of the last Ecumenical Council. In his arguments against the proclamation of the dogma of infallibility he says, "In the ninth century we had the misfortune to lose about one-half of the church:" (referring to the separation of the Greek branch from the Latin).

Again he says, "In the sixteenth century we lost one-third of the remaining half." The English branch separated from the Latin at that time. In A. D. 1532, King Henry VIII. declared the English Church free and independent.

Here we have come to see the fulfilment of the word, "And the great city was divided into three parts." And if it was a spiritual edifice or house that was alluded to, I think it is evident that she has fallen as low as she possibly can.

It may be claimed by some, that the Church of England was the offspring or daughter, of the mystic "Woman." Such persons only need examine the cause of their separation, and the mode of government, in the early history of the English branch, to discover the absurdity of such a claim.

The causes of the offspring of the mystic Woman, are, and ever have been, a desire on the part of some individual members to work reforms in the body; and for the want of toleration, they were obliged to separate from that body. This was not the cause of King Henry's separation from the Latin branch, but a desire to increase his own power, as we shall see.

His first act was to "levy a tax of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling, or $726,000,000, to be paid annually by the Church, in defense of the State. The parliament approved the decree." Church and State are still united, or, in other words, the mystic Woman, although she has been "divided into three parts," has not broken off her adulterous connection, but is still united with her last husband; and further, we discover the same intolerance manifested in her as in her sisters.

About seventy years after the independence of the English branch, we find a little band of Puritans compelled to flee from under her motherly protection to Amsterdam, and then to London; and, afterward, to America, to enjoy the liberty of worshipping God according to the dictates of their own conscience. "The Church of England made the rejection of the Prayer-book and Communion punishable with death."

We think the fact that the mystic "City" has already been divided into three parts, has been well established.

We now come to notice the "cities of the nations," and their connection with the "Great City."

The angel informed John in explaining the vision, "And the woman which thou sawest, is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth."—Rev. xvii. 18. The vision portrayed a "woman, sitting upon many waters, . . . and her name was Babylon . . . Mother of Harlots," etc. The angel says, the woman is that "Great City." Now, she is represented as a mother of harlots; consequently her harlot daughters must represent the "cities of the nations." As we have not space in this short article to notice the early offspring of this famous "woman," I will only refer to the one already alluded to above, viz., the Pilgrims who came to this country for the purpose of enjoying the liberty to worship God agreeably to the dictates of their own consciences, with a purpose and determination to live a pure religion.

It needs no lengthy argument to prove that she, long since, "fell from her first love;" and, also, that she has become "lukewarm, neither cold, nor hot;" and, consequently, the Spirit of Deity has "spued her out of his mouth," and we have only to compare the early M. E. Church with the same branch at the present day.

Her humility, holy zeal, and spiritual life, when she first set foot upon this American soil, and her proud, boasting, covetous spirit of the present day, will well compare with the "vine planted by the apostles, and watered with their tears;" and the "woman" of the apocalypse. "Arrayed in purple and scarlet colors, and decorated with gold, and precious stones, and pearls."

It is not necessary to name over the numerous progeny of the old mother, here, but we will notice one more fact in connection with this subject; that is lest the old "mother" should fail to supply "all the nations with cities," the harlot daughters have by no means been barren or unfruitful, so far as increase in numbers is concerned; for it is said of the offspring, there is not a nation on the earth, at the present day, where there is not a "city" started of some denominational creed; and as soon as they are started, the seeds of division are sown, which will soon cause their annihilation.

I said I would show that there is still an element in the mother church, or "great city," which must cause her entire overthrow.

I will now close by quoting one witness as proof of the assertion. Father Hyacinth, in an appeal to the Bishops of Christendom for a Catholic reformation, says the decree of the Vatican Council must be annulled. "The pretentions of infallibility and temporal sovereignty must be overthrown, priestly celibacy abolished, the Bible put into everybody's hand," etc.

Now if this element is allowed to work, the "woman" will die a natural death; at the same time she will undoubtedly make a desperate struggle in her exit.

"Babylon the great is fallen is fallen, and become the habitation of devils," etc. Rev. 18:2.

Where is Babylon? It is not Rome, or Paris literal, any more than it is New York, or any other wicked city, in my opinion; but "wheresoever the carcass is, (body) there will the eagles be gathered together." There is to be a "Supper of the great God." Rev. 19:17, 21; and also, a "supper of the Lamb:" 9th verse; and there has been a voice sounding in our ears for many centuries, ever since the great city has fallen, "come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her plagues."

Oh that the Lord would "seal" us with that Spirit that shall make us one with the blessed LIFE-GIVER, that we may all be "accounted worthy to partake of the marriage" feast, and of being co-workers with Christ in the "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

Yours, in the blessed hope.

OSAGE, IOWA, March 17, 1871.

PREACH GREAT TRUTHS.

BY ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

MY mind dwells on the thought that there are truths which become more important by the time in which they are communicated—by the demand for the knowledge which they will impart, and by attendant facts and truths. There may be truths very important in themselves, bnt at the same time not so immediately demanded, (and hence not great, as others) while there are those again, which have had their time in their great profit, and may be only serviceable because of their relation to the important, "present truth."

The apostle urges his brethren to be established in the present truth. This is the truth for the time, and adapted to the uses and purposes of the revelation. Truth, as a force, is dispensational, or adapted to the wants of the world for the time. An abstract truth may have its uses in the preparation for the reception of the present one. It may be of vast interest to some mind, but lack the direct moving power that should give character to the time, or make the time itself.

"How is it," said Christ to his hearers, "that you do not discern this time?" What made that time? What made it undiscernable or mysterious to them?

The great truth of the time which they could not comprehend. It was the preaching of John the Baptist, and of Christ that gave character to the day. Its foreshadowing glory led old Simeon to feel that he could be translated. It made the people acknowledge that the power of God was revealed among them. It caused some to declare that "He is a prophet." It brought out the healing and life-giving power. It revealed the pardoning efficacy. It gave parables to the Jews. It gave the knowledge of the kingdom's mystery to the disciples. It hardened the Pharisees. It unmasked hypocrisy. It established a new standard of worship, and gave it to the world. It caused Peter to say, "thou art the Christ." Jesus preached what they had never before heard, and if they had, his manner was such that it was like the new light of heaven, come down to benighted hearts. Great truths then required, were then uttered.

There may be truths which are well-nigh obsolete; some which are displaced by further revelation; some that are only partial views, which in the nature of the case are not to hold when fuller and more perfect inculcation transpires. "When that which is perfect is come, that which is in part is done away." The partial, the weak, the past, the little, should be, and in the Divine arrangement is, replaced by the perfect, the strong, the present, the great.

That is the way that God has dictated all along. Moses had a truth which Abraham had not; at least the great name JEHOVAH was given him; and the prophets excelled even the law; and Solomon, the prophets; and Jesus was greater than even Solomon; while the apostles gave "a fuller and more perfect ray" than Jesus himself.

A great truth makes, indeed, the time great; hence, the men become great actors, whether the world will concede it or not, who speak the great things which qualify a great day.

The call of a man or body of men to a great mission signifies the inspiration which adapts them to speak the great sentiments of that work; and here we have the true secret of prophetic earnestness and apostolic zeal.

The devotion of a heart and life to a good cause seems to prepare a man for speaking with interest and power on that subject; and hence the theme is great. To bring a theme before the mind of a listener, which shall seem great, he must feel its importance. A great truth, even a new one, will impress another with a sense of its magnitude if it be preached as great, in all the force and earnestness which the very vastness implies.

I believe it was Garrick who said, the reason why actors affected their audiences so fully with fiction, while preachers did so little with truth, was that "actors present fiction as truth, and preachers present truth as fiction."

The thing needed now, more than ever, is the preaching of great truths. The times are degenerate; great errors prevail; mighty evils exist. Infidel forces systematize themselves; and with most eloquent and powerful appeals, attempt to drown the voice of Scripture and conscience; we have great and mighty manifestations of the Divine, the power of God in his own truth for to-day. Truth we have that the evil day we now realize, requires. God gives the word; he makes our mission; we may secure the inspiration, and speak in tones of thunder. Not merely in the foam of passion, in the earnestness of the world, if it have something good and great; but with the "Inspiration of the Almighty, giving an understanding," and a "mouth and wisdom which the adversaries cannot gainsay."

The time is so far known "that it is high time to awake out of sleep" and speak the new, living oracle with a fire that will awaken. Amen.

WHEN people have resolved to shut their eyes, or to look only on one side, it is of little consequence how good their eyes may be.—Bishop Whately.

THE DIAMOND.

KOH-I-NOOR is the name of one of the most brilliant and purest diamonds. This name was given it by an Asiatic Indian prince. He was so enraptured with the brilliancy of the beautiful gem, that he gave it this name—in English, "Mountain of Light."

It was found in the mountains of Golconda, before the Christian era. At the time of Christ, it was in the possession of the rajah of Oojein. For three hundred years it passed from father to son and kingdom to kingdom. It has been a trophy of war, and a guarantee of peace between nations. It has adorned the heads and sceptres of the great; it has been coveted by civilized and uncivilized nations.

In the fourteeth century it was in the possession of Alladin, who placed it among the treasures of Delhi. It was afterward won by a prince on a battle-field, was taken from him by his conqueror, Nadir Shah, and is now in England, and brilliantly blazes among other bright jewels which adorn the crown of the queen.

Portugal has one among the largest and most valuable diamonds known: if pure, of which there are many doubts, its probable value is $28,000,000, so rich, and beautiful, and precious, do men consider this little gem of God's creation.

The "Regent" or Pitt diamond is one of the finest and purest. Two years were required in cutting and fully developing all its beauty and splendor. It was purchased by the regent duke of Orleans, in 1743, costing over a half million dollars; it is now estimated at a million; it was placed by the great Napoleon in the hilt of his sword, and taken from him by the Prussians at the battle of Waterloo, 1815.

There is a universal desire among men to possess the diamond; it is displayed with the greatest pride and pleasure; millions of money have been spent to preserve and beautify this gem. It is the purest of all mineral substances, and is said to gather light in the daytime, and give it out in darkness.

But with all the purity and beauty and value of the diamond, it falls far below a precious stone known in the cabinet of God. It is called "a White Stone," "a Precious Stone," "a Tried Stone," "a Living Stone," "a Lively Stone." Thousands of kings, and men, and women, and children have possessed it, and like Nadir Shah, they have cried out with glowing hearts, "Christ is to me a mountain of light."

Millions of dollars may buy the richest and purest gems of kings, but no money can buy this precious stone. Diamonds have adorned kings, and sceptres, and swords, and royal robes, but this "New Stone" adorns not only kings and sceptres, and royal robes, but it adorns all conditions of life. Wherever it is possessed, and by whomsoever, new robes, new garments, and new crowns are seen. Purity and beauty and worth are enstamped upon all who possess it.

This "Living Stone" not only throws out its light by day, but is most brilliant where deepest darkness dwells. It is a solace in trouble and grief, a comfort in affliction, a rest for the weary, a light to the blind; it is a guide to the young, a stay and staff in old age; it gives hope in life, and triumph in the hour of death. It may be possessed by kings and rulers, the high and the low, the bond and the free; it beautifies the purest minds, and gives grace and loveliness to the darkest and most rebellious hearts.

This precious stone may be had without money, without labor, without price. It may be had now: all that is necessary is simply to ask, and it will be given. The precious stones of Golconda and Borneo require years of labor to get them, and years to make them beautiful, but with all this labor and pains, they can never throw out such floods of glorious light, and give such comfort, as does the stone found in the "Rock of Ages."—American Messenger.

BIBLE STORIES.

VIII.

JEALOUSY.

THERE is a fuller account of David in the Old Testament than there is of almost any other person.

His family, his acts, his life, and his death, are all spoken of.

He wrote the beautiful psalms. What child is there who does not love the twenty-third? David was a shepherd—he took care of the sheep, and so he says—"The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures, and leadeth me beside the still waters"

I want to tell you how jealous Saul was, and what a fearful thing jealousy is.

It is that evil and wicked spirit which torments, and makes the person in whom it is, angry, at hearing another person praised. No one can deliver us from its power but the Holy Spirit, sent by our heavenly Father.

Saul was tormented with jealousy, he was sad and gloomy, and the people around him sent for David to bring his harp and play on it. They hoped the sound of the harp would soothe and cheer him with its sweet glad music.

But it was David that Saul was jealous of. It was David that he had heard praised. Do you suppose the music did Saul any good? No. It did not. On the contrary he grew more and more enraged as the melody floated around, and raising his hand he threw his javelin with such force, that instead of striking David, who slipped aside, it pierced the wall and stood there quivering.

Saul sent messengers after David to watch for and kill him, but Michal, David's young wife, let him down from a window in the wall, and he escaped.

Was it not a pity that Saul was so wicked, so jealous? That all David's kindness, all his sweet music could kave no effect upon him?

Perhaps you wonder why Friends do not have singing and music in meetings. You see that music will not overcome our angry passions and make us good, though it may soothe and make us feel pleasant. We must ask our heavenly Father to assist us in every effort we make to do right.

But we thank him for sweet sounds as we may thank him for our daily food, for the lovely things we see, for the flowers and the green grass. We need not be afraid to enjoy any thing that comes from him, and all good things come from him. He gave us eyes to see bright and lovely colors. He gave us ears to hear the glad birds sing, the leaves to rustle, and the waters to murmur, and all sweet and harmonious sounds. Ah! how beautiful, how loving, and how kind is our heavenly Father. And the purer lives we lead, the more we can enjoy the wonderful pleasures he has bestowed upon us. And then like David we can say, "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want."—Scattered Seeds.

CAN'T RUB IT OUT.—"Don't write there," said a father to the son, who was writing with a diamond on his window.

"Why not?"

"Because you can't rub it out."

Did it ever occur to you, my child, that you are daily writing that which you can't rub out?

You made a cruel speech to your mother the other day. It wrote itself on her loving heart, and gave her great pain. It is there now, and hurts her every time she thinks of it. You can't rub it out.

You wished a wicked thought one day in the ear of your playmate. It wrote itself on his mind, and led him to do a wicked act. It is there now; you can't rub it out.

CHARLES DICKENS says there is nothing beautiful and good that dies and is forgotten. An infant, a prattling child, a youth well taught, will live again in the thoughts of those who loved it, and will play its part, though its body be burned to ashes or drowned in the deepest sea.

A CHEERFUL face does good to all around us. Amid the vexations, and trials and wearing cares of life, to carry even a cheerful face, how sweet it is!

A BIBLE VIEW OF HELL:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

MATTHEW XXIV.

BY D. J. ELLSWORTH.

"THE ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION;" IS IT IN THE PAST?

We propose to offer a few thoughts and suggestions upon this important question; not because it is fully settled in our own mind, or that we expect to settle it in the minds of others. There are many different opinions in regard to it, and it is certain that there remains a necessity for a careful and critical study of this chapter, not excepting, perhaps, the necessity of some event yet future that will bring the understanding of it to our minds and comprehension. Although we are commanded by our Saviour to understand what we read, yet why do we not understand? The solution will come sooner or later; but I have to confess that there are seeming insurmountable obstacles in the way of my believing with a great many, that that time of trouble, spoken of is in the past. To begin with the chapter.

Our Saviour, after intimating to the Jews that were gathered in the temple, the desolation that awaited them, for their iniquities, went out of the temple, and the disciples came to him, to ask him when this should be, and also, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" He tells them of false Christs; of wars and rumors of wars; but the end is not yet: tells them they shall be afflicted and killed, hated of all nations for His name's sake. They were to drink of the cup that He should drink, and be baptized with the baptism He was to be baptized with, for they declared that they were able. "All these are the beginning of sorrows." "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come."

Was this fulfilled in those days? If not, is it now? Emphatically, no. How wide is the "gospel of the kingdom" preached? Where do you hear it? Verse 15. The abomination of Desolation, spoken of by the prophet Daniel, chap. xii. 1. Those that beheld this abomination were told what to do, and what not to do. And then, "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be."

Now, were no mention made elsewhere concerning this great time of trouble, we should have no difficulty in understanding that what the Saviour said here, had its full and literal fulfilment at the destruction of Jerusalem, and the Jewish state.

Here lies the difficulty. The Saviour says of this time of trouble, that there has been nothing like it; no, nor ever shall be.

We turn to Dan. xii. 1, which all admit is still future, and he says, there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time.

If there is a man living that can reconcile this, and put a like, or greater time of trouble in the past, we should like to know it. Is not this, "Even the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be saved out of it." He was not, at the destruction of Jerusalem, nor has he been since. Who will answer this?

We now pass to the 29th verse. "Immediately after the tribulations of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken, and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven." I ask, did all this take place at that time? "When ye see these things, know that it is near, even at the door; verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled."

I believe these signs will be so clear and distinct, when shown, that those who are looking will know, and there will not be such jarring and discordant notes, as we have heard in the past.

"When ye see these things," etc. Did the Saviour come in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory? "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten Virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom." When did they go forth? Why! after they had seen these signs; showing that the Saviour was right at the door. He came while they were waiting, and yet alive. Many, I suppose, have believed, that this has had a fulfilment in our day; that the "Midnight Cry" was made in 1844, when so many went forth to meet the Saviour. His not coming at that time, it was declared to be the tarrying time. This arrangement rather turns things around from what is the order given by the Saviour. He declares that the midnight cry is made after they had gone forth, after they had slumbered and slept, after the bridegroom had tarried.

I fear that we have not taken heed to the admonition of Christ, "Take heed that no man deceive you," that we have not taken sufficient heed to His and the apostles' description of the state of the world at His coming. As it was in the days of Noah; as it was in the days of Lot. How then? High-handed wickedness filled the earth, and scarcely a righteous person to be found. Not salt enough mixed with them, for even the great mercy of God to spare them; not five righteous persons in all Sodom. "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Solemn question!

Far be it from me to say, My Lord delayeth His coming, neither let any charge me thus, while I yet look for that "Man of sin, the son of perdition" to be revealed. No Papal power or Papal ghost, typified as a woman, will stand for Paul's TERRIBLE MAN OF SIN.

No earthly power or potentate has ever yet declared, "No man shall buy or sell," save he wears a certain mark. No war upon the saints these many years, or likely soon to be; but come it will, as sure as the word of the Lord hath spoken, "I beheld, and the same horn made was on the saints, and prevailed against them, until the Ancient of Days came. . . . and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom."

It seems clear, to my mind, that in the book of Revelation, a persecution, yet future, upon the saints, is foreshown. Methinks those souls under the altar are waiting still until their fellow-servants, also, and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled.

The company which John saw upon the sea of glass, that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, together, perhaps, with that great multitude which came up out of great tribulation, may be made up of those, who, hereafter shall suffer, and even lose their lives for the name of Jesus. And it seems necessary. Oh! the fearful apostacy of these days, and what it will be a little while hence. The worldliness which is being manifested on every side, the following the fashion, the decking and dress worn by the professed followers of Christ, will surely bring upon them direful chastisements; "For the pride of man shall fall, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day."

Shall this wicked Gentile world escape with less severe judgments than was meted out to rebellious Israel? Certainly not. For, "indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon the Jew first, and upon the Gentile." The Jew has nearly reached the dregs of his cup; but oh! that "consumption decree, determined upon the whole earth," has never had its counterpart yet. "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, Behold, evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth; and the slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth, even unto the other end of the earth."

But the Lord will be the hope of His people, their fortress and their high tower. Let us abide in Him, that when the storms of wrath shall come we may be gathered under the shadow and care of the Almighty.

FAITH—HUMILITY.

"BY grace ye are saved, through faith."—"He that humbleth himself shall be exalted." True faith never doubts nor fears; no matter what trials, temptations or persecutions may be encountered, this confidence overrides all, and the possessor can boldly say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." But, we suppose that of all the Christian graces the hardest to cultivate is humility: it is so antagonistic to every impulse of the natural man. "The carnal mind is enmity against God;" why? because of its ambition. It disdains to be considered inferior to anything, and ever since the human mind fell from its first estate it has been incessantly endeavoring to invent schemes and theories for its own exaltation. And it has made pretty good progress; it has succeeded in making a large majority of the Christian world believe that it is immortal—that it is God, notwithstanding the inspired declaration that it is "enmity against God." Notwithstanding God has plainly told the natural man. "Dust thou art," man—professing to believe God—blandly claims to have a nature as lasting as his Creator, and disdains to be told that he is "of the earth, earthy." It is natural for man to desire wealth, influence and position, and it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to vie in the race for these attainments and maintain a due degree of Christian humility. Jesus truly remarked, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the Kingdom of heaven"—"Ye cannot serve God and mammon." No one can exercise full confidence in God, and faith in Jesus Christ, until he has become humble enough to look at himself as he is, and acknowledge the sphere that God has assigned him. No one can be truly trusting the Saviour for immortality—eternal life, who claims to have an immortal nature in himself. No one can be trusting God for food and raiment, who considers it necessary to devote all his own time and means, besides cheating his neighbor at every convenient opportunity, to obtain these things. No one can honestly pray, "Thy Kingdom come," who maintains that the Kingdom will never come, but that he will go to the Kingdom at death.

We have a beautiful illustration of faith and humility in the woman of Canaan, who besought Jesus to heal her daughter. Jesus and his disciples being Jews, it was not ordinarily considered proper for them to have any dealings with her, and he—probably to test her faith—made no reply. The disciples wanted him to send her away, on account of her crying after them. At length he told her that he was "not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel," yet she "worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me. But he answered and said, it is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs." This would ordinarily, especially in our day, have been considered a gross insult, and the woman would have indignantly left him. But there was FAITH to work there—which is "not of yourselves, it is the gift of God"—and faith is not so easily discouraged. "And she said, Truth, Lord; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from their master's table." There was also humility, which was not too proud to accept the position assigned her. She was after a blessing, and she had all faith in his ability to grant her request, and she was willing to bear any reproach for sake of the reward. Her humility allowed the exercise of her faith, and she was successful. "Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O, woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour."

We have quite a contrast in the case of the wealthy man who asked Jesus what he must do to inherit eternal life. Jesus referred him to the commandments, which he declared he had kept from his youth. Jesus then told him that he yet lacked one thing, and bade him sell all that he had and give to the poor; and he "went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions." Here was a lack of humility. He probably believed that Jesus could give him eternal life, but he was too proud to give up this world's goods and become poor in this life to gain an eternal life.

This was the rock upon which the Jews stumbled when they rejected the Messiah. He was a man of obscure parentage and humble demeanor, making no such ostentatious pretensions as they expected of their Messiah. He was beneath the dignity of the Scribes and Pharisees. But that was not all; he told them the truth about themselves, and they had not sufficient humility to accept it. He told them that they had no life in them, that eternal life could only be had through him—his resurrection. They could not bear that degradation; they considered themselves entitled by inheritance to the everlasting kingdom. Hence they rejected him; and Jesus left it on record that "The world hateth me because I testify of it that its deeds are evil." And it is just so to-day. Men are refusing to "seek for glory and honor and immortality" in the only legitimate way, because they are vain enough to suppose that they have immortality in themselves. Others are refusing to serve God, because they "cannot serve God and mammon," and cannot accept the humility of being poor. Others will not come to the table of the Lord and be filled, because they are too proud to acknowledge that they need anything.

"Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life."—The Nazarene.

THE SALVATION OF THE LORD.

A SERMON, BY W. N. PILE.

"It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord."—Lam. iii. 26.

MAN is a creature of hope. The Creator himself implanted this element. It is the basis of nearly if not quite all his actions. Memory may afford him a degree of pleasure in the recollection of the past; but hope must with respect to all that is future. We are ever reaching forward in our minds, and, as it were, living upon the future by way of anticipation. If, by force of circumstances, hope is excluded from the mind, despair necessarily takes its place, and the consequences are sometimes fearful in the extreme. It is "good," therefore, that a man should hope. Hope is not a simple element but a compound. An analysis of it reveals its component parts to be desire and expectation.

Desire implies an imperfect state—a state in which there is unsatisfied want. Expectation shows that the mind has evidence, upon which it relies for the possession of the desired good. Together these elements constitute hope; but when either is absent hope does not exist. We may instance the harmonious working of these two elements in the man of business. The object before him is profit, which is desired to satisfy a want; but if there was no evidence upon which he might justly ground a possibility of success, there would be nothing to call forth his energies to action. There would be no hope. He believes, however, that there are evidences sufficient to base expectation upon, and thus coupled with his desire constitutes hope, the result of which is the institution of active operations in order to the attainment of the desired object, and if the desire is an ardent one, calling forth all the energies of his being, that man will be successful, other things being equal. The man of business draws his reasons for his expectation from the law of "cause and effect," supported by example. He reasons that certain causes lead to certain results, and he has seen others accomplish the same end which he desires by instituting the same means.

We now notice that as expectation is based upon evidence believed to be sufficient, and as there can be no hope without expectation, therefore there can be no hope without faith; for although faith is not a component part of hope, it is the basis of one of its parts—expectation. This shows that every man in his daily experience exercises faith—yea, faith enough to save him if directed toward the proper object.

Again, it is shown that in asking "men to believe," God asks nothing impossible. We find then in the nature of man a basis for the Christian system (built as it is upon faith); and the adaptation of this system to his nature is one of the strongest proofs of its divine origin, revealing as it does that the author of the plan of redemption is also the CREATOR, for were it otherwise this perfect adaptation would not exist.

Thus far we have spoken of hope only as it relates to this life, in order to prove our first proposition; but hopes purely human are of short duration. Death all too soon puts its period to them all. But underlying this hopeful element in man's nature is his love of life; for "while there is life there is hope." His love of life is as strong as his desire for good, for he associates the desired good with life. He would extend life beyond its natural limits were it in his power. In other words, he desires a future or an immortal life. This desire has been adduced as evidence for regarding man as inherently immortal in his essential personality; but his desire reveals a want unsatisfied, hence is of itself proof that immortality is set before us as an incentive to holiness, to be sought by "patient continuance in well doing." "What a man seeth why doth he yet hope for?"

Again, this desire for a future life is not of itself a hope of one as we have seen—it wants the element of expectation. Having seen that expectation cannot exist without evidence, it follows that in order that man should have hope of a future life, the evidence must come from a supernatural power (one that can bestow a future life) in the form of a revelation containing a promise of such life. Expectation based upon the promise of God, joined to our desire, makes "the hope of the promise. The "Scriptures of truth" contain such a promise.

But just here we are involved in a new question, viz., is a future life, the object of our desire, as contemplated in the "promise" of God, conditional or unconditional? If unconditional, then every man who desires a future life may ground expectation upon such promise and have hope of the same; but if conditional, then notwithstanding the promise of God and the desire of man, he has no hope unless he sustains the proper relationship to the promise. The Scriptures reveal a "broad" and a "narrow" way; one leads "to destruction," the other to "life." "Many" throng the former, while in the latter there is "here and there a traveller." This description of the two ways is followed by an exhortation to "strive (agonize) to enter in at the strait gate," the entrance to the "way of life."

It being conceded that a life beyond the present is here meant, the promise is proved to be conditional. If conditional, then in the very nature of the case, FAITH should and must be the condition; for faith, grasping the promise as evidence, is the basis of expectation, which is necessary to hope. Again, as we have seen in the man of business, that without expectation of success his efforts would be paralyzed, it follows that if the Divine being has made a future life, or immortality, conditional upon "patient continuance in well doing," FAITH, as the basis of expectation, is the ONLY principle which could enlist his energies and cause him to act in view of a future life. This again proves the Divine authorship of the plan of "Salvation" for faith is the condition! "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him."—John iii. 36.

The "hope" of our text is "the salvation of the Lord."

This implies two things: first, that man needs salvation, hence he is exposed to peril, and, second, the peril to which he is exposed, is one from which the LORD (through faith) can alone save him.

"Salvation" means "life." The excellent rendering of Murdoch represents Jesus as a "LIFE-GIVER," a "vivifier," and gives "life" instead of "salvation." This agrees perfectly with Jesus' statement of his mission, "I am come that they might have life."—John x. 10. As future life is "salvation," the peril to which man is exposed, and from which "the Lord" proposes to save him on condition, is the antitheses of life—death. This is the peril. As evidence the statement of God to Adam is in point: "Thou shalt surely die;" also Paul's testimony: "The wages of sin is death."

The terms "die" and "death" in these passages, have not the theological sense of "alienation from God" which is sometimes attached to them; neither do they denote unending suffering, but the loss of that principle of life which Adam possessed, as the direct result of his creation, and which has been communicated by him through the law of generation. Physical death then is the peril. No other death appears in the doctrine of atonement. "Christ died for our sins," yet neither "alienation from God" (spiritual death) or "eternal misery" appear in the death of Christ. Atonement would have been impossible upon either hypothesis. But Christ died a physical death: his "blood," as the principle of natural life, was the redemption price. The loss of this natural principle of life, the blood, would have proved an eternal loss of conscious existence, had he not been previously provided with the principle of a spiritual life, upon which the law had no claim; but he had such a principle, the result of perfect obedience, by which he rose again, for it was "impossible" that he should be holden of death. This peril the race was exposed to—death in a state of nature which would have proved an eternal loss of life—but "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 16. The peril was antecedent to the provision for escape. The provision brings no new danger, but proposes "salvation" from one already existing. The salvation, then, is "life from the dead." By this it will be seen that the wicked dead are not perished simply because they are dead, but rather because that during their natural life they failed to provide themselves with the principle of a future life.

If men are "ransomed from the grave," their salvation is "of the Lord," for he instituted the provision; but while this salvation is "by grace," it is "through faith," hence we must make it operative in our behalf by complying with its conditions. It being a "good thing" that men should "hope," the LORD, in the first promise brought this "salvation" to view—"the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." Here the stream of "salvation" took its rise in the promise "of the Lord." Christ is that promise, therefore, to grasp the promise is to grasp the Christ. When Simeon took the infant Jesus in his arms he exclaimed, looking up to heaven, "Mine eyes have seen thy salvation." Life or salvation then is in Jesus; therefore he becomes the teacher as well as the exemplar of it. He comes to teach the "way of life," therefore he must reveal the manner of its bestowal. Not only so, he must, after have taught a future life, illustrate his teaching by an example.

Note first, then, his teaching: "And this is the Father's (the Lord's) will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day."—John vi. 39. This is the essence of all Christ's teaching. All who comply with the requirements of the gospel are given to the Son, and though they die as actually as others, yet they are not lost, for in order to save them from being lost, Christ will raise them up at the last day. The method, then, in Christ's teaching, of bestowing "salvation," is the resurrection from the dead, or from among those who are lost because they do not belong to the Son.

Now note the example of this resurrection. When the two Marys went to the sepulchre where the crucified had been laid, an angel whose "countenance was like lightning," spake from within and said to them: "Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, which was crucified. He is not here: for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay."—Matt. xxviii. 5, 6; Mark xvi. 5, 6. The precept and example are suited to each other. A resurrection embracing the unit man was taught and illustrated thus, proving that the "salvation of the Lord" is "life from the dead."

Christ's "salvation" was "of the Lord." Paul writes thus: "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from (ek, out of) death, and was heard in that he feared; though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered; and being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him."—Heb. v. 7–9. The Father raised him out from the dead. Now this example of the resurrection must sustain a proper relation to the resurrection or "salvation" of all others—as many as "obey him." This relationship is that of the "first-fruits" to the harvest. 1 Cor. xv. 20. The "corn of wheat," that would have produced nothing without death, being "planted," brings forth "much fruit" as the result. The "much fruit" comprises as many as have also "been planted in the likeness of his death." These shall be in the "likeness of his resurrection." See John xii. 24; Rom. vi. 5.

Christ's resurrection being the pledge of that of all that "obey him," it follows that "Christ in you" is the "hope of glory." He has passed up through the resurrection into glory, and left behind a pathway for us. The light from his "salvation" streams down through the shadowy recesses of hades, and over the sleeping saints throws the glory of a future life. Salvation from death and "glory" are equivalent. 1 Cor. xv. 42–44; Rom. viii. 10, 11, 16, 21; Luke xx. 35, 36. "Salvation" and "resurrection" being blended, he who obtains one will also the other.

Our text not only says that it is "good for a man" to "hope" for the "salvation of the Lord," but to "quietly wait" for it. This reveals the fact that "the salvation of the Lord" is not continually progressing, but has its chronology. The poet says:

"One by one they are ferried o'er;"

Not so says our text, but "wait." This "salvation" is clearly located by the inspired writers. It is "ready to be revealed in the last time."—1 Pet. i. 5. Christ places it at the "last day." John vi. 39. It comes at the "end of faith." 1 Pet. i. 9–13. It is therefore the fruition of hope; for "what a man seeth why doth he yet hope for?" While the church "waits" she "hopes." While she hopes she is unsaved. Jesus Christ, the church's "resurrection," will "appear the second time without sin unto salvation," to those who "look for him."—Heb. ix. 28.

This not only locates "salvation" at the coming of the "Lord himself," but reveals the true position of the church. Waiting! Desire! Expectancy! Hope!

Be "like unto men that wait for their Lord," said the Saviour. Luke xii. 36. Having "turned to God from idols," we are to "serve the living and true God," and "wait for his Son from heaven."—1 Thess. i. 9 10. We are to "come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."—1 Cor. i. 7. With earnest desire the church is to be "hasting unto the coming of the day of God," (2 Pet. iii. 12,) and in response to the various evidences now betokening the Master's speedy return, she is to say "Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."—Rev. xxii. 20. But in the intensity of our desire for this blessed "salvation," we are liable to impatience, hence we are not only exhorted to "wait," but to "quietly wait." "Our fond desires would pray him down," but we are to "rest in the Lord and wait patiently for him."—Psa. xxxvii. 7. Let Paul's prayer in our behalf be answered: "The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ."—2 Thess. iii. 5.

Occupying this position we shall, in "a little while," "see the salvation of God."

SUFFERING FOR CHRIST.

"Unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for his sake."—Phil. i. 29.

"Think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: But rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy."—1 Peter iv. 12, 13.

"The suffering of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us."—Rom. viii. 18.

THESE passages teach that the Christian course in this present life is to be one of warfare, toil, and suffering. There is no intimation that what are esteemed pleasures, enjoyments, and emoluments by the seekers after worldly good, shall ever be the possessions of God's children; they are distinctly forewarned that it is through much tribulation they shall enter the kingdom; and that their career lies through persecution's flames, worldly deprivations, hatred, and many diverse forms of afflictions and suffering. True, godliness is great gain, and has the promise of the present life as well as of that which is to come. And it is great gain; for the spiritual profit that accrues to the truly godly these very sufferings is more than a compensation for the loss of ease and comfort, even in this present world. The peace, patience, submission to God's will as manifested in his providences: the intimate knowledge of God's purposes in these adverse dispensations and cheerful acquiescence therein, acquired alone by such an experience, is gain of inestimable value. Ask the sufferer if he would be willing to relinquish such acquisitions and such knowledge for those learnt in the school of prosperity. At some period of his life he has had experience in that school, but he has found how insufficient are its acquirements for solid peace and comfort, even in this life. Does he not realize with unalterable conviction that "all things work together for good to those who love God?" and knowing that the deeper the humiliation the higher the corresponding exaltation, he feels that his sufferings are indeed gain beyond computation.

The gospel is so truly regarded as joyful news of glad tidings; and the good providence of God has so removed the outward disabilities that in days of primitive Christianity accompanied a public acknowledgment of Him; and it is so persistently represented that the Church is to go on in one brilliant career of conquest—conquering and to conquer—until sin is exterminated by its progress, and peace, prosperity, and righteousness reign throughout all her borders; that all we have to do is to believe and appropriate God's expiatory work, and we have discharged our Christian obligations; that nothing on our part is possible or required; and, consequently, vast numbers are settled at their ease in Zion, with very wrong impressions as to what is involved in a profession of religion. "Wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." We are to "rejoice ever more," and the consciousness of forgiven sin and ultimate salvation, should so fill our hearts with gladness, and so manifest itself on our countenance and in our demeanor, that many may thus be allured to these pleasant paths who would be deterred from entering by the repulsion of a sad and lengthened visage.

True, but cannot Christians rejoice even in tribulation? Are not wisdom's ways those of pleasantness and her paths peace when our earthly horizon is only overclouded with gloom? When our Lord tells us that we are to be crucified with him, and that the cross we are to bear must be a daily one, do we not then find wisdom's ways pleasantness and her paths peace? Do we realize it thus only in the converse of this? Do we find joy, pleasure, and profit only in an exemption from suffering? Can we rejoice ever more only when the rod is not applied? And in everything give thanks only when fortune's smiles and joy's perpetual cheer beam gaily around us? St. James tells us to count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations. St. Paul says that it is given unto us not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for his sake. And St. Peter assures us if we are reproached for the name of Christ, happy are we. Oh! have such persons only learnt the first principles of the doctrine of Christ? And have they never yet experienced the sublime joy of suffering for His sake? Christ has suffered so much on their behalf, that they feel all they have to do is to revel in the anticipation of a consummated salvation and a secured kingdom with its glorious accompaniments. And, as they are content with so little, God allows them to choose their own portion. To reign with him as his bride is optional with them, but the cross involves too much sacrifice, self-denial, suffering. They will have the full glories and results of redemption in this present life, and hereafter must be satisfied to take very low places in the kingdom. Those who can only rejoice when prosperity's sun shines with unclouded rays, and when God's providences are only agreeable to their natural feelings and tastes, and are grieved if a severe course of discipline compromises their ease and enjoyment, are those who follow Him for the sake of the loaves and fishes,—who do not love Him for himself alone in distinction from his gifts. They have not duly counted the cost of the warfare, and although they have laid the foundation, they are not able to finish the superstructure. Although they may be saved, so as by fire, yet they must ultimately suffer loss; and their wood, hay and stubble consumed in the flames kindled for the destruction of incorrigible sinners. It is sad, indeed, to have a portion even temporarily with such; and sadder still to think of eternal exclusion from kingly dignities and bliss. The religion of the present day seems to be such an easy and pleasure-taking one, that so many are led astray by false teaching, that we are convinced this subject imperatively demands earnest attention at this time.

Our blessed Lord has never given any intimation that the cross shall be removed from his Church in the present age, either in its aggregate capacity, or as regards individual members of it. They are to mourn and fast all the days of the Bridegroom's absence: for the fact of his protracted tarrying is a sufficient cause for sorrow, irrespective of the personal trials and sufferings to which they are subjected. He forewarns his disciples of the many hardships, toils, and persecutions which they must undergo, and gives not the slightest encouragement to hope that the experience of His children in the succeeding ages of the world shall be essentially different from that of His primitive disciples. There may be many dissimilar forms of suffering and trial, but the fact itself remains, that "all that will live godly in Jesus Christ shall suffer persecution." There is a time of blessed release to be anticipated with joy and gladness; but it is not to be in the present dispensation, when the servant must be as his Lord, and by his humiliation be prepared for his subsequent exaltation,—to make the correspondence between his earthly career and that of his blessed Master as complete as possible. The idea seems to be widely prevalent that the performance of a routine of outward religious duties, and rejoicing in the prospect of salvation, is the full accomplishment of our Christian obligations. We have previously shown that an entire consecration of ourselves and our possessions to His disposal,—in spirit and in truth,—is absolutely essential to the completion of the perfect man in Christ Jesus; and we now wish to demonstrate that suffering for His sake is a part of the glorious process, and our great privilege as well as duty.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, MAY 17, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

"In Heaven an Hour."

A certain "orthodox" paper, speaking of the death of a prominent brother, says:

"On the evening of the 16th he dictated about half a column of matter found in this issue. On the morning of the 17th he expressed a wish to dictate more in the afternoon, at four o'clock. When that time came he had been in heaven an hour."

He died, it seems by the account, just before three o'clock; or, as it is expressed, "passed into heaven as gently as the stars of morning go out."

Several thoughts or questions rushed into our mind on reding this article.

1. Where do the Scriptures use such language in recording the death of saints?

2. Did this brother "pass into heaven" quicker than David? Peter, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, said, on the day of Pentecost, "David is not ascended into the heavens:" but David died a thousand years before. "Orthodoxy" found this brother "in heaven" the very moment of his death: he outstript David a long time, it seems.

3. Why are Christians of these days so much wiser than the Bible? That book represents the dead saints as having "fallen asleep;" and never as going to heaven at death.

4. If the representation above be correct, then the record of the death of saints, or their approach to it, could be amended by the substitution of the phrases which orthodoxy uses and make sense. Let us try it.

"An evil beast hath devoured him: Joseph is without doubt" [passed into heaven]. "I will go down into" [heaven] "unto my son mourning."—Gen. xxxvii. 33, 35. "Then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow" [into heaven].—Gen. xlii. 38. "It shall come to pass, when he seeth the lad" [Benjam] "is not with us, that he" [Jacob] "will" [pass into heaven:] "and thy servants shall bring down the gray hairs of thy servant our father with sorrow" [into heaven].—Gen. xliii. 31. "So Joseph" [passed into heaven,] "being a hundred and ten years old; and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt."—Gen. l. 26.

"The days of David drew nigh that he should" [pass into heaven].—1 Kings ii. 1. Compare this with Acts ii. 34. "David is not ascended into the heavens." "In those days Hezekiah was sick unto" [passing into heaven]. "And Isaiah came unto him, and said, Thus saith the Lord" . . . "thou shall" [pass into heaven] "and not live." . . . "And Hezekiah wept sore."—Isaiah xxxviii. 1–3. "When thou shalt be old, thou shall stretch forth thine hands, and another shall gird thee and carry thee whither thou wouldst not. This spake Jesus, signifying by what" [passing into heaven] "he should glorify God."—John xxi. 18, 19. Peter, it seems, "would not" like to go there.

"Manoah said unto his wife, We shall surely" [pass into heaven,] "because we have seen God. But his wife said unto him, If the Lord were pleased to" [pass us into heaven] "he would not have received a burnt-offering at our hands."—Judges xiii. 22, 23. "Epaphroditus was sick nigh unto [passing into heaven], "but God had mercy on him;" etc.—Phil. ii. 27.

"Jesus said unto them plainly, Lazarus is" [passed into heaven]. "Then said Martha to Jesus, Lord if thou hadst been here my brother had not" [passed into heaven]. "Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall" [come out of heaven] "again." They came to the grave. "Jesus said, Take ye away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was" [gone into heaven] "saith unto him, Lord by this time he stinketh for he hath been" [in heaven] "four days." . . . "Then they took away the stone, where" [he that was gone to heaven] "was laid." Jesus "cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. And he that was" [in heaven] "came forth bound hand and foot with grave-clothes," etc.

These samples are sufficient to show the unscriptural method some people have in expressing themselves in relation to those who have "fallen asleep in Christ," and who await "the resurrection, at the last day."

Such language as that employed above, by "orthodoxy," never occurs in the Scriptures of truth: and the direct tendency of it is to inspire false hopes, and to deceive the living in relation to the dead. Such teaching it is that has made void "the resurrection of the dead" in Christ," and led to the spirit-rapping delusion of these last days.

If our voice could be heard, we would entreat all Christians to speak on this subject as the "oracles of God," that they may not any longer discredit the resurrection, nor lend their influence to spirit-rapping. It is not agreeable to us to find fault with those who love the Lord Jesus Christ; but we beg of them to use Scripture language when they speak of death. Death is nothing desirable. It cannot be to any enlightened mind. It is "the last enemy," which will ever hold dominion over those in Christ, and is only to be divested of its deadly power by "the resurrection of the last day." Till then it holds "dominion" over those "who have fallen asleep in Christ." At that day, shall the saints arise from the dead victorious and triumphant. They die, or fall asleep, in "hope" of that victory "at the last trump." Till then they do not "ascend into the heavens:" David did not, and there is not a promise in the Bible that any other saint shall "pass into heaven" at death.

We have made the foregoing remarks with no hostile feelings towards those who employ the unscriptural language we have spoken of; nor with any lack of charity towards them. We know too well the power of phraseology with which we have been familiar from our youth; especially as connected with those we love, who have fallen asleep in death. Our love for these slumbering ones leads us, without due consideration, to think them "in heaven," because we dislike to think of them as really in an unconscious state. But an unbiased examination of Scripture will lead us to see that we have no authority to look for "comfort" concerning them except in the "return" of Christ "from heaven," and their "resurrection at the last day:" "for the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ SHALL RISE first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words."—1 Thess. iv. 16–18.

Such is Bible ground of comfort; and such is the hope of the gospel; and no authority from the Scriptures is given for speaking of the saints, who have fallen asleep in Christ, as being "in heaven." No: it is a "tradition of men." Shall this tradition be suffered still to blind our minds to the glories of the resurrection by "the Lord Jesus Christ, our hope?"

"Search the Scriptures."

If men were as anxious to grow in divine knowledge as they are to build up their sects and parties, we should see a different state of things in the Christian world to what appears in these days. The fact is, in these last times, professed Christians have had their understandings placed in old creeds, where they are compressed as Chinese compress the feet of their children by placing them in iron shoes: no matter what the torture is, they must wear them, till instead of well-developed "understandings" they possess mere clubs to walk on. So it has, unfortunately, been in divine things. Iron creeds have been employed for centuries to cramp and make mere "clubs" of the minds of men professing to be Christians; and they dare not look into the Scriptures of truth without first putting on the iron cramps, called "creeds, confessions of faith, or, articles of religion," wrought out for them by men as fallible as themselves, and with not half the means of knowing the truth now enjoyed. The result is, a dwarfed religion, so far as Biblical knowledge is concerned, and a weakness against infidel objections and spiritualistic notions, which tend to bring religion itself into contempt by thinking, intelligent men. If all Christian men were thoroughly imbued with the importance of taking no doctrine at second hand, or from the creeds of men, however good and honest those men might have been, we would find true Scriptural knowledge greatly increased and increasing, The reverse of this, alas, is true, in general, and Christianity suffers in consequence.

If Puritanism had been a perfect form of Christianity, if it had been thoroughly imbued with the spirit of progressive advancement, if it had been as zealous in searching for the new paths of God's word, as it was in inquiring after the "old paths" of theology, the disastrous reaction which is witnessed in religious character would have been avoided. The noble-hearted Robinson, when he bade farewell to the Pilgrims at Leyden, gave them this advice:

"Brethren: We are now quickly to part from one another, and whether I may ever live to see your faces on earth any more, the God of heaven only knows; but whether the Lord has appointed that or no, I charge you, before God and his blessed angels, that you follow me no farther than you have seen me follow the Lord Jesus Christ.

"If the Lord reveal anything to you, by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive any truth by my ministry; for I am verily persuaded, the Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of his holy word. For my part, I cannot sufficiently bewail the condition of the reformed churches, who are come to a period in religion, and will go at present, no farther than the instruments of their reformation. The Lutherans cannot be drawn to go beyond what Luther saw: whatever part of his will our God has revealed to Calvin, they will rather die than embrace it; and the Calvinists, you see, stick fast where they were left by that great man of God, who yet saw not all things.

"This is a misery much to be lamented; for, though they were burning and shining lights in their times, yet they penetrated not into the whole counsel of God, but, were they now living, would be as willing to embrace further light as that which they first received. I beseech you remember it is an article of your church covenant, that you be ready to receive whatever truth shall be made known to you from the written word of God. Remember that, and every other article of your sacred covenant. But I must herewithal exhort you to take heed what you receive as truth; examine it—consider it, and compare it with other scriptures of truth, before you receive it—for it is not possible the Christian world should come so lately out of such thick anti-Christian darkness, and that perfection of knowledge should break forth at once."

Reports.

"Report, say they, and we will report it." So some men talk because they have nothing better to talk about. Br. S. Cooper, of Woodstock Valley, Conn., writes us that, "The report is in circulation, among preaching brethren and others, . . . that Br. Storrs has recently renounced his belief in the non-resurrection of the wicked. Now, Br., if this report is false, in toto, please for the brethren and the truth's sake let us know it, that we may meet it with a positive denial."

Opponents who wish to cover one with odium whose arguments they cannot refute, manufacture and report what they please, or what their fancies can invent. If we have "renounced our belief in the non-resurrection of the wicked," you all know it as well as these reporters. We are not in the habit of speaking in doubtful language of our position on doctrines. If Br. Cooper does not know the report to be true, he may take it for granted it is a falsehood, invented for mischief. We do not intend to follow all these mischief-makers in their work of defamation or exultation. We trust they will be more filled with the love of God, by and by, than they have ever yet been, and understand His love to "the world" better than they seem to at present.

We refer Br. Cooper, and all others who wish to know what our views at present are, to our Pamphlet, just about to be issued. After reading it carefully, if you say we have modified our views on the Life theme, you say the truth; but if any one says, we have "renounced our belief in the non-resurrection of the wicked," they say what is not true.

We may add, here, we have no belief in the resurrection of any man, after he is dead, for the purpose of torment, (limited or otherwise), and to die again. No man, be he who or what he may, will ever be revived from the dead except as an act of God's love and mercy to him. Does that thought displease any one who is "made perfect in love?" or, who has become filled with love to God and men, so as to be like Him who prayed on the cross, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do?" Blessed be God for such a Mediator. May our spirit be like His.

It will be seen that our modified views on the Life theme are not a contradiction, but an "enlargement;" for which, we praise and adore the God of Love; and if our natural life is to close soon, we rejoice that the Lord has enabled us to do this last work; and there is no one manifestation our Father in heaven has ever made to us which kindles the flame of His love in our heart so high, or gives us so much joy as this; and none which we believe is more to His glory. If this is to be the finishing work of our present life, we thank and bless the Lord God and the Lamb that we have been raised up from our late sickness to accomplish it, and have had strength given us to do it. Our heart is enlarged; and we commit all to Him who will yet "destroy the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations."—Isa. xxv. 7.

Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

"For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."—2 Cor. v. 1–9.

Our author, in his opening remarks on this text, affirms that they who deny the existence of an immaterial soul-entity find "this passage, like many others," "difficult to dispose of." Of a certain writer's explication of the text he remarks, "that his effort is not to bring out the obvious meaning of the text, but to destroy it, and make a noise to bewilder the reader." He finally more than intimates that said writer uses certain arguments because they "are absolutely necessary to make a smoke under which to murder the text."

A certain noted author was, while on his death-bed, afforded blessed peace and comfort by the thought that he could not remember to have written any thing which, standing upon the threshold of the tomb, he would recall, were it in his power to do so. The above noted and many other similar remarks of Mr. George must be thought by every cultivated mind, whether religious or not, to be very unworthy a professed lover of Jesus. It is not easy to see how he could so far forget the high and holy principles he professes, and doubtless does labor to maintain, as to be found thus impugning the motives of other servants of Christ. To every Christian reader it presents proof of the great need of prayerful care lest we bring reproach upon the cause of righteousness.

Casting over the remarks the mantle of charity, and assuming that they were made under the influence of some undue momentary excitement which prevented a recognition of their full import, we will cherish the hope that whether lying at the door of death, or whether standing before the judgment seat of Christ, where, as said Paul, believers must all appear, his thoughts may not be haunted by recollections of them, nor any future hours made sad by vain wishes that they had never been uttered.

The text, not unlike others, is a "difficult one to dispose of," and we humbly suggest to our "Rev." author and to all others the eminent propriety and wisdom of not attempting it. The experiment would of necessity prove extremely hazardous. No, good Christian friend George, don't undertake to dispose of it yourself; and if you find any one else trying to do so, dissuade them, if possible, from the undertaking. Prayerfully and carefully seek to understand it, and then it will not be thought necessary to dispose of it. He asks:

"If man is not a compound being, what is the we dwelling and groaning in the 'tabernacle;' the we 'at home in the body;' the we which can be 'absent from the body, and be present with the Lord;' the we who 'know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved,' we have a heavenly building?"

In reply to the above we remark, that, beyond all reasonable question, the we of whom Paul spoke were himself and the Corinthian brethren to whom he wrote. Our seeming excited author says: "The honest mind perceives at once that the sentiment is, that men may be absent from the body in a conscious state." Only the dishonest mind, then, "perceives" otherwise. How sad, how very sad is it to find a Christian writer manifesting such a spirit in opposing what he believes, of course, to be error. We should think he would esteem it wise, nay indispensable to evince that sweet spirit of Christian kindness and tenderness which dwells richly in hearts that love the Master and are consecrated to his service, and which followers of Jesus should always manifest in defending what they believe to be truth, leaving results with God. Doing otherwise reveals a want of faith in infinite power and wisdom, and brings reproach upon that in the supposed interests of which it is indulged.

That the texts teach a conscious existence of some part of man (the real man, as is claimed) between death and the resurrection is a bold assumption, for if it be not true that man is capable of such existence, then an explication which precludes that idea must be adopted. Then again, the language could not be held to necessarily teach an intermediate conscious existence, even were it admitted that man is immortal, for Paul evidently had no reference to an intermediate state of any kind.

It is maintained by most of those who affirm immortality of man, that the soul—a living, thinking immateriality—exists in a conscious state between death and the resurrection. How, upon such a theory, and that the "tabernacle," the "earthly house" is the human body, can the expression, "we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," be harmonized with their belief in the resurrection of the body? If Paul asserts by implication that a soul-entity goes to heaven, or some other place of happiness, at death, he also asserts that that soul-entity is, when it leaves the body, clothed upon with "an house not made with hands," a "building of God," which is eternal. Thus the soul has an eternal body given it at death, and at the resurrection the two entities must be put into the resurrected body, and so man will thenceforth be composed of a soul and two bodies. Defenders of the popular theory cannot escape this conclusion, extremely absurd though it is. If, in attempting to escape it, they urge that the heavenly "building," or "house" is the state of heavenly blessedness, etc., then the question arises, why not apply the same rule of exposition to the expression "earthly house?" Consistency would demand that it be done notwithstanding the fact that doing it would render the text utterly useless to their theory.

Dr. Lange remarks:

"The present tense would seem to refer to some period immediately after death. But if the soul is to have a body corresponding to its condition at that time (of which, to say the least, the Scriptures distinctly say nothing) then the dwelling here mentioned cannot be eternal. Nor would what is said in ver. 2 of our house which is from heaven, agree very well with such an assertion."

The apostle is not, as is generally understood, speaking of the human body, but of the state of man in the present condition of things; and he contrasts it with the state which will exist after the resurrection, the final consummation. The present state of man is compared to a temporary residence in a transitory tabernacle, fixed upon the ground for a short time, then taken to pieces. Man's state in a future, or resurrection life is compared to a residence in a magnificent building, such as no human power can make, and which will endure eternally, not being liable to ruin, nor to be taken to pieces; a building of which God is the maker, and which He will, in his appointed time send down from heaven. Agreeably to this a learned divine who wrote about fifty years ago, says:

"And here it is proper to observe, that the apostle does not affirm that the virtuous in a future state will dwell in heaven, but only that the house, which is hereafter intended for them, is now in heaven, and will at the proper time descend into this world, which he more explicitly asserts in the next verse. The meaning, therefore, of the apostle's declaration, stripped of its metaphorical dress, is this: We know that when the present frail and mortal state is passed, it will be succeeded by a state of everlasting glory and felicity, which God has prepared for all his faithful servants."

"For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life."—Ver. 4. Of this verse, the same writer says:

"In this state of frailty and suffering, we who are heirs of the promised inheritance often groan under the pressure of fatigue, affliction, and persecution, and earnestly desire to be released from the burden. Not indeed that we desire death for its own sake, and much less do we covet that state of insensibility to which death, for a time reduce us: the object of our desire is, to enter upon a new and happy state of existence, and if possible, to escape the pains of dying, and the disgrace of the tomb, so that this frail, mortal condition might be immediately absorbed and lost in a state of immortality and blessedness."

Says Archbishop Whately:

"This passage would, I say, of itself, seem to relate to the condition of the soul separate from the body; and indeed some commentators have referred to it as regarding the separate state. But they should have remembered that the apostle is most evidently alluding to the state, whatever it is, in which we are to appear before Christ's judgment seat; so that if we are then to have bodies, he cannot be supposed, without a very forced and harsh interpretation, to be speaking of a separate state, in the words immediately preceding.

"And if you look a little further back, Paul himself furnishes a ready interpretation of his own expression here: 'We know,' says he, 'that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God—a house not made with hands—eternal in the heavens.' . . . Having spoken of the burden of that corruptible body which we now inhabit, he adds this caution, on purpose, as it seems, to guard against the supposition that the deliverance he looks for from this burden, is a separate state of the soul: What we desire, he says, is, 'not to be unclothed' (namely, as in a separate state), but the hope we cherish is, he says, 'to be clothed upon,' that is, to have an addition made to what we now possess, by being placed in a far superior habitation."

We quote also from Milton, who says:

"It is sufficiently apparent, however, that the object of this passage is not to inculcate the separation of the soul from the body, but to contrast the animal and terrestrial life of the whole man with the spiritual and heavenly. Hence in the first verse 'the house of this tabernacle' is opposed, not to the soul, but to 'a building of God, a house not made with hands,' that is, to the final renewal of the whole man, as Beza also explains it, whereby 'we are clothed upon.' (The E. V. adds, ver. 2, 'with a house which is from heaven') 'being clothed . . . not naked,' ver. 3. This distinctly appears from ver. 4: 'not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life.' See also ver. 5, 'now he that hath wrought us for the self-same thing;' not for the separation of the soul from the body, but for the perfecting of both. Wherefore the clause in the eighth verse, 'to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord,' must be understood of the consummation of our happiness; and 'the body' must be taken for this frail life, as is common in the sacred writers; or perhaps to be 'at home in the body, and to be absent from the Lord,' ver. 6, may mean nothing more than to be entangled in worldly affairs, and to have little leisure for heavenly things; the reason of which is given in ver. 7, 'for we walk by faith, not by sight:' whence it follows, ver. 8, 'we are confident and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord;' that is, to renounce worldly things as much as possible, and to be occupied with heavenly. The ninth verse proves still more clearly that the expressions 'to be present' and 'to be absent' both refer to this life: 'wherefore we labor that whether present or absent, we may be accepted with God:' for no one supposes that the souls of men are occupied from the time of death to that of the resurrection in endeavors to render themselves acceptable to God; that is the employment of the present life, and its reward is not to be looked for till the second coming of Christ.' 'The same sense is to be ascribed to 2 Pet. i. 13, 14, 15; 'as long as I am in the tabernacle,' etc., that is in this life."

On ver. 1 Lange further remarks: "It is hardly probable that such a man would have changed his mind so soon after writing the fifteenth chapter of his former Epistle to the Corinthians, and so should now have believed that he was to pass immediately at death into the blessedness of the resurrection body." Concerning the words absent from the body, and present with the Lord, Rev. Thomas Belsham remarks:

"That is, to quit the present state, and to enter upon that state of recompense and happiness which we are to enjoy with Christ. This text is usually understood as expressing the apostle's persuasion, that death is a separation of the soul from the body, and his expectation that the separate spirit would be introduced into a state of glory and happiness in the presence of Christ, while the body is perishing in the grave. But it is quite impossible that this should be the apostle's meaning, as he had expressly declared in his former epistle, 1 Cor. xv. 18, that if there be no resurrection of the dead, all who have fallen asleep in Christ have perished; which is palpably inconsistent with their possessing life and happiness in a separate state; and the apostle cannot be supposed to contradict himself. And in truth, the apostle's language in this passage will not bear the construction which is usually given to it; and gives no countenance to the doctrine of an intermediate state of perception, activity, and enjoyment between death and the resurrection. He is here only contrasting the present state of trial and suffering with the future promised state of happy existence in the presence of Christ. He never once mentions or even glances at an intermediate state in which the spirit will be happy, when separate from the body. On the contrary, he represents the state which immediately succeeds to death, as a state of nakedness, ver. 3, which was so far from being the object of his wish, that he expresses his earnest desire to be exempted from it by being permitted to continue in the world till the appearance of Christ. That the apostle regarded the season of rest in the grave as an evanescent point, hardly worthy of notice when compared with the glory which was to succeed, cannot reasonably be doubted."

The texts we have been considering will now be given as rendered in Lange's commentary, a work representing the critical ability of a large number of Bible students, and the reader will see at a glance the propriety and soundness of our exposition of them, and their entire harmony with our view of man's nature and destiny.

"For we know that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle (tent dwelling) were dissolved, we have (in the heavens) a building of (from) God, a house not made with hands, eternal (,) in the heavens (om. in the heavens). For in this (also) we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with (to put on over this) our house which is from heaven: if so be that (since indeed) being clothed we shall not be found naked. For (even) we that are in this (the) tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, (because we are not willing to be unclothed), but clothed upon, that mortality (our mortal part) might be swallowed up of (by) life. Now (But) he that hath wrought us (out) for the self-same thing is God, who also (om. also) hath given us the earnest of the Spirit."

Dr. Priestly says of ver. 10, "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ," "This clearly shows that the views of the apostle were not directed to any thing short of the resurrection of the dead and the future judgment; and that he had no prospect of any reward before that time. This, therefore, is the key by which we must interpret all that precedes this verse." Even so.

We have found Whately, Belsham, Milton, Priestly, and others advocating our explication, substantially; and we have found Lange and others opposing that of Mr. George notwithstanding he flauntingly says, "The honest mind must perceive at once that the sentiment is, that men may be absent from the body in a conscious state." We turn sadly away from this and like expressions, and trust we may not again meet with such a display, especially in connection with remarks upon a text concerning which so great want of proper information is betrayed.

We do not believe that any, having attentively read the foregoing remarks, will entertain grave doubts as to their soundness and truthfulness, but should they do so we will not even intimate that they are other than altogether "honest." When theologians of the popular faith write concerning the theory of consciousness in death, they use language vastly different from any thing that can be found in Paul's writings. But then, of course, Paul did not learn that kind of theology. We confess to a decided preference for the Pauline sort.

Iron Bedsteads.

We are living in an age of eminent selfishness. Factional spirit arises from the flames of bitter controversy and religious intolerance, until, figuratively speaking, we have iron bedsteads by the cartload. There is too much of the spirit of "big I" and "little you" in the midst of the people; and it is to be feared that this charge will apply to many who profess to be looking for the speedy coming of God's Son from heaven. There are too many "hobbies." One maintains that you must keep the seventh day Sabbath, or be damned, and forthwith we have a hobby and bone of contention. Another espouses the theory of the non-resurrection of the wicked dead, and he contends for it, until everybody's patience is worn out, and alienation supervenes. Another tells us that we must believe in the restoration of the Jews and in the age to come, or be damned, and another hobby must be ridden to death. Another becomes incensed against the age-to-come-doctrine and tells us that we must not believe in the age to come, and forthwith sets up another "iron bedstead."

Is there any good sense in such bigotry? Is it right to attempt to sit in judgment upon the hearts and conscience of others? Now, I do not write this to find fault with brethren who honestly differ in sentiment, on account of their faith, but to utter my solemn protest against intolerance and bigotry. There is as much Popery in saying you shan't believe a thing as there is in saying you must believe it. It is high time test questions were thrown away. If we cannot see just alike upon all points, why let us still exhibit the Christian spirit, doing each other all the good we can, and as little harm as possible. We are too near the judgment to spend our time in quarreling. If we try we can find plenty to do, fighting the common enemy.

Three men-of-war once lay upon Lake Erie. Two of them were British, and they lay half a mile apart, watching an American. It was in the night, and the British vessels were lighted up, while mirth and gaiety reigned on board. Commodore Perry extinguished his lights, and sailed between his foes. In passing, however, he opened his ports, and fired upon them both. In their confusion, the British men-of-war, mistaking each other for the enemy, opened a vigorous fire upon each other, while Commodore Perry quietly sailed on out of danger. When morning dawned the British vessels were wrecks.

We profess to fight a common enemy, who passes between us and fires his TESTS, quietly leaving us to devour each other on account of tests! So long as one maintains the spirit of Christ, let him proclaim his sentiments in peace. Give him the same privilege that you claim for yourself. Let us have liberty; let us have union, and "let us have peace."

Superstitious Perversions.

Where any thing, not in itself moral or religious, is connected with religion, superstition fastens upon that, because it is "worldly," and lets the rest go. Thus, when God's justice is described in Scripture as vengeance, to show us that it pursues the offender as sternly as a revengeful man would pursue his enemy, superstition fastens on the thought of God's thirsting for revenge, and regards sin only as an offence which provokes in God a desire of inflicting pain on somebody. Again, when water, or bread and wine, are made signs of the power of the Holy Spirit, or of Christ's body and blood sacrificed for us, superstition fastens on the water, or the bread and wine, as if they were the thing themselves. When a place must be set apart for Divine worship, superstition fancies that God dwells in that place, rather than in the hearts of the worshippers. When pictures or images of holy persons are set before us, superstition fastens on the image, as if it were the reality. When rites or ceremonies are used to express our devotion, superstition makes them our devotion. When prayers have to be said, superstition makes the saying them, prayer. When good books are to be perused, superstition makes the perusal, edification. When works are to be done from a good motive, superstition makes the outward action the good work. When suffering for righteousness is commended, superstition takes the suffering for merit; and so in many other instances. It seizes ever on the outward—on that which is not moral; on that which strikes the senses or the imagination—and fastens there; while true religion, on the contrary, calls on us to "lift up our hearts" from the earthly to the heavenly, and use the outward, as a help to the inward.—Archbishop Whately.

Spiritualizing the Prophecies.

One of the principal hindrances to a right appreciation of the proper Christian hope, and to the cultivation of a spirit of expectant preparation for the impending coming of our blessed Lord, is the prevalent and injurious system of imposing upon the divine word a sense not contained in its literal terms, and turning of it into applications to suit preconceived notions. For example, when the angel said to Mary, of her son Jesus: "The Lord shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end;" modern teaching says it means a reign in the hearts of Christians, and that the promise is fulfilled and exhausted in Christ's present administrations in and over all believers. This men call taking the spirit of prophecy, leaving the letter drop as unworthy of their attention.

Indeed, this "Whitbyan spiritualizing," though to many unknown by that name, has become almost universal in the modern churches. It is the potent instrument which Satan has employed for confusing minds, for obscuring prophecy, for robbing the Church of her hope. Hence it is that people now say that "Israel," and "Zion," in prophecy, mean the Church!* . . . "Arise, shine," (Is. lx)—that means the Christian Church; and "Jerusalem the throne of the Lord" means . . . the conversion of the world. Can folly go further? Can anything be more audacious? We had almost said blasphemous. What a perversion of the word of the Almighty! What a putting of darkness for light, and of bitter for sweet! But such is the mournful fact; such is the power of public opinion; such is the force of prejudice and the rut of mental habit.

We, too, grow up with the idea that this spiritualizing interpretation of prophecy was one of the points that are settled. We held it ignorantly in unbelief. No one has pointed out to us its folly—we thought it was for the glory of God. And yet we had frequent misgivings; for the strong language of the prophets seemed to clash strangely with it. But we held it, simply because we had not sufficiently looked at Scripture in all its bearings.

And this is the case with very many well-meaning people still; though now, through the multiplication of so-called millenarian publications, there is hardly any excuse—at least for ministers.

We "spiritualized" prophecy, because we never attempted to harmonize it. We took on trust the statements made ex cathedra, by commentators, by the pulpit, and by the press. But as soon as we examined for ourselves we found that this popular explaining away of plain prophetical Scriptures yielded, at the first biblical strain to which it was subjected. No sooner did we turn to Isaiah ii. and compare what the other Scriptures say respecting the day of the Lord, and the occurrences in it, than this Whitbyan theory was, for us, broken in pieces, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor; the wind carried it away, and no place was found for it.

The thousand years of (universal) peace and righteousness on the earth, we did, indeed, find predicted; but not until after the coming of the Lord; not until after His personal presence on earth; not until after the setting up of His visible kingdom, beginning at Jerusalem. We found that the wheat and tares grow together, until the harvest. We found that evil men and seducers will wax worse and worse. We found that the Lawless One—(anomos; "that Wicked One," in our version)—is not destroyed except by the brightness of the Lord's epiphany. We found that when the Saviour comes, it will be a question whether He will find "the" faith (teen pistin) on the earth. We received a rude shock. Our ideas on this point underwent a revolution.

At first, indeed, the taste was bitter: we regarded the probable consequences with some dread; but soon (and ever since), it was sweet as honey. With redoubled fervor we have embraced the feet of the Crucified One; and have not rejected the inevitable and inseparable cross; for thus it must needs be at present, in order to fulfil all righteousness; and in order that, as in the case of the Master, whose steps all believers are privileged to follow, there might be wrought out, though in a less degree, an exceeding and eternal weight of glory. We may be faint by reason of the way—almost perishing; but a glimpse of these truths makes the soul glow with heavenly ardor.

Therefore, we know how some whom we love, and who have not carefully examined the great premillennial question, think; we having stood just on that ground, with less light and opportunity than are now afforded.

* Many of the collections of hymns bear witness to this outrage on language.

And we have no hesitation in asserting, that wherever a similar mental process is honestly entered upon and persisted in, it will as certainly lead to a similar result, as effect follows cause.

Will not our beloved brethren re-examine the ground? It is written: "Buy the truth, and sell it not."

When we calmly contemplate this "Whitbyan theory," and consider that we live in an age of Bibles, when everybody may read the word of God for himself, so that it would seem impossible for Divine truth to remain concealed, we find, in the manner in which Satan has used it, a masterpiece of strategy. Though so absurd in itself, the adversary has made it appear plausible. By flattering her self-complacency, and by leading her to view her calling in a false light, as though she were the chosen instrument for the conversion of the world, thereby to display her zeal and her devotedness, he has foisted it upon the church. Unequalled strategist! Never at a loss for expedients! Thereby he has managed to envelop the hope of the church in such a thick and general fog, that the great majority postponed the coming of the Lord to a far-distant period, and not a few laid it aside as an antiquated fable originating in the rude infancy of the gospel, and unworthy of such an enlightened age as the present. And all this when the coming of the Lord is at the very doors! No wonder the Lord said that as a snare shall that day come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth.

We are inclined to think that within a few years past the confidence of a quite a number in the Whitbyan idea has been considerably weakened. A goodly list of premillennial publications has appeared in all countries of Christendom; and the theory has been rudely shaken, and its inherent weakness demonstrated. We feel thankful in believing that the "Prophetic Times," too, has contributed no little toward this result. Missionary operations, likewise, have not turned out as was expected they would; and some people are beginning to think that, quite possibly, our Lord's coming may, after all, not be a thousand years distant. So much has been gained for the truth. These persons do not feel quite so secure in the belief of an indefinite postponement of the advent as they once did. They have latterly looked a little more at the strong declarations of Holy Writ which everywhere presuppose imminence in the Saviour's coming. Such sayings as: "Ye know not when the time is;" "Let your loins be girded, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord;" "Behold, I come as a thief," etc., are weighty. They must rest on good grounds. We rejoice in these changes, and hope that such may be induced to examine the subject with that earnest carefulness which it deserves. Let the Scriptures be studied. Let them speak for themselves as God has caused them to be written; and we are sure that the truth will be found.—Prophetic Times.

Where is the Evidence?

When in our controversy with those who hold the popular opinion, we urge the startling fact that the Scriptures do not furnish a single statement regarding man's natural immortality, we not only employ an argument which we are quite warranted in using, but one which the most "orthodox" are themselves quite ready to, and in point of fact do often use in reference to other subjects. Thus, for instance, the Rev. John Cox, advocating the blessed truth of Christ's pre-millennial coming, says: "Many assert that the word of God teaches the post-millennial view. Let such produce their Scriptural authorities. It is not enough to raise objections against the views which we advocate, and to say that there are insuperable difficulties in the way of their adoption. This is just the way in which the sceptic treats Christianity. Let the evidence we adduce be examined; and let evidence be produced in favor of the opposite theory, if it be forthcoming. We have long asked for the texts which declare that the millennium will precede the advent, and have asked in vain."—"The Future," p 69.

Now, is this way of putting the matter a fair one? Is this demand for Scripture evidence in favor of a popular doctrine, just and reasonable? Surely it is. But if so, are we not equally entitled to urge it in reference to another matter? Is it not quite as just and reasonable to say, "Many assert that the word of God teaches the immortality of the soul. Let such produce their Scriptural authorities? It is not enough to raise objections against the views which we advocate, and to say that there is great danger in their adoption. This is just the way in which the sceptic treats Christianity. Let the evidence we adduce be examined, and let evidence be produced in favor of the opposite theory, if it be forthcoming. We have long asked for the texts which declare the immortality of the soul, and have asked in vain."

In like manner the editor of a well-known religious newspaper, when recently opposing an advocate of the Romish doctrine of the real presence of Christ in the elements of the Lord's supper, writes thus: "When this eloquent apologist for a superstitious novelty persuasively assures us that 'there can be no doubt that the body of Christ is co-existent with the bread and wine which we receive in the holy sacrament,' we simply reply that this is merely Mr. Rodwell's assertion; an assertion which would be irrelevant, even if it were true; but which is, in fact, directly contrary to truth. When he tells us that 'it is a question of revealed evidence which the church implicitly believed for fifteen hundred years,' we pass by the phenomenon of this implicit faith without inquiring either its character or its cause. We do not even pause to ask (curious as we are) about the revelation thus epenthetically asserted; we simply ask for the 'evidence' itself. What is it? Why is it not forthcoming?" Ay, just so: "We simply ask for the evidence itself. What is it? Where is it? Why is it not forthcoming?" But if these are pertinent questions in reference to the Romish doctrine of the real presence, are they not equally pertinent in reference to the heathen dogma of the immortality of the soul? Surely, to quote the vulgar but expressive proverb, "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander."

These remarks have been suggested by my current reading. To the same source I am indebted for the following caustic admission. I have no reason whatever for supposing that the Rev. John Hunt, the erudite author of "Religious Thought in England," has any sympathy with the doctrines advocated in the "Rainbow;" but this only makes his admission the more valuable. In an article in the "Contemporary Review" for February, speaking on other matters, he remarks incidentally: "The announcement to Adam simply was that if he sinned he should die. To have extracted from this that he and his posterity were to suffer endless life in hell, must have required the ingenuity of a theologian." How often have we said this, though not so well! W. Maud.—The Rainbow.

Zaphnath-Paaneah and Asenath.

GEN. XLI. 45.

When Joseph was sold by his brethren and sent into Egypt, his purity of character brought suffering upon him through false accusation. He was cast into prison, where he interpreted the dreams of Pharaoh's chief butler and baker, and in course of time, though the Lord tried his faith and patience, he stood before Pharaoh himself and interpreted his dreams. He was then placed by Pharaoh in the very highest position, next to himself in power and authority, and all the wealth of Egypt was at his disposal. It was at this time, when seated (so to speak) at the right hand of power, though unknown and unacknowledged by his brethren, that his name was changed to Zaphnath-Paaneah, which means "a revealer of secrets;" and a wife was given to him whose name was Asenath, which signifies "peril, or misfortune;" and by her he has two sons, Manasseh (which means "forgetting") and Ephraim (which means "fruitful.")

Everybody of any spiritual discernment acknowledges that Joseph is a remarkable type of Christ. And how truly is Asenath a type of the Church, united to him during the time of his rejection by Israel. Observe the meaning of her name, "peril, or misfortune;" and let us ask ourselves, does this exactly correspond with our state and condition as sinners; and directly we become united to Christ by faith, do we not lose our old name, and by virtue of our union with him, whose name is "increase" (or Joseph) and "a revealer of secrets," do we not bring forth to the glory of God, Manasseh (forgetting) and Ephraim (fruitful); i. e., "forgetting the things behind, and reaching forth to those before," do we not become "fruitful in every good word and work?" May it be so with us. Amen.—W. C. Boardman.—The Rainbow.

Religious Depression.

It is the strange truth that some of the highest of God's servants are tried with darkness on the dying bed. Theory would say, when a religious man is laid up for his last struggle, now he is alone for deep communion with God. Fact very often says, "No; now he is alone as his master was before him, in the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil." Look at John the Baptist in imagination, and you would say, "Now his rough pilgrimage is done. He is quiet, he is out of the world, with the rapt foretaste of heaven in his soul." Look at John in fact. He is agitated, sending to Christ, not able to rest, grim doubt wrestling with his soul, misgiving for one last black hour whether all his hope has not been delusion.

There is one thing we remark here by the way. Doubt often comes from inactivity. We cannot give the philosophy of it, but this is the fact—Chistians who have nothing to do but to sit thinking of themselves, meditating, sentimentalizing, (or mysticizing,) are almost sure to become the prey of dark, black misgivings. John struggling in the desert needs no proof that Jesus is the Christ. John, shut up, became morbid and doubtful immediately. Brethren, all this is very marvelous. We are mysteries; but here is the history of it all—for sadness, for suffering, for misgiving, there is no remedy but stirring and doing.—Robertson.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

Br. Storrs: I have just returned from a preaching tour in distant sections, where I have heretofore labored, and found the community more anxious than ever to hear the Life views as set forth in the oracles of truth. Many are becoming quite tired of hearing the old dogma of the immortality of the soul, of dying and not dying; and of a resurrection of all the wicked dead to be judged and sent to heaven or to the theological hell, to suffer in eternal misery. We have never had such attention and such full houses as at present. Praise the Lord.

Well, I found on my return two packages of tracts that came just in time. I will soon set them all to preaching, for the people have a desire to read and search for themselves, to see if it is truth. I also found four letters; one from Fulton Co., Ill., containing good news. I would be glad to visit the dear brethren there. I long for the time when we shall have more help. May the Lord send some faithful laborers this way.

But the best of all is, on opening a letter from Keyport, N. J., behold a ten dollar bill from our beloved Br. Wolcott. May the Lord bless him and reward him fourfold in this life, and in the age to come, life eternal. Amen. . . . May we all be guided by the holy spirit of truth.

Br. Storrs: I am glad your articles on "the oath and promise of God" are coming out in a pamphlet. May the Lord bless you and all the dear pilgrims scattered abroad. Amen. Pray for me, that my faith fail not. Thanks to Br. W. for the last, and all past favors.

Response to Br. Ladd's Appeal.

Br. Ladd: Your appeal in last week's Herald for funds to fit up the new Camp-ground awoke within my heart a new and pleasing sensation, a new zeal, new thoughts, of new faces at a new Camp-ground; at the same time pleasing thoughts of old friends, old associations, old recollections of pleasant greetings: how they come back to bless us as we recall them from memory's page. But ours is pioneer work, and we may not stop to play with shadows, or pluck earthly flowers till our work is done, and we render up our account. Hath not the Master said, Go work to-day in my vineyard? Our experience in the past has been storm and sunshine. In the natural world it needs both to mature the crop; and both may be needful for us in our spiritual strivings to train and fit us, and to nerve us for sterner hours of conflict. I do not mean conflict among ourselves, as brethren Life believers; or conflict with our brethren with whom we met last year for the last time, or any of God's people anywhere. But nerved for conflict in battling for truth, with the Spirit of Christ in the heart, all the way through, against false doctrine, against spiritual wickedness in high places, etc. I hope and trust our meetings now will not be devoted entirely to doctrinal discussions, that are too deep for many weak ones that may be present; but that a variety may so be brought from the great storehouse that all may be fed, and all blessed that gather there this year.

Now, brethren and sisters, remember this one thing, it is better to give than receive. And again, there is such a thing as giving and yet increasing, and there is such a thing as witholding, and it tendeth to poverty. Is not that a poor way to be poor? There is a saying that, A religion that costs nothing, is worth nothing. Let every one give a little; if it is only twenty-five cents it will result in good. A giving church is a healthy, spiritual church always; and such a church will enjoy the religion they profess. Do not put it off till you can find time to write: do it now. If we get $1,500, it will not be any too much to fit up the ground as it should be. The first meeting will cost very much the most. I will give $25. Who will give more or less?

It was so Still.

It was so still,
Though thousands clustered there, that not a sound
Brake the strong spell of eloquence which held
The wilderness in chains; save now and then,
As the gale freshened, came the murmured speech
Of distant billows, chafing with the shores
Of the Tiberian sea.

Day wore apace;
Noon hastened; aud the lengthening shadows brought
The unexpected eve. They lingered still,
Eyes fix'd, and lips apart—the very breath
Constrained, lest some escaping sigh might break
The tide of knowledge sweeping o'er their souls,
Like a strange, raptured dream. They heed not
The spent sun, closing at the curtained west
His burning journey. What was time to them,
Who heard, entranced, th' Eternal Word of Life?
But the weak flesh grew weary. Hunger came,
Sharpened each feature, and to faintness drained
Life's vigorous fount. The holy Saviour felt
Compassion for them. His disciples press,
Care-stricken, to his side. "Where shall we find Bread, in this desert?"

Then, with lifted eyes,
He bless'd, and brake, the slender store of food,
And fed the famish'd thousands. Wondering awe
With renovated strength inspired their souls,
As, gazing on the miracle, they marked
The gathered fragments of their feast, and heard
Such heavenly words as lip of mortal man
Had never uttered.

Thou whose pitying heart
Yearned o'er the countless miseries of those Whom thou didst die to save, touch thou our souls
With the same spirit of untiring love!
Divine Redeemer! May our fellow-man,
Howe'er by rank or circumstance disjoined,
Be as a brother, in his hour of need.

The Blessing on Israel.

BY GEO. W. BROWN.

Isa. viii. 14.—"And he shall be for a sanctuary; but for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel."

Now the question is, who are the two houses of Israel? We see, by examining Gen. xxxii. 28, and onward, that Jacob the son of Isaac obtained the name by having power with God and prevailing, and by consulting the record farther, we see that Jacob had twelve sons, and from these sprang the twelve tribes of Israel. After God had brought them through the wilderness and into the land of Canaan, he gave them judges about 450 years until Samuel the prophet, and then they desired a king, and he gave them Saul the son of Cis; and when he removed him he raised up David to be their king, and on the death of David, Solomon took the throne.

We see that these three kings reigned over the entire twelve tribes, but after the death of Solomon, because his son Rehoboam would not lighten the yoke, but threatened to make it heavier, saying, "my little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins," there was a revolt of ten tribes out of twelve, who made Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, king over all Israel.—1 Kings xii. 20.

From this time the tribes of Israel were divided into two houses. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin, who remained under Rehoboam and his successors, were called Judah; from which name the term Jew is derived. The ten tribes were never, I think, called Jews, but the Jews were sometimes called Israel, because they also were the descendants of Jacob.

When both houses are spoken of in the Scriptures they are called Judah and Israel; sometimes the ten tribes are called Ephraim, as we read in Jer. xxxi. 9. The Lord declares he is a "father unto Israel, and Ephraim is my first-born." Now as the birthright always belonged to the first-born, it must belong to Ephraim. If you wish to know the reason of this, read 1 Chron. v. 1.

For as much as Reuben "defiled his father's bed, his birthright was given unto the sons of Joseph." These are the sons that are spoken of in Heb. xi. 21. "By faith Jacob, when he was dying, blessed both the sons of Joseph; and worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff." By turning to Gen. chaps. xl. viii and xlix, we may learn what the blessing was; he says, they are to "grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth." But Ephraim, although the younger, was to be greater than Manasseh.

So we see, by consulting, that the entire ten tribes are called Ephraim. If Jacob's faith was good we must find this blessing upon Ephraim somewhere; for "faith is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen." What was the blessing pronounced upon the sons of Joseph? If we turn to Gen. xlviii. from the 13th verse onward, we find Jacob with his right hand upon the head of Ephraim, the younger, and his left hand upon Mannasseh, the first-born, pronouncing the blessings that Paul refers to in Heb. xi. 21. Joseph did not understand why the old man should put his right hand upon the younger son, as he proposed to the old patriarch to change his hands; but he refused, saying, "Mannasseh shall be great, but Ephraim shall be greater, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations."

Now the question arises, when is this to be fulfilled? We have the answer in the following chapter: Jacob called his sons and said, "gather yourselves together, that I may tell you that which may befall you in the last days." And when he came to Joseph, he said, he shall be a "fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall: the archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him: but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob. . . . By the God of thy father, who shall bless thee; and by the Almighty, who shall bless thee with the blessing of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breasts and of the womb." And these blessings were to extend unto the "utmost bounds of the everlasting hills."

I have not quoted all that is here spoken of Joseph, but enough to show that the same growth was promised to Joseph that was promised to Ephraim, his son. Now when are these blessings to come? Jacob says it is to be in the last days; but when are the last days? Peter tells us they are the gospel days, Acts ii. 5, "For these are not drunken as ye suppose. But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel, And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh." Here Peter shows why the gospel had such a wonderful effect upon the people, and that Joel ii. 28 and onward, had commenced its fulfilment, and would continue until the great and terrible day of the Lord came; and he calls it the last days.

He had heard the discourses of Jesus in John vi. where he declares that of all which the Father "had given him he should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day;" and Martha had the same idea concerning her brother, "I know he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." Then if the testimony of Peter and Jesus and Martha can be relied upon, the resurrection of the dead takes place at the close of the last days, that is, in the last day. Then it follows, as a matter of course, that this multitude of nations must come of Ephraim in the gospel days, which are the last days, and not after the resurrection, which is to take place in the last day.

Now as we see by Jer. xxxi. 9, the Lord calls Ephraim his first-born. As the ten tribes are called after him, these blessings must come upon them. But I am told that Isa. vii. 8 shows "that within three score and five years shall Ephraim be broken that it be not a people;" and we are told again in Hosea iii. 4 and 5, "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and teraphim. Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days."

When did they lose their king and all the privileges they enjoyed in the land of Samaria? 2 Kings xvii. 5. "Then the king of Assyria came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years. In the ninth year of Hoshea the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor, by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." Here is where they lost their king, and after abiding many days without one, they were to "return and seek the Lord their God in the latter days." What are we to understand by seeking "the Lord their God and David their king?" When they revolted under Jeroboam they said, "What portion have we in David?" and still the prophet declares they shall seek the Lord their God and David their king before the resurrection. Now Peter declares, Acts ii. 29, that "David is both dead and buried." Will they seek a dead king? No, surely not; so it must be he that is of the seed of David, which is Christ the Lord.

The signification of the word David is beloved. The Father said of Christ, "this is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;" which was equivalent to saying, "this is my son David." The prophecy shows that they will seek the Lord and become Christians.

Now if Israel are to seek the Lord and become Christians, then they must have the gospel preached to them, for Paul tells us, "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God;" but will they not hear the good news and repent in the beginning of the gospel? It appears not from the prophecy Hosea v. 18th verse and onward. "When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wounds, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb; yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound. For I will be unto Ephraim as a lion, and as a young lion to the house of Judah: I, even I, will tear and go away; I will take away and none shall rescue him. I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: in their affliction they will seek me early. Come and let us return unto the Lord: for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up. After two days will he revive us: in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight. Then (after the revival) shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord; his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth."

Here is a definite time for a revival, viz., "after two days." What do these two days mean? Are they two days of twenty-four hours, or are they two years? The history of this people records no revival after two literal days, neither was there any after two years. Has the Lord given us any other rule for measuring day except evening and morning, and "each day for a year?" In 2d Peter 3, 8, we read, "But beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." As Peter tells us not to be ignorant, it appears that the knowledge of this one thing is of some importance. But how are we to get a knowledge of it? Simply believe it. Believe what? Why that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years. The Lord then has days that are a thousand years long. Suppose we apply this to Hosea vi. 2. Where will it bring us? They lost their king about 700 B. C. Where would the two days carry us? Two thousand years from 700 B. C. would end in 1300, A. D. After the commencement of the fourteenth century, then, of the Christian era we must look for a revival in Ephraim, or the ten tribes. Do we see anything about this time that looks like a revival? I answer, we do. The celebrated reformer, John Wickliffe, was born in 1324. Where did he get his principles of reform? I answer, from the study of the Holy Scriptures; and he attacked the dogmas of the Roman church, and a bill of excommunication was issued against him from the Pope, and his books were destroyed as far as the Pope had power to do it. Then came John Huss, another reformer, born in 1376. After him Luther, and, those who labored with him until all Germany was stirred with the doctrine of justification by faith; and then was fulfilled that which was spoken by the prophet, Rev. xv. 5, 6. "And after that I looked and behold the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened. And the seven angels came out of the temple having the seven last plagues, clothed in pure and white linen." Rev. xix. 8: "The fine linen is the righteousness of the saints." Phil. iii. 9: "And be found in him not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith." We learn from these scriptures that the "fine linen is the righteousness of the saints;" and the righteousness of saints is that which is of God by faith." History informs us that the testimony of these reformers was justification by faith, and they came out of the temple where the man of sin sat. But did this revival affect the ten lost tribes or Ephraim?

When they were taken captive, they were carried and placed in the cities of the Medes, south of the Euxine sea; and history traces this German race to about that locality. But can we get any further information concerning the whereabouts of Israel after the two days are out, when they are to be revived? Jer. iii. 12: "Go and proclaim these words toward the north, and say return thou backsliding Israel saith the Lord, and I will not cause mine anger to fall upon you, for I am merciful saith the Lord, and I will not keep mine anger forever, . . . only acknowledge thine iniquity that thou hast transgressed against the Lord thy God, and hast scattered thy ways to the stranger under every green tree, and ye have not obeyed my voice saith the Lord. Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord, for I am married unto you, and I will take you one of a city and two of a family and will bring you to Zion." Mark the fact that this proclamation is not to Judah, or the Jews, but to Israel, the ten tribes, the very people Hosea speaks of as being revived after two days; and from it we learn that after the two days are out they will be found in the north, where they will accept of it with gladness. This view of the subject makes it plain why Paul was forbidden of the Holy Spirit to preach the word in Asia, and he essayed to go into Bithynia, but the Spirit suffered him not. See Acts xvi. 6 and onward; and he preached the gospel from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum. Ancient Illyricum extended as far south as the north side of the Bosphorus. Paul left out the very countries occupied by the lost tribes. When the two days had expired, however, we see the gospel taking effect in these very countries, and I believe the hand of God was in it. All these Protestant denominations sprung from that revival, and are, therefore, the descendants of Ephraim or the ten lost tribes. This view of the subject also explains why the epistle of James is addressed to the twelve tribes scattered abroad, and exhorts them to be patient unto the coming of the Lord, as though they were to be living when that event takes place.

Peter also sends his general epistle to the strangers scattered through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia, some of the very places where the Spirit forbade Paul to preach the word. Both these epistles have a special application to the last generation, or those living in the time of the end, when the church would receive the end of their faith even the salvation of their souls, or persons.

Peter also says in speaking of the time revealed to the prophets, which the angels desired to look into, that for this reason we should gird up the loins of the mind, be sober and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ. We turn to the prophets and find the words closed up and sealed till the time of the end. How could it gird up the mind while it was closed up and sealed? It could not surely; but when we strike the time of the end, and the seal is broken so that knowledge can increase, then it will be a girdle, and especially when the wise fully understand it.

Two Irresistible Things.

Some months ago, when travelling, I had for my fellow-passengers some of the men from H. M.'s ship Irresistible, who had that word on their caps. I was involuntarily led to say, "I know of two things which are 'irresistible;' how many do you know?" The reply was, "We do not remember any: will you tell us what your two are?" I remarked, "Death is irresistible; for when it seizes upon its victim, there is no shaking it off. A person may say, 'I will not die;' but death being in the world by sin, 'it is appointed unto men once to die, and after this the judgment.'" The men became very thoughtful; for death is a very solemn subject, and is no respecter of persons. "Love is also irresistible," I observed. Upon this, their countenances brightened up, and they began to smile upon one another, till I added, "that it must be 'perfect love,' and therefore God's love; for 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be a propitiation for our sins.' When there was everything in man which was altogether opposed to God, his every thought and imagination being evil, and that continually—when we were enemies by wicked works, then 'Christ died for the ungodly.' That this love was 'strong as death;' and when any one knew and believed the love that God hath to us, (1 John iv. 16), he was laid hold of by it; and however heedlessly he might have hitherto gone on, it was so perfect that it constrains him who is now brought to rest in it, no longer to live to himself, but to him who died and rose again, even the blessed Lord Jesus."—2 Cor. v. 14, 15. One of the men exclaimed, "Right you are, sir! are you a parson?" "No," I answered, "but I know this 'perfect love;' I have believed it, in that Jesus laid down his life for me. He came to seek and to save the lost; and in order to atone for sin, he died on the cross; and because of the infinite preciousness of his blood, God justifies all who take their only true place before him confessing that they have sinned and perverted that which is right; such are delivered from going into the pit." Job xxxiii. 27, 28. "Well," said the man, with tears, "I have learned more from those few words than from all the sermons I ever heard. Do come on board our ship. Some of our men will be glad to hear you talk; and if you will give me some tracts, I will give them away."

And now, dear reader, allow me to press these two things upon your attention. Death is irresistible, and love is irresistible. God is love, and God is light; and he, in his infinite wisdom, has devised a way whereby he can be a just God and a Saviour. "The Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world;" and, blessed truth, "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God."—1 John v. 1. A dear man said to me the other evening, "O sir! I have found my title-deeds!" To which I replied, "Show them to me." At once he brought forth the last verse of John iii: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life," and his eyes beamed with joy. Jesus risen is the life of all who believe in him. Until he died and was buried, he was alone. "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." A risen Jesus is the life of all who believe in him. "He that hath the Son hath life;" and these things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life." If you know Christ as the One who has glorified God about your sins, and is alive to die no more, happy, happy for you; for death cannot separate you from the love of God. Believers do not necessarily die; for the Holy Ghost instructs us that we shall not all sleep, (1 Cor. 15), and that the Lord himself is coming for us, and we shall be changed and caught up to meet him in the air, and so shall be forever with him.—1 Thess. iv. But what of those poor souls who slight and despise this perfect love, and Jesus, who manifested it here among men? Good were it indeed if such had never been born; for alas! they will prove that death is irresistible, and awfully true that there is the "mist of darkness forever."

Jesus, who is the same now as yesterday, wept over some who would not come to him, and, as we delight to tell, suffered, the just for the unjust, upon the cross, that sinners, by faith in him, might be forgiven, and made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light.—Acts xxvi. 18.

Should this fall into the hands of any child of God who has "committed" two evils, having forsaken the fountain of living waters, and hewn to himself "broken cisterns," allow me to put the word of the Lord's reasoning to such. "Have I been a wilderness unto Israel? a land of darkness? Wherefore say my people, We are lords, we will come no more to thee?"—Jer. xi. 31. Oh! go back to your Father, and confess that you have been a naughty and therefore a miserable child. Has not Jesus loved you, so as to endure the cross? John xiii. "Return to the Lord, and he will receive you graciously and love you freely."—Hosea xiv.

"His is an unchanging love,
Higher than the heights above;
Deeper than the depths beneath,
Free and faithful, strong as death."

—Selected.

Chrysostom, speaking on the composition of a sermon, says, as in a reverie: I had a vision: I thought I saw the communion-rails crowded with angels listening to the sermon. When a man speaks as in the sight of God, with an open heaven—with Christ and angels before him—he catches the true prophetic fire; he offers a present salvation, from a present Saviour; the Spirit of glory and grace descends, and the flame communicates to his auditory, and accompanies them to their houses.

Children's Department.

"Mamma!"

"Yes, dear; what is it?"

"Well, mamma, I don't understand—many things I want to."

"My bright little girl, what a discovery! And yet I am glad you have made it; for people don't value knowledge until they feel themselves ignorant; and as I know my Nelly is a diligent young lady, I hope she will soon have such a store of wisdom. But what is it you wish to know?"

"Well, mamma, you ask Eddy and me to pay attention to what Mr. Hope says, and he said this morning, 'It will be put right when Christ comes.' Now, I want you to tell me, please, what he meant by that."

"Well, Nelly, darling, what should he mean, but exactly what he said? Mr. Hope always expresses himself with great clearness. He was speaking of this shocking and wicked war, and of the inability of mere men to rule the world in righteousness; and then he said, 'But the Christian is not to despair, as if the world was finally given over to ruin. The Church is safe in her Redeemer's hands; and, by and by, the world itself will be a place of marvellous beauty and happiness. It will all be put right when Jesus comes.' As nearly as I can remember, these were his words."

"Yes, ma; but as I was walking home with Aggy Norton, I heard her mother say to Mrs, Feld, that Mr. Hope need not have told people that it will be all right when they die. Now, I did not hear him say that. Do you think he meant that?"

"He neither said it, nor meant it, my dear; and I am sorry Mrs. Norton should have so strangely misunderstood him. He meant when Jesus himself comes back to his own world to put away all evil and make it holy and happy."

"Oh! I am so glad, mamma."

"Why, dear?"

"Well, ma, I hope it isn't naughty, but I don't like to think of death at all. It is so cold and dark, and everybody is so sad; and those strange men in black things coming to take away the—"

And sweet little Nelly wept again, when she thought of the death and burial of her beloved playmate of eight summers, Amy Joyce, whom the cruel enemy had torn from the arms of loving parents, and sent to the narrow home.

"But you like to think of Jesus himself, who is love, and light, and life, all in one, coming back; do you, dear?"

"O, yes, ma! that is so beautiful! It should make everybody glad!"

"And it would, if everybody loved him; but alas! my child," said Mrs. Leslie, with a deep sigh, "that is far from being the case."

Nelly Leslie knew little of the great black field of worldliness and unbelief and dead profession, over which her mother's mind flashed at that moment, but sympathy with visible sadness kept her silent for a time.

"Mamma," and she looked earnestly at her mother, "if Jesus had returned before, would Amy had died?"

"No, my precious one, no!" and the loving mother pressed her child to her heart. "That is what Martha and Mary said to the Lord about their dear brother. When Jesus returned from Galilee, he raised Lazarus from the dead; and when he returns from heaven, he will raise all his sleeping saints to life eternal, and the living ones will never die."

"O, mamma, how beautiful! I would so like to see Jesus. I wish he would come."—The Rainbow.

A Great Cure-All.

Several gentlemen were talking one evening at the house of a friend, when one of them exclaimed,

"Ah! depend upon it, a soft answer is a great cure-all." At this state of the conversation, a boy who sat behind a table to listen, and repeated, as he thought, quite to himself, "A soft answer is a great cure-all." "Yes, that's it," cried the gentleman, starting and turning round; "yes, that's it; don't you think so, my lad?" The boy blushed a little at finding himself so unexpectedly addressed, but answered, "I don't know that I understand you, sir."

"Well, I will explain, then. In the days of my boyhood it so happened that, in the school to which I was sent, my seat was next to a lad named Tom Tucker. When I found he lived in a small house behind the academy, I began to strut a little, and talk about what my father was; but as he was a capital scholar, very much thought of by the boys, we were soon on pretty good terms; and so it went on for some time. After a while, some fellows of my stamp, and I with the rest, got into a difficulty with some of the ushers, and somehow or other, we got the notion that Tom was at the bottom of it.

"'Tom Tucker! who is he?' I cried, angrily. 'I'll let him know who I am!' and I went in a passion to Tom, and said, 'I'll teach you to talk about me in this way!' But he never winced or seemed in the least frightened, but stood still, looking at me mute as a lamb. 'Charles,' he said, 'you may strike me as much as you please; but I shan't strike back again; fighting is a poor way to settle difficulties. I'm thinking when you are Charles Everett, I'll talk to you.'

"O what an answer was that! How it cowed me down! So firm, but yet so mild! I felt there was no fun in having the fight all on one side. I was ashamed of myself, my temper, and everything about me. I longed to get out of his sight. I saw what a poor, foolish way my style of doing things was. I felt that Tom had completely got the better of me; that there was power in his principles superior to any thing I had ever seen before; and from that hour Tom Tucker had an influence over me nobody ever had before or since; it has been for good, too. That, you see, is the power, the moral power, of a soft answer."

A Bible View of Hell:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. Address all orders to

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

FROM GOSHEN TO CANAAN.

BY ALFRED H. CLEAVES.

"Moses was faithful in all his house as a servant, for a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after; but Christ as a Son over his own house; whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end."

ALLOWING Moses to stand for his administration, he was truly a servant; the covenant which came by him was not another form of the Abrahamic, but was added to that until the seed should come.

It rendered the service of a tutor or governor, until the heir became of age, when Christ as the representative of the new covenant was sent forth to officiate in his own affairs.

As Moses found the children of Israel in Egypt, groaning in bondage, so Christ found not only his brethren, naturally, but the whole world beside.

As Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt, and gave them the law upon tables of stone, so Christ leads men out and gives them the law in fleshly tables of the heart.

The law as it came by Moses secured life only upon terms of perfect obedience, and as a covenant was faulty, because men in the flesh were unable to keep it. But as a shadow of good things to come it furnished an outline of the substance of things hoped for, which things were looked forward to by those who believed; and being justified by such a faith they had the witness that their ways pleased God.

The shadow which the law had of these things consisted in the ordinances of divine service and a worldly sanctuary, or holy place connected with the covenant. Christ magnified the law and made it honorable, saving it from Jews who made it void with their traditions. Instead of tables of stone, he presented the great truth that the law must be consented to in the heart, before it can be honored outwardly. In the place of a tabernacle made by hands, he puts that made by God; and for an earthly holy place, he substitutes the heavenly Holiest of all. The subordinate priests went into the first tabernacle; but into the second went the high priest once every year, not without blood which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people.

The disciples made ready the passover for Jesus, and Mary anointed him with precious ointment; it was then said, the Son of man goeth forth as it is written of him; so as he declared to his disciples and previously to the Jews, (whither I go ye cannot come) he became a sacrifice in himself, and entered the holiest of all with his own blood; not for himself, as in the figure of the true, but for the sins of the people, to offer sacrifice and make atonement.

His table was prepared in the presence of his enemies, of which the meek are permitted to eat and be satisfied. This is the altar which we have, of which they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle.

As the bodies of those beasts whose blood was brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, were burned without the camp, so Jesus, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate; and as Israel, after the flesh, allowed those who served at the altar to partake of the sacrifice; so as many as are of the household of faith, partake of the body and blood of Christ in the communion, and show forth his death as a mediating sacrifice, until he come again.

As the bells and pomegranates on the high priest's garment gave evidence when heard, to those outside, that he was alive within the veil of glory, so that which came at Pentecost gave evidence that Christ had been glorified and lived within the presence of God, to make atonement for the people.

The theory that necessitates a mortal resurrection of the saints, in order to their glorification, finds no support here, for they are not glorified after the manner of the high priest, unless they make atonement for themselves.

But as the high priest came out to bless the people, so will Christ appear a second time without sin, unto salvation, to those who look for him.

Not as some read—without a sin offering—for in wresting a scripture to make it serve a particular end, in an argument, they do so to their own destruction, moving away the very foundation of their hope; since without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sins; their hope of salvation, therefore, depends upon the offering made within the veil.

But in contrast to those high priests who needed to offer up sacrifice, first for their own sins, and then for the people's, he appears a second time without sin, being holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners; so preventing a remembrance of sins; for if he should come out a sinful priest, then there would be no remission, but he hath by one offering forever perfected them that are sanctified. Since he is a sinless priest, and his sacrifice is holy, there is no other offering required for the sins of the people, and their sins and iniquities will be remembered no more.

As the Israelites under Moses passed through the Red Sea, being baptised in the cloud and in the sea, so as many as are baptized into Christ, being baptized into his death, will follow him through the grave; which others, assaying to do in their own strength, will be swallowed up in doing, like the Egyptians.

As the Israelites sang at the Red Sea, so the redeemed will sing upon the sea of glass.

As the followers of Moses looked back upon the destruction of their enemies, and sang, the Lord is a man of war; Pharaoh's chariots and his host hath he cast into the sea; thou stretchest out thy right hand, the earth swallowed them, and Miriam the prophetess joined to sing, The Lord hath triumphed gloriously; so the victorious host of Christ will sing, Great and marvellous are thy works Lord God Almighty, for thy judgments are made manifest.

As Joshua led the children into Canaan, so Christ will give the rest which remains to the people of God, to those who take his yoke upon them, and learn of him.

We have reached the administration of Mount Sion, and the legal deliverance has gone forth from Jerusalem; but we wait for the redemption of the body; we are already a people of the covenant, waiting till the enemies of Jesus are made his footstool, and when the song is sung, O! death, where is thy sting? O! grave, where is thy victory? Then will be brought to pass the saying, "Death is swallowed up in victory," and the kingdom will be established: the Lord God will give unto Christ the throne of his father David: he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever and ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

SUFFERING FOR CHRIST.

"Unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for His sake."—Phil. i. 29.

"Think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: But rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy."—1 Peter iv. 12, 13.

"The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us."—Rom. viii. 18.

FOR HIS SAKE.

WHAT greatly enhances the value of these sufferings, is that they are endured for Christ's sake. Whilst they show a parallel between our earthly lot and His; whilst they are an evidence of our assimilation to Him; and while his great goodness designs them as part of the means of our own growth in grace and purification, the sweetest thought of all is that they are borne for His sake, and He is glorified thereby. Some draw a distinction between sufferings endured for Christ's sake, and those more especially intended for our own purgation; but this is surely a distinction without a difference. Is not all suffering designed for that end? And is not the end eventually attained if we voluntarily and cheerfully accept the means in acknowledgment of the purpose, with the specific design of God's glorification therein? Must not all sanctified suffering redound to His glory?

If our distinct object in voluntary submission to the disciplinary process which secures this end, is the entire subjugation of our carnal nature that God may thus be glorified in us and by us as He could not be without this transformation, is not the great motive for the endurance of the suffering a desire to please Him? And if we were not His disciples, the subjects of His love and supervision, would we be called to this special suffering? Are we not then clearly enduring it for His sake? We are so desirous of bearing His image, and approximating as closely to His character as mortal may, that we are ready to accept any degree of suffering to secure the result. The assumption of it is perfectly voluntary—it is never made obligatory—and a want of acquiescence in God's will would certainly secure an exemption from it. He will not compel us to become priests and kings, and if we prefer the honors of this world, we can have our preference. We are free to choose—if we were still of the world we would have no such intensity of desire; and if we are lukewarm Christians we will surely shrink from such a scathing ordeal. It is in consequence of our position as Christians, and our desire to bear the image of the heavenly here, that we are subjected to these sufferings; consequently, they are borne for His sake; and his goodness is such, that our suffering for His sake, and our own good, are inseparably connected. Oftentimes, too, we are called to forms of suffering of so mysterious a character that it is impossible, with our finite faculties, to form any conception as to its design; and our only motive for the cheerful endurance of it, is submission to God's will, and an earnest desire that he shall be glorified in us as his wisdom sees best. This is surely suffering for Christ's sake, when there is no obvious advantage to ourselves other than that which must result from loving resignation to his will.

Chastisements and afflictions are the surest evidences of God's love to us, and yet how do our weak human natures shrink from them. The saluta-y, but bitter, medicine we reject with as much loathing as little children do the nostrums provided by earthly physicians. Although we might believe the representations of our heavenly Father as to their efficacy, we prefer acting the part of the wayward little ones, and pettishly thrust aside the distasteful draught. He acknowledges that the present effects are not joyous, but grievous; but should not His assurance be sufficient to convince us that afterward they yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness? But we are, indeed, only children of larger growth, and cannot endure present discomfort for a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

He tells us that these afflictions work for us this glory. Salvation, of course, is only attained through our blessed Saviour's blood, but it is the amount of self-denial, toil and suffering endured for His sake that entitles us to this great weight of glory. It is astonishing how affliction can have this effect; but it is undeniable that the most deeply afflicted of God's people have ever lived the nearest to him. Deprived by his providence of so many earthly objects of affection, their hearts are given exclusively to him. They abide in him and he in them; and discovering the unutterable sweetness and advantage of this close union, they do not regret the deprivation of earthly hopes and affections—although the relinquishment of them, in the first instance, occasioned greater anguish than the sacrifice of an eye, or of any member of their physical frame.

The circumstances attending our position in life often expose us to great danger and temptation, from which afflictions are our only safeguards. Our temperaments, too, are so diverse, that different methods of discipline are often required to suit the various cases. How little can most persons bear a permanent course of prosperity. How small a portion of their love have many bestowed upon a jealous God—who will not accept a fragment of a heart—until the objects of earthly idolatry were rent from them by a stroke that almost annihilated them. How attractive was the world, its riches, its elegancies, its pleasures, its works of art, so captivating to a refined taste, until a financial disaster suddenly engulfed all the means requisite to gratify these tastes; and they have then discovered charms, riches, beauties and pleasures in Christ Jesus, beside which all others fade into contemptible insignificance.

What would be a severe affliction to persons of sensitive temperaments would be but little regarded by those of a coarser mould of character; and trials are very often afflictions to us or not as our cast of character happens to make them such. But God avails himself of these constitutional peculiarities to accomplish his own purposes; and sometimes a life-long series of sufferings result from these peculiarities of temperament coming in conflict. He chooses afflictions as his most efficient auxiliaries; and He has different mediums of conveying them, but all with the same definite object in view. Suffering, too, must be the inevitable consequence of a consistently Christian course in a godless world; but we believe that one especial object of suffering is to complete the analogy between our blessed Lord's human life and that of his genuine disciple; and because the climax of holiness, greatness and happiness is reserved for the world to come.

Highest honors dependent on suffering. "If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him."—2 Tim. ii. 12. "If so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together."—Rom. viii. 17. "Inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy."—1 Peter ii. 13. James i. 12. And it is a most remarkable fact that our Saviour himself was made perfect through suffering.—Heb. ii. 10.

WHEN HIS GLORY IS REVEALED.

Then "they shall be glad also with exceeding joy." Although their internal joys have been great, as they believed in the forgiveness of sins, and confidently anticipated the final realization of all the blessed promises, yet their outward circumstances have been such as frequently to cast a shadow over their hearts, clouds upon their faces, and tears within their eyes. They said "Even so, Father, if it seemeth good in thy sight," but sometimes their human nature prayed that the cup might be removed, if consistent with His glory and their own good. As sin abounded in every direction, and sorrows overwhelmed, a portion of Gethsemane's gloom overshadowed them, and their souls were exceeding sorrowful, even unto death. They prayed and fasted in deep retirement, and in sadness waited until His glory should be revealed. Then they knew they should be glad with exceeding joy. They knew that it was given unto them not only to believe on Christ, but also to suffer for his sake, and anticipated no permanent delight until that glory was revealed. They believed those were happy who endured, and they waited for the revelation in patience and hope.

They watched for it. They watched every historical development with intense interest, and every indication in the moral and political world that harmonized with prophetical statements seemed an annunciation of His near approach. Then their eyes began to sparkle, and their heads became erect, as they recognized the signal of their coming redemption. Their joy alternated with grief as a long heavy silence seemed to proclaim, "My Lord delayeth his coming." But they knew they should be "glad with exceeding joy" when his glory should be revealed, and they did not sink into hopeless despondency and skepticism, but disappointment seemed only a stimulus to greater watchfulness.

Are we not called to this by the repeated command to suffer for Christ's sake? And if He had to learn obedience through suffering, and was promoted to the right hand of God in consequence, should the servant expect or desire to be above his Lord? He endured the cross and despised the shame for the joy that was set before him. Let us gladly suffer all things for His sake, that we may have a full participation in the joy when the glory is revealed.—Selected.

GLORYING IN THE LORD.

"Thus saith the Lord: Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom; neither let the mighty man glory in his might; let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me; that I am the Lord, which exercise loving kindness, judgment and righteousness in the earth; for in these I delight, saith the Lord."—Jer. ix. 23, 24.

IT is our intention—seeing that we may lawfully glory in the knowledge of the "Most High"—to indicate a few particulars in which the position occupied by the Christian is so greatly superior to that held by the children of the world, who know not God—that abundant cause to rejoice greatly, and to glory in our God, will be at once manifest.

1. What says the Spirit of God respecting those who were living without God, or who "did not like to retain the knowledge of him in their hearts?" They were "given over to a reprobate heart," and to practices unfit to be named: living in the practice of "murder, debate, deceit; hating God; without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful."—Rom. i. History and observation tell us the same story. "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God;" but it is still more dreadful and destructive to be living "without him" in the world.

Well, then, we may glory in knowing that God desires not the death of the sinner; nor that mankind should be left in such a deplorable condition. How glorious to know the sublime truth, that the everlasting God "so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever should believe in him might not perish, but have everlasting life!"—To know that God has checked man in his guilty career by a display of love to which, until then, man had been a stranger. We may well glory in this, and in the possession of those precious promises—the free gift of God. By these we are delivered from mental and moral slavery, and made to stand erect and free, with thoughts and desires stretched out towards the author of our being—our heavenly Father. It is indeed a glorious thing to know that our God needs not, as the idols of the heathen, to be propitiated with slaughter. Idolaters have sacrificed to their false deities whole hecatombs of their fellow-creatures, in order to propitiate them; but Jehovah gave up his Son to death that he might destroy the enemy of the human mind, and render man placable. "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." Jesus became one with us, that he might declare his Father's love and exemplify his character: and now we know God no longer as a dark and mighty abstraction, infinitely removed from our sphere of existence; but, as loving and pitying us, and remembering that we are but dust. Let him that will glory, glory in the Lord that bought him.

2. God has forgiven, and does forgive us, our iniquities. Well may we rejoice and glory. How much of peace and solid comfort is conferred upon us by this gift. If, when on bad terms with our fellow-men, we suffer distress, anxiety, or remorse, and view every act of the person with whom we are at variance in a distorted light, how dreadful would be the sense of sin unpardoned by God? How dreadful to be at variance with Jehovah, and view him as hotile? Insanity and suicide have resulted from an impression that sin had transcended the power of forgiveness; Judas is an example of this. But forgiveness is above and about us; we live in an atmosphere of pardon; and it will be our own fault if we do not realize its blissful power.

3. Again; we may glory in the knowledge of God's omnipresence and continual oversight over all his works. The old idolaters used to seek their gods in hills and dales, in caves and groves; the modern ones seek him whom they desire to worship in temples of wood and stone, in images, pictures, and even in a little paste! They seek, and of course do not find. And what wisdom is in them? Not enough to enable them even to discern their own deep degradation. Blessed be God, we know, and glory in the knowledge, that although "the heaven of heavens cannot contain him," God is present in the heart of his humblest worshipper, as well as everywhere present; therefore also we will not fear what men can do unto us. No one can take God at unawares, for "he neither slumbers nor sleeps." The eternity of God's omnipresence and superintending power tends to keep our consciences sensitive, and to spur us on to the exercise of a most unspeakable privilege, that is, of drawing near to God in prayer.

4. Prayer may be called the breath of our spiritual life. The Christian could not live without it. Oh that we could more properly appreciate its surpassing excellence. We are all familiar with the impassioned language in which David was wont to pour out his soul to God. It has been supposed that these Psalms are in reality the burning words and index of the thoughts and feelings of David's Son and Lord; and surely it is so. We know but little of the early life of Jesus, and of his secret intercommunication with God his Father, except as it is revealed in the spiritual heart-breathings of the sweet Psalmist of Israel. If it be so, we perceive how Jesus valued and exercised the privilege of prayer—how he thus shows us an example. We know how our joys are increased and our griefs lessened by being poured out into a sympathetic ear; but God has promised to be to us more than friend, brother or wife can ever be. This privilege highly exalts us. An appeal to an earthly monarch has to pass through ranks of obstructing officials with many formalities, and then perhaps does not reach the throne; but the king of kings stoops to receive the petition of the meanest of his subjects: "there is no respect of persons with God." If a sparrow falls not to the ground without him, how much more will he not preserve us, and remove, if need be, our troubles from us.

WAITING FOR THE LIGHT.

IT appears that a people will be found at the close of the dispensation who shall be looking for the Saviour, or waiting for the return of the Lord, when he shall come. To use the figure which he himself employs, "That you may open to him," whether he comes "at midnight, at the cock-crowing, or in the morning." The simple idea is, that of one person sitting up in the night, watching, waiting, looking for another, with this qualification: that the one expected is the beloved Master and Lord, who has kindly cared for the children, servants and all the members of the family; who has authority to demand this attention and expectation, and whose assurances of future benefit encourage the waiting and self-denial imposed by the conviction of his expected presence, and the fact of his still continued absence. The position is called blessed, in the gospel, "Blessed are those servants whom, when the Lord cometh, he shall find so doing." It is really waiting for him: for the light which he will bring. The longing for light may be relieved by the person coming who should appear with the light, or the benefit being obtained which the light should give. Sometimes the presence or the blessing is all we can expect the light to bestow.

Believers are like those who "wait for the morning."

The waiting position implies a readiness beforehand. If a walk or journey is requisite to take us to the station before we start, to wait signifies that we have taken that walk, and are at the station before the train arrives; at least, before the advertised time of leaving.

It is said that General Washington, at one time, upon breaking camp, found his body-servant a little behind in the arrangements for moving. "John," said the General, "do not let me find you thus again." Upon the next occasion he asked John, just before the appointed time for leaving, "Are you ready?"

"All packed up, sir," said John.

There is a plain intimation that the waiting class should suffer a disappointment in their expectations, as to the appearing of the Lord, and that darkness would be the result, while the requirement is that, if he should "tarry," (or seem to delay), "wait for him, he will not tarry, but surely come." This signifies that there will be no real delay—that, at the appointed time the presence will be found; but a seeming tarrying will exist from too full reliance upon calculation.

The real lover of Christ is always waiting for him; but more especially when the intimation of his return (signs) are patent. These, before the mind, will excite interest and lead to a looking, as we love a friend and would welcome him at any time, but should sit up for him if he had sent us word that he were coming.

If notified to move, the Christian is like John, "all packed up."

The mariners in the storm wait for the light. The poor shipwrecked sailor on the desolate isle will hail the light. The benighted traveller on the dark unknown road longs for the light. It is his life, strength and salvation. The sick, who must lie and wait for the morning, cannot but feel that there is a blessing in the light. They wait for it. Many a time did I say, last summer, as the darkness gathered in for gloom, "I must try to pass another long, weary night," and the nights were not literally long after the fitful and broken slumber which the fever would allow. I watched for the first signs of light, and for the light itself. There is company and society in the light. A man is not alone in the light. The merry songsters in that old tree by the window—the beautiful robin, whose shrill notes would never fail by three o'clock, in the short summer night, often led me to wait patiently for the sun-rising. I knew it was close by.

Brethren, the tried people are said to wait, even to be children of the light. They are aroused by the song. They love the light that will break on the vision in the morning hour. That will wake a deathless joy in the heart.

"Long, long we have been waiting," may the tried flock well sing, and with the joy and interest of a "faith that does not shrink," though long time elapse before the realization of the fond hope of immortality.

"We are waiting still, dear Lord, for thee," is a sentiment which swells the heart of the tried pilgrim on the stormy path of life, and now the illumination of a new glory bursts on the true but weary hearts—left long trusting and looking—confirmed, at the last, by the answer of the event to the prediction.

"Then, waiting brethren, let us sing. He will not tarry long."

This is the grand point to occupy, with life, vigor, zeal and earnest joy—a determined, happy labor, an unabated, undying devotion. God will reward the effort of the faithful soul . . . . to stand, to study and wait for truth, with the light. He will make known his purpose to his servants, the prophets, and the light of God in the kingdom of heaven shall be the portion of the vigilant and faithful in their watch for the rays of the everlasting morning.—Selected.

EXCOMMUNICATION OF DR. DOLLINGER.

SINCE the publication of Dr. Dollinger's refusal to accept the dogma of Papal Infallibility, events have developed in rapid succession. On the 2d of April the Archbishop of Munich issued a pastoral, threatening him, if he continued contumacious, with speedy excommunication. This was followed in a few days by an address to Dr. Dollinger from the professors of the University of Munich, most heartily sustaining his course. In this they ask: "What is to become of the Catholic world and our Fatherland, if it is no longer to be permitted within the Church to combine science and culture, uprightness of heart and candor of thought with religion?" Two days after the issuing of the University address, the king, who had taken great pains to show his sympathy with Dr. Dollinger, attended a mass celebrated by him in the royal chapel. On Easter Monday, a large meeting of Catholic laymen, held at Munich, adopted a petition to the king, praying that he would prohibit the teaching of the new dogma in the schools of the State. A like address from the municipal council of Vienna has been presented to the Emperor of Austria. After a second pastoral, the Archbishop, on April 18th, excommunicated Dr. Dollinger. It remains to be seen what will be the effect of this act.

Among the many addresses to Dr. Dollinger, most noteworthy is that from the University of Rome. It claims that the Italian race is as hostile as the German to the surrender of all intellectual freedom demanded by the infallibilists. Some of its sentences are very pungent. "The Catholic Church," say these professors, "has been for three centuries the company of Jesus. . . . The servitude of the intellect, abhorred by the Germanic race, is equally abhorred by the Roman—that is, the Italian race. Italian morality is no longer what it was in the sixteenth century, and now we know that the cause of reform should be fought and won by the two united nations—the Italians and the Germans." These are brave words. May they, as sparks, kindle a great flame in Europe.

One strong point with the Germans, in their opposition to the decrees of the Council, is the Italian preponderance in its composition. According to the best authorities, the Italian bishops in attendance numbered quite 400; of whom 143 represented the former States of the Church, and 120 were without dioceses, some of the latter created on the eve of the assembling of the Council. No wonder that the Germans protest against the decrees of such a packed body. It was just as much a fraud as a packed political convention.

Should the contest between the Infallibilists and Anti-infallibilists come to a crisis, we may see a separation of German Catholicism from its connection with the See of Rome. The present agreements between the Catholic Ssates and the Papacy must either be revised or abrogated As we have before said, Dr. Dollinger is too old to play the part of a Luther, but he has declared with true German independence that he will not go down to the grave with a lie in his mouth. And he will keep his work.—The Methodist.

A Touching Story.

In the cemetery at Nashville, Tennessee, a stranger was seen planting a flower over a soldier's grave. When asked, "Was your son buried there?"

"No," was the answer.

"Your son-in-law?"

"No."

"A brother?"

"No."

"A relative?"

"No."

After a moment, the stranger laid down a small board which he held in his hand and said:

"Well, I will tell you. When the war broke out, I was a farmer in Illinois. I wanted to enlist, but I was poor. I had a wife and seven children. I was drafted. I had no money to hire a substitute, and so I made up my mind that I must leave my poor, sickly wife and little children, and go and fight the enemy. After I had got all ready to go, a young man whom I knew came to me and said: 'You have a big family, which your wife cannot take care of. I will go for you.' He did go in my place, and in the battle of Chickamauga he was wounded and taken to Nashville hospital. But after long sickness he died, and was buried here, and ever since I have wanted to come to Nashville and see his grave; and so I saved up all the spare money I could, and yesterday I came on, and to-day I found my dear friend's grave."

With tears of gratitude running down his cheeks, he took up the small board and pressed it down into the ground in the place of a tomb-stone. Under the soldier's name were written only these words:

"HE DIED FOR ME."

Various Gifts.

Christians vary as the leaves of the forest, and are only prepared to be useful when they cease "comparing themselves among themselves, and measuring themselves among themselves." If God has given you a courageous, outspoken nature, consecrate it to Christ. Do not try to be like your friend whose life-work is as unlike yours as the expression of his face and the form of his person. Every Christian can find a place to work in the vineyard. Giving himself unreservedly to Christ, Christ will mould him into his own precious image, and give full exercise to every power.

The Welsh Peasant.

It is told of a poor peasant on the Welch mountains, that month after month, year after year, through a long period of declining life, he was used every morning, as soon as he awoke, to open his casement-window toward the east, and look out, to see if Jesus Christ was coming. He was no calculator, or he need not look so long; he was a student of prophecy, or he would not have looked at all; he was ready, or he would not have been in so much haste; he was willing, or he would rather have looked another way; he loved, or it would not have been the first thought of the morning. Often, when in the morning the child of God awakes, wearily and encumbered with the flesh, perhaps from troubled dreams, perhaps with troubled thoughts, his Father's secret comes presently across him; he looks up, if not out, to feel, if not to see, the glories of that last morning when the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall arise indestructible; no weary limbs to bear the spirit down; no feverish dreams to haunt the visions; no dark forecasting of the day's events, or returning memory of the griefs of yesterday.—Selected.

"If you Love Me, Lean Hard."

The Boston "Recorder" relates the following: "Miss Fiske, while in the Nestorian Mission, was at one time in feeble health, and much depressed in spirits. One hot Sabbath afternoon she sat on her mat on the chapel-floor, longing for support and rest, feeling unable to maintain her trying position until the close of worship. Presently she felt a woman's form seated at her back, and heard the whisper: 'Lean on me.'

"Scarcely yielding to the request, she heard it repeated: 'Lean on me.' Then she divided her weight with the gentle pleader, but that did not suffice. In earnest, almost reproachful tones, the voice again urged: 'If you love me, lean hard.' This incident is worth a whole volume of commentary on the nature of true love, which is happiest when it can do most for the loved one."

The faith which can truly say, My Shepherd! My Lord! My God! My Rock! turns prophecies into history, promises into deliverances, sorrows into joys, prisons into palaces, perils into victories, death into life. Nothing else can do as much.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, MAY 24, 1871.

Church Organization: A Question.

"If it is not too much trouble, I would like to know how you harmonize Matt. xviii. 15–18, with no church organization?" G.

We believe in church organization. Our opposition is to human organizations called churches. Christ has organized his own church. "The Lord added to the church," is the divine testimony. Christ is the "rock" on which, saith he, "I will build my Church." All believers in him are, by virtue of their faith, "by one Spirit baptized into one body"—"the body of Christ."—1 Cor. xii. 13, 27. Love cements them together, and, if let alone, would continue a perfect organization; but men, who, too often, "seek their own, and not the things which are Jesus Christ's," set themselves to the work of *dis*organization of the true church to make a sectarian, or partisan church, and set themselves up to dictate what these divided sheep shall believe, and what they shall not believe, and thus bring in heresies (that is, divisions), and then claim "ours is the church," thus deceiving and enslaving the Lord's free men, and forbidding them to grow in knowledge, unless they grow as these "lords over God's heritage" bid them, i. e., in harmony with their creeds of human invention.

Let it be distinctly understood, then, we believe in church organization; but we do not believe that any of the denominational organizations are churches of Christ, as such. They are just what they call themselves. They have taken the name that suits them, and thereby show their preference for it before the name of Christ. We believe in all these organizations there are those who truly belong to the church of Christ, but they are in bondage so far that they are not allowed the exercise of freedom to believe and communicate to others any new truth that may be brought to their attention. They are, therefore, in captivity in Babylon. We look for the great decree of him who is greater than Cyrus, to bring them out of their bondage ere long. Some few have a foretaste of that freedom, even now; but "they are men wondered at,"—Zech. iii. 8; but they must bear the burden of beholding the church's desolations, till the Head thereof shall come and restore all things; then shall every "lively stone" find its place in the glorious organization, and have its proper work and office, and the building shall be glorious. The party names, and self-constituted churches, will go "to the moles and to the bats," and be heard of no more forever. Let us take heed that we are, of Christ, "added to the church"—the true body of Christ.

The Sabbath: Questions.

Br. Jas. H. Jacobs, of Blodgett's Mills, N. Y., asks us to say something on the Sabbath question; and the following questions have been put to us by another person, viz:

1. Do I understand aright by understanding the ten commandments to be the royal law of God? If so, am I not breaking this law by not observing the seventh day as a holy rest day, instead of the first?
2. Christ, in fulfilling this law, and honoring the law, does not make it of none effect, does he? If so, does he not require me to fulfil and honor it?
3. If any part of them is binding, are they not all binding? For he says we are guilty of all if we offend in one point.

We respond to these questions as follows:

"1." "The royal law," James himself defines, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The law of love is the royal law. "God is love." That law of love guides him in all things, and is the law that is to guide us in all our conduct toward our fellow creatures. All the specifications named by Jesus in this connection show that it is our conduct toward men the royal law applies to.

"2." As to the law-Sabbath, the great complaint of the formalists and hypocrites of his day was, that "He kept not the Sabbath day."

"3." Whatever Christ incorporated into the requirements of the gospel is "binding"—nothing more.

As to any binding authority to call one day in seven the Sabbath, or to observe one as such, in the ordinary idea of such a day, we have no evidence that Christ or his apostles have given any. To attempt to fix the seventh part of time upon the followers of Christ as a Sabbath and a binding institution, is to usurp the authority of Christ, and thus take the mark of the Man of Sin. No authority for any such thing exists under the administration of Jesus the Messiah. The attempt to fix the seventh-day Sabbath upon the followers of Christ, as of binding obligation, is of the same character as the attempts to fix upon them circumcision, and is often accompanied with the same spirit that is recorded Acts xv. 1. That is—"Except ye keep the seventh-day Sabbath, ye cannot be saved." All are doomed to perdition that do not believe and act as they do on the subject. We are happy to know there are exceptions.

When the apostles and elders came together at Jerusalem, to consider the matter in regard to observing the law of Moses, the decision was unanimous that those who were "turned to God from among the Gentiles," were "not to be troubled" with any such thing. See Acts xv. Let us give the words of that memorable council. They are as follows:

"Forasmuch as we have heard that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, Ye must be circumcised and keep the law, to whom we gave no such commandment, it seemed good to us, being assembled with one accord, to send chosen men unto you with our beloved Barnabas and Paul, men who have hazarded their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. We have sent, therefore, Judas and Silas, who shall also tell you the same things by mouth. For it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things: that ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication; from which, if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well. Fare ye well."

Here is no recognition of the Law-Sabbath, seventh-day Sabbath, or any other Sabbath. A very strange omission, if of such obligation as the advocates of that institution now maintain. But the "apostles and elders" do here affirm that the converts "from among the Gentiles" were not commanded to "keep the law," verse 24: and of course were not commanded to keep the Sabbath of the law. And Paul, who was a principal actor in that council, and in the controversy thus settled by authority, admonishes the Christians at Colosse, "Let no man judge you in respect of a holy day, or of the Sabbath," and adds, "Which are a shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ." He asserts that Christians were "dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world;" which latter phrase signifies "elementary" principles—the lowest parts of knowledge. Such was the law economy, as given by Moses, and which, Paul affirms, in this same chapter, Christ "took out of the way, nailing it to his cross;" and also affirms that one of those things taken out of the way and nailed to the cross, was the "Sabbath."

Not one writer in the New Testament countenances the idea that the Sabbath had any sanctity above any other day of the week. A Christian's whole life, and every day is to be consecrated to God. "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."

When Paul wrote to a church composed of both Jews and Gentiles, as that at Rome was, he settles this question thus, chap. xiv. he says: "One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day;" and he adds: "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." In the result, he says: "Why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at naught thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ."

Here was one portion of a Christian community who were Jews, and had been brought up under the law commanding the observance of the Sabbath; and though now converted, they could not at once overcome all their Jewish prejudices, particularly the observance of one day above another, and Paul decides it was not necessary they should; while on the other hand, another portion of that church had been brought up Gentiles, with no observance of one day above another, and Paul affirms it was not necessary they should esteem one day more than another. Here is the true New Testament ground to stand upon—the ground of charity and forbearance, and caution against judging one another in these matters.

We forbear entering fully into this subject, but must content ourself at this time, with mere hints. A few words more shall conclude our remarks. If the Sabbath, as given by Moses, is binding now, it is so in all its claims and denunciations. Let those who strenuously contend that it is now of binding obligation, see whether they themselves are not condemned by the Sabbath law. "Whosoever doeth any work in the Sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death."—Ex. xxxii. 15.

The Sabbath was, and still is binding on all who are under the law. They who are under the law will "be judged by the law."—Rom. ii. 12. All the curses of a broken law and violated Sabbath fall upon them. "But ye," believers in Christ, "are not under the law, but under grace." "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth (or the substance), came by Jesus Christ."—John i. 17. The law was the shadow, Christ is the substance. Hence "We which have believed do enter into rest," etc. Heb. iv. 3; we have the substance in distinction from the shadow, which was by the law of Moses.

"Tell me," saith Paul, "ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law?"—Gal. iv. 21. He then says, "Abraham had two sons, one by a bondmaid, the other by a freewoman. But he of the bondwoman was born after the flesh, but he of the freewoman by promise." He then adds, "Which things are an allegory (an illustration); for these (two women) are (an illustration of) the two covenants; the one from Mount Sinai which gendereth to bondage, which is Hagar, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children." And why are they "in bondage?" Because they adhere to the Sinaic law as a covenant. But "Jerusalem which is above (represented by the freewoman), is free, which is the mother of us all" who believe in Messiah. "But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him after the Spirit, even so it is now." Those who will continue under the Sinaic law, or return to it after once being made free, manifest the same spirit, sooner or later, that the bondwoman's son did, viz., a persecuting spirit, showing a departure from the spirit of the gospel of Christ and his apostles. Let them beware lest they are "cast out" with "the bondwoman and her son."

We wish it understood distinctly, that what we have said is not designed to apply to those who honestly believe Sabbath-keeping is obligatory on them, if they hold that view in charity to others who differ from them. But in many, who have been led under the law-Sabbath, we have seen and been made to feel that there is a lack of honesty and integrity, which might justly be ascribed to the Ishmaelite spirit of the bondwoman's son.

If it be asked, "Is not the Sabbath law a part of the moral law?" We unhesitatingly answer, No. A moral law relates to what is unchangeably right in itself, and is something commanded because it is thus right. If there were no command, it would be binding on men to act according to this principle: that is, if there was no specific command we would be bound to act the same in relation to the object; for example, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" is morally binding on every man, though it had never been embodied in a formal law, because it is unchangeably right in itself, and is essential to the welfare and harmony of society.

The Sabbath law is a positive law, and the keeping of that law was binding on those to whom it was given, and to no others; it is right because it is commanded, and made right by the command; and is not, like a moral law, right merely of itself.

The moral law is binding on all people, everywhere, "written in their hearts."—Rom. ii. 15. But the Sabbath law is not thus written in all hearts, and therefore is not of the moral law, but is a positive institution, and belongs only to the people to whom it was given.

A moral law has no such restriction; it is binding on all men, everywhere, and under all circumstances, and cannot be violated without sin; so that though they have not the written law, their "conscience bears witness, and their thoughts accuse or excuse" their conduct.—Rom. ii. 15. Not so the Sabbath law. A positive and known command alone can make that binding on any one. Under some circumstances it would be impossible to keep the Sabbath-law, and that fact demonstrates it not a moral law. For instance, a slave of an ungodly master is converted to serve God; his master will not allow him to keep Sabbath; he is compelled to disregard it. If it were the moral law he should die rather than not keep it. But it is a positive institution, given to a people as a whole, and the master, as well as the servant, was obliged to keep it; that is, it was a positive law to Israel, as a nation; all of whom must keep it.

But when the gospel goes out to all nations, it deals with individuals, as such; it carries with it moral laws, and those only. These are all incorporated into the gospel precepts; but the gospel rest is the substance; and the Sabbath-law is not incorporated into the gospel as an external observance. We that "believe do enter in rest." We enter into Christ, and find the true Sabbatical rest begun, to be consummated at the resurrection.

"Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." We esteem it a great mercy that the providence of God has so ordered it that one day in seven is observed as a day of rest. The influence of it is good, both physically and morally. But as to any positive law for its observance, there is none under the gospel economy. So we believe.

The Controversy:

Disallowed of Men: Chosen of God.

"But chosen of God, and precious." Who is God's choice? Jesus Christ. For what did he choose him? To be the foundation and head of a new and spiritual creation. The animal, or Adamic foundation gave way, and the race were going out of life—perishing. God has chosen, elected, selected, accepted, approved, a new foundation or head; Jesus Christ, the second Adam, on whom to build a spiritual structure; one that shall be durable, eternal. The first Adam was a foundation of the earth earthy; liable therefore to fail; but the failure would show to men that they need a more substantial and permanent foundation.

The second Adam is of heavenly origin; possessing, by the gift of the Holy Spirit without measure, a power which enabled him to overcome the animal nature, which he possessed in common with the first Adam and his posterity. Thus prepared, he triumphed, and the animal nature being crucified, he rose from the dead, by the power of the eternal Spirit, wholly a spiritual being; and God hath chosen him as the foundation and head of a new and spiritual creation or building from among the children of men. A spiritual nature, immortality, incorruptibility, eternal life, are all derived from him, and from no other source can they be obtained by any of the first of Adam's race.

Here is the Controversy: God has made his choice, as he has the right to do; and he calls upon all men, everywhere, to harmonize in the choice, assuring them there is hope from no other quarter; no future life, or life from the dead; no spiritual nature; no immortality; no incorruptibility; no endless life, except through this foundation or living head of the new creation. "There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we can live."

Here is the whole controversy between God and men. Men disallow, disapprove, reject God's choice. They will to enter on a future life, and pretend they have an immortal soul, a spiritual nature, a deathless element that inheres in themselves; and thus virtually set aside God's chosen method for the bestowment of a future life, immortality, and incorruptibility. They refuse to yield their fancies and wills to God's will; and thus the controversy goes on. God is well pleased with his choice of a living Stone—Jesus, the Life-giver. In his sight that Stone is "precious," honorable, highly esteemed, costly: but men are dissatisfied with it, and cast it aside: it is too humiliating to them to admit they are of the dust, and have no higher principle in their nature; their proud hearts would "be as Gods"—spiritual, immortal, without being dependent on God's chosen medium—Jesus—for such qualities.

One or the other of the parties in this controversy must yield, or eternal dissolution must be the fate of man. Does any man think God will yield to their impious claims, and approve of their attempts or neglect of his "chosen and precious" Life-giver? Are any desperate enough to suppose they can successfully contest this matter with the Almighty? Alas, for such, they will soon find they must bow to the Divine will or perish forever "like the beasts that perish." All the efforts of men to arrive at immortality, incorruptibility, endless life, except in Jesus Christ alone, are as fruitless and vain as if they should attempt to blow out the sun by the puff of their breath. They must submit to God's terms, or go back to the dust from whence they came, and eternally "remain in the congregation of the dead."—Prov. xxi. 16. All the efforts of men to arrive at life future and eternal by any other means or method than that God has chosen, will be as fruitless as the attempt at Babylon to build a tower up to heaven: and the confusion of language at that time was no greater than the vexations that men now inflict on themselves and each other in efforts to make it appear that they are what God has never given them power to be, aside from the regeneration by Christ Jesus and the resurrection. They would now, "be as Gods;" or, be immortal and live forever without Christ.

Those who acquiesce in God's "chosen and precious" Stone, or foundation, become as "lively stones"—stones having life by their connection with it—and "are built up a spiritual house," a dwelling, a mansion, a house of God, "a temple of the Holy Spirit," and thus will be brought into the future and endless life: die no more, and be forever with the Lord. Let the Controversy end, now and forever.

The Standard of Appeal.

There are those who cannot receive the views we advocate, because, say they, "Eminent men, and 'the Fathers' in early times held and practised differently." We have long since learned that the Bible is the standard of appeal, and is to settle all controversies about "faith and practice." That which cannot be clearly proved by this standard, may be tolerated, but is no authority, nor a test of Christian faith or character. It is beyond all doubt, in our mind, that all the heresies and false practices that have scourged the church from its earliest history, have grown out of a disposition to follow men instead of adhering to the unadulterated word of God. In this matter we are at perfect agreement with Dr. Adam Clarke, in his Commentary on Prov. viii. He says:

> But of these ("the Fathers,") we may safely state there is not a truth in the orthodox creed that cannot be proved by their authority; nor a heresy that has disgraced the Romish church that may not challenge them as its abettors. In points of doctrine their authority is nothing to me. The word of God alone contains my creed.

Such is exactly the position we have occupied for thirty years past; and which we shall endeavor to maintain to the end of our Christian course. So long as we have the Bible as a standard of appeal, it gives us no sort of uneasiness what can be produced from "the Fathers," or any other great or good men opposing our views. They are but men, and as liable to err as ourself. Let us have Bible testimony, and let its construction be regulated by the general tenor thereof and the known or revealed perfections of God. "God is love:" and any construction of his word that contradicts this testimony must be erroneous, however plausible it may appear.

Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

"And they stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit! and he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. And when he said this, he fell asleep."—Acts vii. 59, 60. "And devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him."—Chap. viii.

Concerning this text little need be said. They who so zealously defend the punctuation of Christ's promise to the thief, being well aware that its seeming service of their theory results wholly from the punctuation of the text, lose their ardor for that kind of defence when they reach here. None will deny that the text as it stands attributes the act of calling upon God to the murderous Jews. We might, therefore, press against the popular theory so much of the sentiment of the text as is due to the style of punctuation, but, recognizing the fallibility of the translators, we freely admit that the circumstances of the case render it certain that it was Stephen who thus called. Dr. Alexander renders the text thus: "And they stoned Stephen calling (upon God) and saying," etc.

Our author, like many others of his faith, finds it very convenient sometimes to assume that "spirit" and "soul" are one and the same. "For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit," etc.—Heb. iv. 12. If soul and spirit are one and the same, and an immaterial entity, how, pray tell us, can they be divided? Is such an entity, notwithstanding "indivisibility" has so long been affirmed of it, after all capable of being torn asunder? But the passage certainly indicates that soul and spirit are two things, and as such are capable of being separated. So, too, the following:

"And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."—1 Thess. v. 23. Do men possess two abstract entities capable of conscious existence separately from the organization and from each other? If so, and the soul is the man, what sort of an existence is the spirit? Our author's theory makes the living being called man a most singular complication, unlike any thing in the heavens above or in the earth beneath, so far as either science or revelation enlighten us.

When Samson was at one time "sore athirst" he said, "and now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hands of the uncircumcised?" But water was given him;

"and when he had drunk, his spirit came again, and he revived."

The theory of so-called orthodox theologists is that when what they call the spirit leaves the organization the body is dead. If this be so then Samson must have been dead when he drank the water, for it was not until he drank that his "spirit came again and he revived." They will hardly insist that this passage teaches the existence of a spirit-entity; and yet they would vigorously urge it as proof of such existence did not the act of drinking precede the return of the departed spirit. Of course, the spirit that returned was nothing more than Samson's animation, rigor.

A nearly famished Egyptian was found and brought to David, who furnished him with food. "And when he had eaten, his spirit came again to him."—1 Sam. xxx. 12. This is another instance of a man's spirit leaving him, and being brought back again by taking nourishment. Nobody will be so simple as to suppose that a conscious spirit-entity is here referred to. It would, however, be no more unreasonable than is the same supposition concerning many other texts that are urged in support of the spirit-entity theory.

The Greek term for spirit, in the text, Acts vii. 59, is pneuma. Its corresponding, or Hebrew term is ruah. They are generally translated spirit; but they are also rendered breath, air, wind, mind, life, disposition, etc. Like the Hebrew term nephesh, rendered soul, it is sometimes applied to the beasts. That it ever means an entity in man capable of conscious existence when separated from the organization, we deny, since there is absolutely no proof of it.

Pneuma, the principle of life, is sometimes, as may be the case in the record of Stephen's death, put for life itself. "Pull me out of the net that they" (David's enemies) "have laid privily for me; for thou art my strength. Into thy hands I commit my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth."—Psa. xxxi. 4, 5. It will not be claimed that David wanted to die and hence desired that God might take away an immaterial, immortal spirit, for just the reverse is plainly true of the psalmist. His enemies planned his destruction. In the emergency he did not trust in himself, for it seemed that his enemies must triumph for aught he could do to prevent them; "but," said he, "I trust in the Lord." "Thou hast" heretofore "redeemed me, O Lord God of truth;" therefore "into thine hand I now commit my spirit," my life, for safety.

"For the which cause I also suffer these things: nevertheless I am not ashamed: for I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against (unto) that day."—2 Tim. i. 12. What was it Paul committed to Christ, being persuaded that his Saviour is able to keep it until the day of final reward? All must admit that it was his life, that life which he possessed by virtue of union with Christ, the author of eternal life. It was not the natural life that Paul referred to: he had good reason to expect that would be destroyed by violence.

To the church at Colosse, Paul wrote: "Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth. For ye are dead" (condemned to death, hence reckoned as dead) "and your life is hid with Christ in God."—Col. iii. 2, 3. Here it is distinctly stated that it is a life which those believers committed to Christ, and it is "hid with" him "in God." That being the case, when will they receive that life, and thus enter upon their reward? Will it be at death? When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.—Ver. 4. It is at the second coming of Christ that saints enter upon their reward: it is then they receive eternal life in full and glorious reality.

Mr. George contends, and in this he simply echoes latter-day theology, that the soul was Stephen's self; and he contends also that departed souls are in hades, which he also terms paradise, between death and the resurrection. If this be so, then, even if we admit the existence of a spirit-entity apart from the body, Stephen's prayer was not answered, and Stephen must, under such a supposition, have been well aware that it would not be, for though Christ was in hades (Bible hades) between his death and resurrection he is now, and was when Stephen was martyred, in heaven, sitting at the right hand of God. If, therefore, Stephen prayed Christ to receive a conscious spirit-entity, surely none will insist that he received answer to the prayer if that entity went directly to hades, there to remain until the resurrection morning.

Suppose we admit, for the moment, that a spirit-entity was Stephen's self, the person, the real man; what then? Would the admission help the theory we combat? By no means. The text distinctly states that Stephen, the man, "fell asleep," and that "devout men carried" him, the man, Stephen, "to his burial, and made great lamentation over him." Why deny this account, and say Stephen did not fall asleep, and was not buried? We confess to an utter inability to discover any wisdom in a denial of this plain testimony of inspiration. We would not deny it on any consideration, however seemingly important.

"For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day."—2 Cor. iv. 17.

A writer remarks concerning this language:

"From this it is often inferred, as Paul spake of an outer and inner man, man must be a double entity, having one real man inside of another. To this we have no great objection, but insist on knowing what the inner man is. It cannot be the immortal soul, for that cannot be renewed day by day: immortality is an unchangeable attribute."

To this Mr. George replies thus:

"The writer would cast dust in our eyes by stating that immortality is an unchangeable attribute, and, therefore, the soul cannot change in any sense. But did ever any one contend that immortality was the only attribute of the soul?"

If there is any casting of dust on the part of any one, in this matter, we think the reader will at once perceive who the guilty party is, and will say of Mr. G., "thou art the man." He claims that immortality is an attribute of the human soul, and at the same time he affirms the soul is the "inward (man)" which Paul said "is renewed day by day." This is an obvious contradiction. If immortality is an attribute of the human soul, then the soul cannot be renewed, and consequently cannot be that to which Paul referred in the language under consideration. What is the meaning of renew? Webster says:

"To make over as good as new; to restore to former freshness or perfection; to give new life to; to restore; to re-establish."

Paul uses the term in the sense of making new spiritually; being transformed. "Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind."—Rom. xii. 2. Renewed, therefore, as used by Paul in 2 Cor. iv. 16, necessarily implies a tendency on the part of the "inward (man)," in the absence of the renewing power, to decay, to wasting away, to disestablishment. Hence we say, if the expression "inward (man)" has reference to an entity in man, then the text proves beyond controversy that immortality is not an attribute of that entity, for it must be a fact, of course, that immortality is not subject to any wasting process, and cannot, therefore, have need of renewal; neither is it subject to disestablishment, and so cannot require re-establishing.

But, says Mr. George, "did ever any one contend that immortality was the only attribute of soul?" He seems to entirely overlook the fact that the writer whom he quotes does not intimate that any one "did ever" so contend: he is not speaking so much about what attributes are claimed for the theological soul, as of the nature of the attribute immortality.

Dr. Lange says: "The outward man is an expression found only in this place, and it denotes the whole personal existence, so far as it is embodied in nature and the laws of the external common life. On the other hand, our inward (man), denotes the same personal existence, so far as it is determined by the Divine law, and participates in the fulness of the Divine life. . . . The doctrine of Collenbusch and Menken, that the inner man is an invisible body, existing in some concealed form within us, cannot be sustained by any natural exegesis, or by the plain meaning of the words."

Theologists generally agree, substantially, with Collenbusch and Menken, for our confident author but expresses a common sentiment when he claims that the theological soul-entity is the man, and only resides in a clay tenement which, when the soul leaves it, is only the remains of a man. Such a doctrine, we affirm, in the language of Dr. Lange, "cannot be sustained by any natural exegesis, or by the plain meaning" of Scripture "words." Meyer thinks outward man denotes "that which is visible in us, i. e., our corporeal nature, and inward (man) our intellectual, rational and moral selves."

We feel quite safe in saying Paul's inward man was his mind. "For I delight in the law of God after the inward man."—Rom. vii. 22. There can be no question, we think, that the apostle here uses inward man for his mind. That this is so he plainly enough indicates in ver. 23: "But I perceive another law in my members, making war against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law which is in my members." Paul delighted in "the law of God," his mind, reason and judgment, approving it and causing him to take pleasure in its practice. But the law of the members, the appetites and passions, forming a kind of another self, was continually waging war with the better self, and brought the reason somewhat into captivity to the inferior power. Paul's whole meaning is still further indicated in ver. 25 of chap. vii.: "So then, with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin." What can be plainer than that Paul's "inward (man)" was the mind, and his "outward man" the flesh, with its members.

Dr. Adam Clarke, writing on Rom. vii. 22, quotes as follows from one whom he characterizes as a "pious and sensible writer:" "The inward man always signifies the mind; which either may, or may not, be the subject of Grace." It is so plain that inward man means the mind, we think he must be straitened indeed, who will go to 2 Cor. iv. 16 for proof of the doctrine of inherent immortality.

MATTHEW XXV.

BY ELD. R. V. LYON.

MATTHEW XXV. is the "Fort Sumter" of the doctrine of eternal woe. "These shall go away into everlasting punishment." By the believers in the slanderous doctrine of eternal woe, it is asserted that the wicked must exist eternally, in order that the punishment be eternal. "For if they are utterly destroyed, it would be no punishment." No punishment to be eternally cut off from life, and remain eternally dead. O, what a vindictive spirit has found a place in the heart of man.

The Greek word, rendered punishment in this text, is kolasin, and is defined by lexicographers, "cut off, loss, prune, curtail, check, correct, chastise, punish;" but none, of proper authority, render it torment. To illustrate: You step into your orchard and cut off a limb from a tree and cast it upon the ground; it will go to dust. So will the wicked be cut off from life, (Jesus our LIFE-GIVER,) and be reduced to dust. Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.

The doctrine of eternal woe makes God the author of a law which will perpetuate evil eternally. Consequently, at war with the mission of Jesus; which was, "to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." It makes God the creator of a vast number of human beings with immortal souls, so that he might torment them eternally. A child who has just reached the hour of accountability, and has committed one sin, dies; that child must suffer eternal torment. Millions of children, who have just passed the rubicon of accountability, and committed a few sins, must be eternally tormented in a sea of literal fire, with Nero, Julian, the apostate, and such like characters, who have spilt the blood of the saints and the prophets. It places some of the most amiable and lovely of our race, because they have not subscribed to a certain creed, in a sea of literal fire, where they are to burn eternally, with the vilest of the vile. It puts the heathen, who have never heard of Jesus, though they have lived up to the light of nature, into a PAGAN hell, where they will be writhing in pain, anguish, and hopeless despair eternally.

The doctrine of eternal torment presents the loving God of the Bible as the greatest tyrant in the wide world. He has caused man to be created so that he can sin; He places them in the midst of temptation, where they may sin. After they have sinned, He places them in a lake of literal fire, where they can neither die nor reform, and then torments them eternally, because he has power so to do. Oh, "orthodoxy!" Shame on thy creed. Where are thy preachers to be found, who believe in this heathen dogma? Echo answers, Where?

FROM MRS. S. A. GOODRICH.

BR. STORRS: Through the mercies of our heavenly Father, I pen a few lines to you once more. I am still in feeble health, but am better than I was when I last wrote to you. I can say, as I look around me this beautiful morn, the longer I live I see more and more of His goodness. It seems as if the hand of the Lord was in everything around us, to show forth his praises. Oh that all that hath breath might praise him. I am so glad that I am worthy to be called one of his children. I think many times that I am the most unworthy of them all; but I try to be submissive, and do the best I can while passing through this affliction. I often wonder why the Lord is so good to me. I am glad that he knows all about us, and knows just what we need to purify us. If the cross cannot be removed only by suffering, then let us be willing to be placed just where he sees it is best for us. If our heavenly Father sees best to place the cup to our lips, I am willing to drink it to the bottom, if I can be saved in no other way. I have felt many times as if it would be wrong to ask him to remove it. If I can glorify him more by suffering, then I will gladly do it.

This passage often comes to my mind, "For I reckon the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us." Just think of it; this one promise ought to sustain every Christian heart in every trial. May we all be patient and endure them a little longer; for in a little while we shall obtain the prize; then we will lay down the cross and take up the crown.

What a glorious gathering that will be, when earth's weary ones shall come together singing the song of the redeemed! Then the tears of sorrow shall be wiped from all faces. Blessed be the name of the Lord. But I often think there will be some tears of joy there. May the love of God dwell in the hearts of all the readers of our paper; and may they all be baptized with the Spirit; so that we may commune with the Master, and drink new wine at the table of our Lord when he establishes his kingdom on Zion's holy hill. I mean to be there. Oh, how good the Lord is to provide such a place for us. Blessed day; may we all live as expectants of it, and not fall out by the way; for all our trials will soon end, and Jesus be all and in all to us forevermore. Blessed thought!

When gladness wings my favored hour,
Thy love my thoughts shall fill;
Resigned when storms of sorrow lower,
My soul shall meet thy will;
My lifted eye, without a tear,
The gathering storm shall see;
My steadfast heart shall know no fear;
This heart will rest on thee.

Where else can we rest but in the Lord? May our Father in heaven bless all those who are laboring in his cause, and give them strength sufficient for their day; and may the kingdom soon come, is the prayer of your sister.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., May 14, 1871.

S. B. EMMONS, Lancaster, S. C., writes: My interest in the HERALD increases, more and more, as I read it. I wish I could contribute more to its support than the mere subscription price, but I cannot. My friends say I am doing great harm to the cause of religion by reading such a paper as the HERALD and offering it to others to read. I reply by saying, An injury or harm to religion, and injury to sectarian prejudices, are two separate and distinct propositions. I wish you could hear some of our preachers attempt to prove from the Bible the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the wicked to life, and their eternal torments in hell. I am sometimes amused, but oftener pained to hear their vain efforts to uphold their tottering but pet dogmas.

HOW TO PROMOTE GRATITUDE.

JUDGING not only from myself, but from what I see too common in others, I conclude that gratitude for favors received, whether from God or man, is one of the most evanescent feelings of the human mind—whilst it is only in proportion as we can make it a permanent and ever active principle of our mind, that we prove ourselves worthy of those favors. I find it advisable and necessary, therefore, to use every means in my power to keep this feeling alive and active in my own breast.

The enlightened principles which we profess, and the views which we have taken of Christianity, are, I am well aware, when rightly appreciated and fully felt, capable of becoming almost omnipotent in their influence on the human character; yet divested as they are of all external forms, and unaccompanied by the false checks and the unfounded hopes and fears which superstition presents to its votaries, they are of so refined a nature as almost to elude the mind's grasp. Surrounded also as we are by objects and circumstances which are tangible to, and lay such fast hold on our senses—an invisible Being, and future and distant hopes, must maintain an unequal advantage in the competition for our affection and regard.

Persuaded of this, I have felt the absolute necessity of throwing into the opposite scale the most powerful auxiliaries, in order to turn the balance, and to revive and confirm those grateful, pious and devout feelings, so essentially necessary to the character of the Christian, and which alone can enable him to resist the temptations, and encounter the difficulties to which he may be exposed, or to perform with cheerfulness the duties to which he may be called. To call up in my mind, therefore, every grateful feeling to my heavenly Father, I make it a practice to take a retrospective view of what I originally was—of my circumstances—my expectations and prospects—of what I might, and probably should have been, but for the kind, unmerited and providential care of the Most High! I trace back every step of my life, and mark in how many instances he has brought about my good—even in opposition to my own views and wishes—in cases where, had my own plans proved successful, they would only have led to my injury, and probably my ruin.

All that I am, have or enjoy, I can trace to His bounty, and feel that I am but a creature of his providence; a thought which enhances every blessing, and sweetens every enjoyment. I call before me every circumstance that has contributed to make my existence a blessing—whether in the world, in my family, or in the church of God; and with all these accumulated and combined, I find my judgment convinced, and my heart filled with gratitude; knowing that to him, my gracious and all bountiful Benefactor, I owe every thing. As a natural consequence, I feel towards him all that filial love and reverence which (to say the least) I should feel for a father or a friend, who had disinterestedly watched over me for my good, and with benevolent regard directed my every step.

By thus reflecting on the past, and by a frequent repetition of this exercise of the mind, I find that, like other habits, this practice becomes almost involuntary; and that when I think of the Deity, it necessarily revives and connects this chain of association. To render these impressions the stronger, I think it necessary and proper frequently to recur to the same practice of retrospection, and by every means in my power to confirm and strengthen the disposition of mind thus obtained. Thus it is, my beloved friend, that we may acquire a high and indelible sense of gratitude to the Supreme Being, and thereby obtain one of the most powerful motives to assist us in the perfecting of our character.

Even with all these aids and advantages we cannot, affected as we are by bodily health and surrounding circumstances, but be sensible what fluctuating creatures we are; and that impressions the most powerful at one time, are extremely feeble at another: it becomes therefore necessary, when this occurs, closely and honestly to investigate the cause of this difference; and to call in every aid that can promote a consistency and permanency of character, and of religious feeling;—to this end I have found the advantage of frequently turning my mind to a deep contemplation of the attributes, the works, the revelation, and the government of God; and by this means have made Him almost evident and tangible to my senses. I perceive a Being, who cannot be affected by our vices or our virtues—powerful, wise and good beyond all our conception or imagination—perfectly independent of, yet employing all His wisdom, power and goodness to bring about and perfect the happiness of innumerable myriads of beings whom he has created.

I contrast this great Being with myself, and I sink into insignificance—feeling that I am nothing, yea, less than nothing in the comparison, and am humbled to the dust with the consideration; but, again, I reflect that, nothing as I am, and every thing as He is, I am the object of his bounty, of his care and loving kindness—that He has called me with a holy calling—has blest me with a knowledge of his will, of his righteous government—has favored me with principles the most powerful and the most glorious—that I am honored and raised to dignity by being adopted into His family, and made an instrument to cooperate, as it were, with Him in His unbounded work of benevolence. I feel then my real dignity—a dignity the gift of his bounty; and become actuated by a strong and ardent desire that every thought, word and action of my life may correspond with my high and distinguished calling, and (should I not prove unfaithful) to my future glorious destiny.

Thus reflecting, I feel my strength renewed, my heart glow with feelings of love and gratitude, accompanied by a deep sense of humility: conscious of my own weakness, I exclaim, in the language of Jesus—"I thank thee, gracious Father, that, whilst thou hast hid these things from the wise and learned, thou hast revealed them to babes; even so, Father, because it seemed good in thy sight." Thus occupied, my mind seems divested of all sense of surrounding objects and worldly circumstances. I see and feel but two beings in existence—God and myself; and impressed with the idea that great as he is, and insignificant as I am, that I am yet the object of his care—of his regard—of his distinguished favor, my mind becomes strengthened; and I feel, most powerfully, how holy, how pure, how free from every selfish consideration, one so highly favored ought to be; and that the approbation of that Being with whom, and in whose presence I seem to stand alone, ought to be the only object of my pursuit or concern.

Thus seeing God as every thing, and in every thing, and his ways all good and perfect, my love and reverence are excited, strengthened and confirmed—and I am enabled to go on in my way rejoicing with renovated vigor and delight; never losing sight of the weakness of our nature, and the arduous struggle we are called to—but above all, keep in view the glorious object we are seeking to obtain. I avail myself of every train of thought, to enable me to perfect myself for that high honor to which I am called; and, remembering that all our present privileges, and great and precious promises, are given for the purpose of making us partakers of a divine nature (or disposition) I accustom myself to call up in my mind not only the present advantages which Christianity affords, but all those glorious prospects which, if we are faithful to the end, it holds out to us in future. I call to remembrance, and impress the thought as possible on my mind, that I have been, not only by the kindness and mercy of God, "purged from my old sins"—but that I am called to glory and to virtue; and in this state of trial and of hope, I am but preparing and becoming fitted to enjoy the highest state of happiness in myself—and, also, to be the instrument, in a more enlarged sphere, and with greater capabilities, of fitting others for the enjoyment of felicity. With this exalted view of things, I become more confirmed in the reasonableness and benevolence of the gospel dispensation. I obtain a comprehensive knowledge of the divine government; and feel my mind and disposition improved, and my heart exhilarated by a contemplation of such unbounded benevolence; all care of self sinks into nothing; resentment dies away; and no angry feeling towards my erring fellow-creatures—not even to my worst enemies—remains; but pity only for their follies, and a strong and benevolent desire to improve their minds, and to induce them to accept those offered mercies which I myself so highly estimate. I see them, even in the worst of their errors, only as instruments in that mighty hand, who chooses some vessels to honorable, and some to less honorable uses—but in all fulfilling his benevolent designs.

CHURCH GAMBLING.

IN his charge to the Grand Jury, at Newport, N. H., on the 13th ult., Chief-Justice Bellows referred very pointedly to the prevalent practice of gambling among the religionists of the day, at festivals and other "social" gatherings of church membership, where lotteries, grab-bags, guess-cakes, and almost every known system of gambling was introduced to raise money for the spread of the gospel! All these are recognized in law as indictable offenses, and the proper officers failed to do their duty where they were suffered to pass unnoticed.

Who is responsible for these things? Where are the conservators of the faith and morals of the community? Whose duty is it to cry aloud and spare not, showing the people their transgressions, and the church of God her sins? If the church of Christ, at his coming, is to be presented without spot, wrinkle or any such thing, how many would now be found watching and keeping their garments unspotted from the world?—Advent Herald.

ONE MINUTE TOO LATE.

I WAS standing on the dock to witness the departure of the steamboat. Her time had come. Several hundred passengers had already embarked, and others were crowding hastily through the throng to get on board. All was confusion. The wheels and the piston seemed restless with delay; the boat creaked against the wharf as the paddles dipped themselves in the water; the strong hawsers that bound her fore and aft ground on the spiles. The stern voice of the mate summoned "All aboard"—"All ashore." Just then a hack drove down; an old gentleman, with locks of many bygone years, alighted, and hastened toward the boat. The crowd made way for the venerable stranger, but in vain; the plank had been drawn in, the fastenings loosed, and the boat was off.

I shall never forget the look of disappointment which was manifest in his countenance, as he turned away and ordered his baggage returned to the hack. My thoughts were beginning to take a solemn turn, when a friend who was with me, pronounced with emphasis, "One minute too late!" How many there are who are a little behind the time; just one minute too late in all the affairs of this world! always in a hurry; yet never ready. And how many thousands are a little too late in the great work of repentance! They delay and postpone, until the ark of safety has shoved off for the last time. One moment then is as fatal as an age.—Selected.

The Lesson of the Spring.

Long had the winter-winds blown chill,
O'er snow-capped height, and frozen strand;
Long voiceless was the murmuring rill,
And mighty rivers of the land.

Smothered within the frozen earth,
The violet and arbutus lay—
Still yearning for the spring's sweet birth,
To burst their walls of clay.

When lo! a gentle voice was heard;
A balmy sweetness filled the air;
It woke the tender song of bird,
And fairy music, everywhere.

The ploughman turned the springing grass,
And piped his song of rustic cheer,
And as he heard the black-bird pass,
He whispered, "Spring is surely here."

The tiny flowers in lone retreat,
Hearing the joyous anthem ring,
Half wondered if they dared to peep,
To hail the coming of the Spring.

First timidly, then boldly one
Looked out upon the face of day,
Turned its chill brow unto the sun
And laughed to greet the sunny ray.

Then one by one, till all the wood
Lay robed with cheeks of white and blue;
And Nature in her dreamy mood,
Woke from the old life to the new.

As children rashly haste to greet
Some joy they would not long delay,
And perish, ere their tender feet
Have found the calm and quiet way.

So Nature in her kindliest hour,
Was met by bitter winds and storm;
And springing grass, and bud and flower,
All perished in Spring's sunset morn.

And this the moral we would teach,
To young and old with eager heart;
Grasp only joys within your reach;
And make them of your life, a part.

Learn Patience in the walk of life;
A humble trust in God alway;
And know in life's severest strife,
A blessing born for every day.

Wandering Thoughts.

The existence of "Wandering Thoughts," as they are popularly designated, constitutes one striking feature in the action of mind, which it is useful to understand, for our own satisfaction, as well as for the comfort of others. There is a confessed tendency in the mind to wander from the subject of meditation—a tendency especially observed by pious men, during their hallowed exercises. They feel their minds liable to shift to another topic, or, in other words, foreign ideas thrust themselves on their notice, and the contrast between these and the selected topics of reflection, along with an exemplary fear of sin, attracts the attention, and excites many painful emotions.

The leading and distinguishing characteristic element in these ideas is, they are involuntary. The result of self-reflection is, they come unsought, and in many cases remain unasked, at least when no conscious effort is made to retain them. Were the mind only capable of voluntary thought, it might wander just as we know it does, still it then would be intentional aberration, and not such as is experienced and lamented in its present constitution and mode of action. So far are these specific thoughts from being intentionally conceived, that the complaint is, they spring into being independent of the will, and, for a time, cannot be ejected or forgotten. If the will had full authority over them, they would never be admitted, or rather, considering our ignorance of the next idea that will appear, we should affirm, their entrance and exit would be almost simultaneous.

Now, it may be said, are not the greater number of thoughts involuntary? Yes, we admit they are. When walking abroad, or musing at home, the mind generally receives silent permission to roam where it pleases; we have formed no purpose to think on any particular subject, and, of course, are in our thoughts entirely guided by association, or ideas excited by present sensations. In these circumstances, we are not, however, irresponsible, nor are we free from danger; the thoughts may be foolish, absurd—they may be even positively sinful. They have undoubtedly entered the mind not by express command, so to speak, but we have permitted the mind to enter into circumstances where they have been formed or suggested, which could certainly have been avoided. Might we not, for example, have restrained ourselves, and directed our faculties to useful, at least innocent subjects, or immediately have withdrawn them from vain and criminal contemplations? If, in the course of these lawless excursions, evil passions and desires happen to be kindled, by their objects being painted on the imagination, it is demonstrably certain, that we are accountable for their present activity, and every item of resulting conduct.

Wandering thoughts, directly so called, are quite of a different character, as they enter in totally different circumstances; they occur, not when the mind is luxuriating at ease; on the contrary, they come when it is actively engaged;—not when efforts are employed to avoid them, but when there is a resolution to have all the faculties and emotions absorbed, if possible, by one theme; not merely when it is purposely occupied with moral and religious subjects, but on any one that may engage our attention.

To cast some light on this perplexing subject, let us, in the meantime, consider the spontaneous action of the mental faculties and emotions.

The human mind has not unfrequently been compared to an engine, over which we have perfect control, with more apparent than real truth and propriety. No doubt, we can set the mind agoing, in other words, choose to think on any particular subject, but we are conscious that it often begins of its own accord, and that we can seldom or never bring it to rest when we please. Certain feelings unexpectedly come into existence, certain faculties start into action, we cannot tell how or why; and instantly to subdue these emotions, or change the topic of thought, is completely beyond our power. Let the occasion be the most solemn, these internal movements, nevertheless, take place, and we are compelled to attend them, even though at the expense, for a time, of nobler thoughts and feelings. Were we to consult general experience, we would soon find ample and curious illustration of this singular fact in our constitution. The predominant faculty and passion would, in all likelihood, be most commonly specific, as furnishing examples of involuntary action. On a sudden, the mind was filled with a craving for music, and strange notes were heard within—or for calculation, and figures entered, forthwith, into the various combinations—or places, long since visited came back in all their original freshness—or scenes of surpassing loveliness and grandeur were wrought by the imagination—or fantastic and ludicrous exhibitions presented themselves, causing a momentary irrepressible smile to play on the countenance—or some passion arose in all its energy and absorbed the thinking powers, and obliged them for a while to minister to its existence and gratification. We are persuaded these experiences are more common than is generally supposed, or perhaps admitted, and it is high time they should be openly and frankly confessed. They will be more common, especially with those who are of a nervous and sanguine temperament, these being most subject to mental activity and excitement.

A very singular and striking example of the unwilled activity of the faculties, is seen in the phenomena of dreaming. During the hours of sleep, it frequently happens that thoughts and emotions are vividly excited—thoughts solid and futile, serious and comical, emotions fierce and revengeful, gentle and compassionate. Who has not had such recollections, as he awoke to consciousness during the watches of the night, or at the morning dawn? Need we bring back to any the reminiscences of those days, when they lay in the burning arms of a fever, and scenes and sounds horrible beyond description, occupied, oppressed, nay, even tortured their faculties.

Such are a few instances of spontaneous or unwilled activity; but how they take place, is a difficult inquiry. Sometimes the associating principle may furnish an explanation, but not always. There seems to be some unknown influence of the blood, perhaps also some unknown electric influence, upon the brain, exciting a part, and leaving the rest of that vital organ in a quiescent state. That, at least, both the quantity, quality, and rate of motion in the blood, has an influence on the mind, is a truth fast gaining upon public conviction. Let us glance at some of its more prominent effects.

Fainting, that image of death, is occasioned, at any rate attended, by the descent of the blood from the brain, when thought and consciousness cease till it returns. The use of powerful stimulants is well known not merely to excite the sentiments and propensities of our common nature, but to give an impulse, and often a wonderful elevation, to thought and imagination, as when opium is employed. During these moments, the pulse beats with increased speed, and, of course, the blood is propelled through the body with unusual velocity. Moreover, the very act of voluntary thinking and feeling, causes it, in an augmented stream, to enter the brain; for parts of this organ have been seen to expand and subside, with the commencement and cessation of thought and emotion. From these facts, we gather evidence, that the mind by night and by day is often forced, by some internal influence, into the different states of which we know it to be susceptible. Whether it is by the blood that these involuntary movements are produced, it may be difficult exactly to determine, though there is great probability that in the majority of instances, it is the existing physical cause. Account for the facts as you may, their existence cannot be denied, and every one can judge, if ever, how often, and in what forms they are presented to himself.

When these spontaneous movements take place, the thoughts will wander, or leave the topic of present meditation. It may be solemn and awfully momentous, but from it we are imperiously attracted, and some time may elapse before we can renew our former contemplations. These revolutions will occur in spite of every exertion we vainly employ to the contrary.

Saved by Hope.

The past by itself, has enough in it to crush any one. Its failures, errors, disasters, sins—its evil conscience make a dreary retrospect. At the best, we are constrained to say, if there is nothing better than there has been, in national, social, personal life, and in the church, then life is hardly worth living, and the world itself scarcely deserves a prolonged existence. Christ indeed, has died and is risen again; but if the world's past, and if the known past experience of Christians in time were to be the only result of that great event, it would be a stupendous failure. We cannot feel that the degree of progress and national excellence or prosperity yet attained by this people, fulfils the expectations, or justifies the blood and toil of our fathers, or corresponds to the significance of that wonderful series of providences, by which it was first established among men. Only a shallow self-complacency can buoy us up in view of the present and the past in themselves. The very life of our lives, the very oxygen of our mental atmosphere, is in the idea that this is not a final, complete state of being, but wholly probationary and preparatory—that everything good is in the germ and in process of development; that we see good as tendency and not as realized fact; that we are in the thick of a struggle which has world-wide proportions, and unfathomable mysteries in the universe of God, and that the victory of the good is a future event reached only through delay, and seeming disaster and death. Retrospection kills. We are saved by hope. The earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now.

The true believer, indeed, may not look with jaundiced eyes on the past. It is far from wholly evil. But the good in himself and in the world is so rudimentary and imperfect, that it would chill him to his very soul, if he did not view it as part of a still advancing movement, upward—ever upward, and so never in vain, though slow. He is saved from abandoning his work in disgust by hope. It has a future and a great future; its future is its true stage of existence; as much beyond the feeble present, as the glorious fruits of summer are beyond the darkly sprouting seed of early spring. Through many unfavorable changes and seemingly backward movements, the germ struggles onward to full maturity; almost its entire worth at any stage of its being, lies in its unfulfilled destiny. It is saved by hope.

Thus all that is really good in the past is saved and carried over into the future by hope. We dismiss weariness, disgust and despondency upon the threshold of a New Year, and enter upon it in renewed, enlarged hope. If we have but laid the foundation of a good life in years past, and have seemed to make no progress since, we will not renounce our plans and go into spiritual bankruptcy. Much rather, the little good of our past shall be saved by hope. If we have believed and have still felt burdened by unvanquished sin, we must remember that we are saved by hope; that faith is the substance of things hoped for; we grasp by faith at salvation that is complete only in the future. For what a man seeth why doth he yet hope for? Yet not in sinful idleness do we wait and hope, but with groaning and earnest labor, and inexpressible desire. If we see the world moving slowly and dubiously on the path of true progress, we shall not despond, but drinking at the fountain of energy and joyousness, the assured hope of the manifestation of the sons of God, we are saved from gloom, shamed out of hesitancy and quickened in zeal and devotion in our work. Toiler in the pulpit, in the Sabbath school, in the family, by the wayside, among the heathen, through the press—weary, disheartened, broken in spirit by the seeming smallness or discouraging quality of the fruits of your labors, remember that no present results whatever can be the final test of their value. Their feebleness and insignificance may belong to their necessary preparatory condition. They may be the handful of corn, the fruit whereof shall shake like Lebanon. Be not weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not.—Selected.

Want of Feeling.

Is your want of feeling a reason for staying away from Christ? A sense of want should lead you to Christ, and not keep you away. "More are drawn to Christ," says old Thomas Shepherd, "under a sense of a dead, blind heart, than by all sorrows, humiliations, and terrors." The less of feeling or conviction that you have, you are the more needy; and is that a reason for keeping aloof from him? Instead of being less fit for coming you are more fit. The blindness of Bartimeus was his reason for coming to Christ, not for staying away. If you have more blindness and deadness than others, you have so many more reasons for coming—so many fewer for standing afar off. If the whole head is sick and the whole heart faint, you should feel yourself the more shut up to the necessity of coming, and that immediately. Whatever others may do who have convictions, you who have none dare not stay away, nor even wait an hour. You must come!

Will your want of feeling make you less welcome to Christ? How is this? What makes you think so? Has he said so, or did he act when on earth as if this were his style of procedure? Had the woman of Sychar any feeling when he spoke to her so lovingly? Was it the amount of conviction in Zaccheus that made the Lord address him so graciously, "Make haste, for to-day I must abide at thy house?" The balm of Gilead will not be the less suitable for you, nor the physician there the less affectionate and cordial, because, in addition to other diseases, you are afflicted with the benumbing palsy. Your greater need only gives him an opportunity of showing the extent of his fulness, as well as the riches of his grace.

Come to him, then, just because you do not feel. "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Whatever you may feel, or may not feel, it is still "a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." Do not limit the grace of God, nor suspect the love of Christ. Confidence in that grace and love will do everything for you; want of confidence, nothing. Christ wants you to come; not to wait, or to stay away.

Your remaining away from Christ will not remove your want of feeling. It will only make it worse; for it is a disease that he only can remove; so that a double necessity is laid upon you for going to him. Others who feel more than you may linger—you cannot afford to do so. You must go immediately to him who is exalted "a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel, and the forgiveness of sins." Seeing that distance and distrust will do nothing for you, try what "drawing near" and confidence will do. To you, though the chief of sinners, the message is, "Come unto me." God commands you to come, without any further delay or preparation; to bring with you your sins, your unbelief, your heart, your will, your whole man, and to put them into Christ's hands. God demands your instant surrender to Christ and your immediate confidence in him. "Kiss the Son," is his message. His word insists on your return. "Return unto the Lord thy God." It shows you that the continuance of this distance is your unwillingness to let Christ save you in his own way, and a desire to have the credit of removing your insensibility by your own prayers and tears.—"God's Way of Peace," by Rev. H. Bonar.

Dr. Livingstone Safe.

Official information of the safety of Dr. Livingstone, the African traveller, has been received by the British Government. The whole Christian world will feel relieved by this announcement, for the whole Christian world has waited with suspense for intelligence of the hardy explorer ever since he passed out of sight into the interior of the Continent. If Dr. Livingstone emerges by the way of the North, he will have traversed both the length and the breadth of Africa. Beginning at the northern edge of the British colony settled on the Cape of Good Hope, where his father-in-law, Moffat, spent a laborious life, he proceeded northward, and demonstrated the identity of the Leambye with the Zambesi River. In solving this problem, he travelled westward toward the sources of this great water-course, and passed on to the Atlantic Ocean. Turning back, he followed the Zambesi to its mouth, where it empties into the Indian Ocean. This, his first journey, placed Dr. Livingstone in the front rank of African explorers.

The third and last tour of exploration, which we hope Dr. Livingstone will live to complete, began at the mouth of the Zambesi. It was his design to proceed to the interior northwardly, and settle the question of the connection between several interior lakes and the Nile. Sir Samuel Baker, the successor of Grant and Spake in Nile explorations, has been operating with a large force in the region south of Egypt, for the suppression of the slave-trade. The English Government will, no doubt, send forward messengers and supplies to meet Dr. Livingstone, who is reported to be quite destitute. His emergence into the light of civilization will be awaited with anxiety. Devoted to the suppression of the slave-trade, which is the curse of Africa, Dr. Livingstone has explored less as a traveller, to gratify curiosity, than as a missfonary, to prepare the way for the spread of Christianity.

The Laodiceans were a just and righteous people, according to their meaning of the word—but the garments with which they covered themselves were made of the home-spun thread of their own righteousness! Are there any such Christians now?

So long as you see one star in the sky, the sun has not risen. So long as one leak admits the water, the ship is not safe. So long as one sin reigns in a man's heart, and is practised in his life, Jesus is neither his Saviour, nor his King.

When the great bargain is concluded between God and the soul, God never stands upon these petty things of earth, but throws them into the bargain. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you"—is his promise.

"No cross, no crown." So runs the proverb which is based on Scripture. Think of this; and when you would throw the galling cross from your shoulders, ask whether you would also take the crown of glory from your head. Far better to have the cross with the crown, than neither cross nor crown.

The Temple of Diana at Ephesus.

This temple, one of the seven wonders of the world, seems to have been several times destroyed, and each time restored with the greatest magnificence at the expense of all Asia. It is spoken of in the nineteenth chapter of Acts, which we hope all our young friends will read, as it is there connected with some of the experience of Paul, the great apostle.

During the night when Alexander the Great was born, about 350 years before the birth of Christ, the temple was burned by Erostratus, an Ephesian, who avowed that he committed the deed for the purpose of immortalizing himself. To defeat the object for which the act was done, the Ephesians passed a decree consigning his name to oblivion, but this failed, for Theopompus, the historian, spoke of him in his history.

Sometime after its destruction by Erostratus, the Macedonian king offered to re-build the temple with its former magnificence, if he might be allowed to carve his own name upon the frontispiece. This offer the Ephesians rejected, and it was afterward re-built for the last time. Its length was four hundred and twenty-five feet, its width two hundred and twenty feet. Its roof was of cedar, and it had one hundred and twenty-seven columns, sixty feet high, each of them, says Pliny, the gift of a king. Pliny also says it took over two hundred years to build it, that is the last one.

Thirty-six of the columns were finely carved, and the rest were richly polished. Each one of them, it is said, with its base, contains about one hundred and fifty tons of marble. The statue of the goddess of Diana was of ivory, and furnished with finely-wrought golden ornaments. Now both the city and temple have almost entirely vanished from sight, even the ruins of the temple being nearly all carried away. So it is with the strongest and most perfect works of man; but there is a time not far in the future, when there will be magnificence on the earth such as has never yet existed, and it will endure forever. This glorious time will begin when those which sleep in Jesus have been raised from the dead, and Christ has established his reign. May you all, dear young friends, strive to be among the blessed inhabitants of that glorious kingdom.

Five Little Stitches.

Five little stiches! And they were taken more than twenty-five years ago. And why should they be remembered more than thousands of other stitches taken by the same fingers? I will tell you.

Little Rose went to the "infant school" then. It was a very happy place for the little folks. They had no hard lesson, in arithmetic or geography. The nearest approach to lessons was saying over the "multiplication table" in a sort of rhyming concert—"Twice one are two, twice two are four;" while the teacher slid along the little wooden balls on the wire frame, to suit the words. No, but when the marching and singing were over, there were plenty of busy fingers learning to sew.

Rose was making blocks of patch-work—"ninepatch," her mother called it. You all know what that is. Rose's mother cut the small squares and basted them neatly for Rose to sew "over and over," one block a day. And it was Rose's special delight to show her mother the neatly finished block each night, and be able to say, "I did it all myself." One warm June day Rose found her needle rather dull, and the new pink chintz so hard to sew; her fingers trembled, when she came to where the four corners met, and she tried in vain, with her little thimble-less finger, to push the needle through so many thicknesses of cloth. She looked at the little girl who sat next her on the long bench—an older girl than Rose by two years, and rich in the possession of a "real silver" thimble. Rose passed the block to Pogue (a curious name, but her very own, and it rhymed with her sur-name, too), and motioned to the little hard corner, touching her thimble and nodding and winking significantly. Pogue understood, and taking the nine-patch sewed very neatly over the hard place — Rose watching carefully lest she should do too much. One, two, three, four, five stitches, and oh, so neatly done! Rose bowed and smiled her thanks, and put in a stitch or two as neatly as possible next to the "five," when she stopped in dismay at a thought that popped into her conscientious little head. "I can't tell mother I did it all myself." It would have taken away half her pleasure not to be able to say this. And yet it was so very little—only just five stitches! "I needn't mind that," came the temptation. "I can say I did it myself, for that's almost nothing." "But it is help," another voice said, "and you'd better say, 'I did it nearly all.'"

But Rose couldn't make up her mind to say this. Her mother would be sure to think if Pogue sewed any of it, likely she made half the block, at least one seam across. So you see it was a real struggle. And how do you suppose she settled it? After looking at it about as long as it has taken me to tell you this, Rose unthreaded her needle and very deliberately picked out those five stitches, and then went to work and sewed them over herself. And she is glad to-day that she did. Not because it might not have been foolish for her to be so anxious about the credit of doing the work all herself—no; but because it was her first resistance to the temptation to tell a falsehood! And resisting once always makes it easier to resist again. So I do not think Rose ever told a deliberate falsehood since that day, when she came so near making a black spot in her memory instead of a bright one.

Does any little girl think Rose made too much of such a little thing? Oh, no. It is just as much stealing to take five pennies from another's purse as five dollars, and it would have been as much a falsehood for Rose to have left Pogue's five little stitches in her work and said she "did it all," as if Pogue had sewed half the block, and she had said the same thing. And Rose knew it, and is glad to-day, as she was then, that if she must have credit for doing all the work she picked out those "five stitches."

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Edito of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

EXPOSITION OF 2 CORINTHIANS v. 1–10.

BY THOMAS READ.

"For we know, that if our earthly house of [this] tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Many assuming that man has an immortal soul, or spirit, that can live separately from the body, are in the habit of forcing every text of Scripture into apparent conformity to these assumptions, even at the sacrifice of all the principles of grammar, logic and propriety.

A preacher, using the above text on a funeral occasion, said: 'Our house,' and 'this tabernacle,' are one, and mean the body, the home of the soul. The soul is the prime mover of the admirable machinery of the body. The soul is the man independently of the body that controls the locomotive, and the engine does not control itself."

To make this text available for the support of his argument, this preacher would put all, the souls of Paul and Sosthenes, the writers and all the souls of their Corinthian brethren, the "we" and "our," into one human body; and when the single earthly house, or human body, is dissolved, then all the souls, having escaped as living entities from this single earthly body, are all of them put into another single building of God, or body in the heavens. So much for this beautiful logic!

A presiding elder wishing to prove that men have immortal souls that can live separately from their bodies, and, I suppose, not being able to find any text that would exactly express that idea, ventured to alter this text, thus: "Paul knew," (emphasizing the knew), "Paul knew that if his earthly house of his tabernacle was dissolved, he had a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." This is almost good grammar, but it is not logical, and it is a wicked perversion of the Scriptures. He no doubt felt that it would not be consistent to place the "we" and the "our," as indicating plurality, into one house or body, as the other preacher has done; so he altered the text to suit his theory; and he gave it as undoubted evidence of the separate existence of the immortal soul. Adam Clarke, in his commentary, fairly exults in this chapter as affording abundant evidence of the separability of the soul and its consequent immortality. But he fits the singular to the singular, notwithstanding his text stubbornly puts all the pronouns in the plural. We quote:

"By earthly house, the apostle most evidently means the body in which the soul is represented as dwelling or sojourning for a time, and from which it is to be liberated at death; for as death dissolves the tabernacle, it can then be no habitation for the soul."

On the 2nd verse, he confesses that "This and the following verses are, in themselves, exceedingly obscure." Certainly, Doctor, and they will always remain "exceedingly obscure" to all those who adopt your theory of interpretation. But he is too lengthy to quote further. We refer to his notes, where almost every verse from the first to the tenth is made to contribute largely to the idea that the soul is a separate entity and immortal.

The last American Translation of the New Testament, by George R. Noyes, in this place, reads: "For we know that, if our earthly tent-habitation be destroyed, we have a building provided by God, a house not made with hands, everlasting in the heavens." To which he attaches a foot-note, "Chap. v. 1—a building provided by God; i. e., a body prepared for us by God against the coming of Christ." The error in the fourth verse is not corrected; for "the mortal" is substituted "mortality," as though mortality was something separate from the man. This version, although improved in many respects, contains no amendment of those errors of the common version tending to hide the unity and mortality of man.

A more literal rendering of 2 Cor. v. 1–10. 1. For we know that, if our [union with the] earthly house of the tabernacle were broken up, we have a house from God, a house not made with hands, everlasting in the heavens. 2. For in this we groan, desiring to be covered with our dwelling which is to come from heaven. 3. And if we are covered we shall not be found destitute. 4. For we that are in the tabernacle do groan, being burthened; not that we wish to be unclothed, but clothed upon, that the mortal may be swallowed up by life. 5. Now he that has prepared us for this same purpose is God, who also has given us the pledge of the Spirit. 6. Therefore we are always of good courage, knowing that while we are in our home in the body, we are from our home which is from the Lord. 7. For we walk by faith, not by sight. 8. We are of good courage, and are well pleased rather to leave our present home of the body, and to be in our permanent home which is from the Lord. 9. Wherefore we strive that whether being in home or from home to be approved by him. 10. For we must all appear before the tribunal of Christ, that every one of us may receive for the things done in the body according to what he has done, whether good or bad.

Having the whole passage before them, our readers will observe that all the words signifying a home, such as tent or tabernacle, house, building, dwelling and body, are in the singular number; and that all the pronouns connected with them, the "we" and the "our," are in the plural. All Christians have but one home in their present state, and all Christians have but one home from heaven. And while the plural and the singular stand thus related, it is impossible to make this passage prove the double entity of man; and the burden of proof rests upon those who assume that each body has a soul; and we protest against the putting of more than one immortal soul into one human body, as being as contrary to their own traditions, which they respect; as to the Scriptures, which, so far as relates to the nature of the soul, they do not respect. In Scripture, every man is a soul, and every human soul is a man or person. Therefore to make this passage of any service to the believers in the immortality of the soul, they must very much enlarge their present assumptions, and say that all righteous souls are packed into one body; a possibility, by the by, if souls be immaterial, as they need not occupy space; but not such a probability as such believers would like to adopt; although those who can and do believe that a soul can live without a body, in opposition to nature's laws and the plainest teachings of the Scriptures, need not be too fastidious in swallowing even this absurdity. And still further, they must prove that "the mortal" of the fourth verse does not embrace the whole man. This verse completely settles the question with those who are seeking after the truth; for the Greek reads, "that to thneeton, the mortal," [call him a body, a soul, or a man,] "may be swallowed up by life."

The ten verses are paraphrased and numerous parallel passages are introduced, proving that all the words indicating a home in no case mean a human body; but mean the church here and the church hereafter, and none so often as the word body.

Paul calls us to remember what he had just said (iv. 14) "That he who raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise us up also by Jesus, and will present us with you." And if we be all presented together, after we are resurrected, we shall not be presented separately at the time of our death. Our light afflictions which we endure here for a short time prepare us for a superabundant and everlasting weight of glory. The things that are seen are but temporal; but the things which are not seen are everlasting. v. 1. For we know that if our union with this earthly house of the tabernacle, or present church arrangement, were separated, we have a house or church not made with hands, everlasting in the heavens, where it will remain till the appearing of Christ.—Heb. ix. 11. For that Christ having appeared as a high priest of the good things that are to come, passing through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is, not of this workmanship, entered once for all into the sanctuary, or true holy place, not with the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, having purchased for us everlasting redemption. For in the tabernacle or earthly church, we groan, in consequence of our trials and afflictions, desiring to be covered with our dwelling or church which is to come from heaven. For John (Rev. xxi. 1,) saw a holy city, a new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven, from God. . . . and John heard a voice from heaven, saying: Behold the tabernacle of God is with men and he will tabernacle or dwell with them; and if we are clothed with that tabernacle or church of the living God, we shall not be found destitute of covering. For we that are in this tabernacle or church do groan, being burthened with afflictions; not that we wish to be unclothed, or separated from this earthly church, but clothed upon, or invested with our heavenly church, that the mortal man may be absorbed by everlasting life. Mark, it is not the unclothed state that we long for: to be neither in the church here nor in the church there, the state preceding the resurrection, "for the dead know not any thing," and "cannot praise the Lord;" but we long for the period when the mortal shall be invested with immortality.—1 Cor. xv. 53, 54; for the living, the living, only can praise the Lord. Heb. viii. 2: "For we have such a high priest, who is set at the right hand of the throne of the majesty in heaven; a minister of the holies, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord fixed and not man. Now he that has prepared us for this same purpose is God, who also has given to us the pledge of the Spirit; the proof in advance of our resurrection to life. Therefore, we are always of good courage, knowing that while we are in our present home, in the body, that is, in this earthly church, we are away from our permanent home, the church which is from the Lord. For while we are here we walk by faith, not by sight. We are bold also; preferring rather to dissolve our union with this earthly church, which we symbolize by calling it a body, or the body of Christ, as our custom is; and as the intervening period of unconsciousness is imperceptible, and is as nothing, we are well pleased to be in our permanent home which is from the Lord. Wherefore we strive that whether in home in the church, or from home out of the church, or dead, we may be approved by him. For we must all appear before the tribunal of Christ that each may receive retribution for the things done in the church, or body, whether they be good or bad. Peter says, in his first letter (4. 17) that judgment must begin at the house or church of God. As we told you before, (1 Cor. iii. 12), If any man build on this foundation, which is Christ Jesus, with gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble, the work of every one will be made manifest; for the day when Christ shall sit on the throne of judgment will show it, because it will be revealed in fire; and the fire will prove the character of every one's work.

That we may not mistake the many figures used for the church, such as tent, tabernacle, house, building, home and body; we shall show that Paul, in other parts of the Scriptures, used these same figures frequently for the church, some examples of which are already given, and he used none more frequently than the word body; and in none of these parallel places can the word body be mistaken as a home for the so-called separate soul.

Parallel passages justifying the substitution of the word church for body—Rom. xii. 5. For as in one body we have many members, and the members have not all the same office, so we, though many, form one body in Christ, and each of us is a member of it in common with the rest.—1 Cor. x. 16–17. The bread which we break, is it not a partaking of the body of Christ? For we the many, are one bread, one body.—xii. 12, 13. For as the body is one, and has many members, and all the members of the body, being many, are one body, so it is with Christ. For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or freemen; and were all made to drink one Spirit; 27; Now ye are the body of Christ, and each a member of it.—Eph. i. 22, 23; And gave him to be head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fulness of him who filleth all with all.—Col. i. 18. Christ is the head of the body, the church; 24. I, Paul fill up what was wanting of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body, which is the church; of which I was made a minister: iii. 15. And let the peace of Christ rule in your hearts to which also ye were called in one body.—Jude 9. Yet Michael, the archangel, when contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses. The body of Moses, means the church of Moses. And why should body mean any thing else but church in 2 Cor. v. 5, 6, 8, 10, especially as the literal human body disagrees with the context throughout the whole ten verses we have been endeavoring to elucidate? All these parallels are from the writings of Paul, except Jude 9.

We give other examples where house, building, etc., are used as similes for the church of God. Gal. vi. 10: So then, as we have opportunity, let us do good to all, especially to those who are of the household of the faith. Eph. ii. 19: So then ye are no longer strangers and foreigners, but are fellow-citizens with the saints, and members of the household of God, and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, is growing into a holy temple in the Lord; in whom ye also are built together into a dwelling-place of God in the Spirit.

The church is here compared to a city, a family or household, a building, a temple and a dwelling place. Matt. xvi. 18: Upon this rock I will build my church. 1 Pet. ii. 4: To whom coming, as to a living stone, rejected indeed by men, but by God chosen, valuable, ye also as living stones are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, well-pleasing to God through Jesus Christ. 1 Cor. iii. 9: Ye are God's husbandry, God's building. Heb. iii. 1–6: House stands as a symbol for the church four times in the first four verses. "And Moses truly was faithful in all God's house, as a servant, in witness of the things which were to be spoken; but Christ as a Son over God's house, whose house are we, if we keep the boldness and the rejoicing of the hope firm to the end. To edify or build up, always suggests the idea of an edifice or building; how often these terms occur in reference to the church we leave to conjecture.

Our business was to prove that the words tent, tabernacle, building, house, home, dwelling and body, found in 2 Cor. v. 1–10, were commonly used by Paul as figures or similes for the church, and we think we have amply done so; and that they do not mean a physical human body as a home for an immortal soul, that can live without a body. And it would be just as pertinent to contend that these various figures representing the church, given in the examples selected above, were each inhabited by a single immortal soul, if the argument is to be of the slightest force, or that they were the receptacles, the homes of all, the "we" and the "our" of all the immortal souls of Paul and his Corinthian brethren, as stern logic compels Adam Clarke, D. D., and his fellow-believers unwittingly to affirm, as to say this of the same figures comprised in the ten verses of 2 Cor. v. 1–10 of our exposition. And as it cannot be consistently said of these, so neither can it be said of the figures used in the text of our exposition, nor of any other place recorded within the whole range of the Scriptures.

THE TEACHING OF JESUS.

"The kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field."—Matt. xiii. 44.

There is a force and sincerity in the sayings of Jesus which carry with them the conviction and feelings of the reader; which command our admiration of his character, and confirm the authenticity of his claims to a divine mission. When the mind is deeply affected and impressed with some important truth, it becomes associated, either by comparison or contrast; with whatever passes within or without us—with the business and circumstances of life—with our own experience and that of others; and, by the reflections and conclusions thus obtained, we seek to impart to the world the vividness of our own feelings, and the high value of the principle with which our soul is inspired. The importance of that dispensation of mercy and pardon to man, of which Jesus was the harbinger and head, appears to have been a fixed and deeply-rooted principle in his mind; and this importance he labors to enforce, sometimes by clear and impressive reasoning; and sometimes, as in the instance before us, by familiar illustration drawn from the realities of life, and so well chosen and happily expressed, as to engage the affections by their feeling, and convince the judgment by their force. These flowers of moral truth lay scattered through the gospel histories, and the lapse of ages has not diminished their freshness, or destroyed their beauty.

"The kingdom of heaven is like treasure hid in a field." Here the importance and excellence of Christianity is exhibited by reference to the estimation in which worldly riches are held by men; and its value is greatly enhanced by reason of the manner in which its possession is supposed to be obtained. These treasures are represented as being found in a field, and we have a natural picture of the joy of the fortunate individual—his caution in concealing his discovery—his readiness to part with all that he has, that he may be in a condition to become the purchaser of that field. "The kingdom of heaven is like treasure hid in a field, the which when a man hath found he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath and buyeth that field." So then the religion which Jesus came to promulgate was so inestimable a treasure as to excite in those who should discover it the greatest joy, and a readiness to secure its possession even at the sacrifice of every thing besides; and this too upon a principle of policy—upon a mere calculation of the high advantage—the supreme value of Christianity; for though we should obtain it at the price of every earthly possession, still, like him who should sell all that he hath to purchase a field teeming with hidden treasures, we should only be parting with a lesser to secure a greater blessing. Such is the view which Jesus takes of that system which he came to establish on earth; such his mode of representing it to the world. Conscious that he had received his mission from God—impressed with its importance to man—he exhibits a just and natural description of the feelings it was calculated to inspire in every well-disposed breast. He presents us with a living, breathing picture of the heart of man, when animated with the importance of divine truth, and sensible of the benignity of divine forgiveness.

The constant tenor of the teaching of Jesus goes to exhibit Christianity in this light, as a gift—a favor—a manifestation of the love of God to man. Resting, therefore, the claims of his system upon its own intrinsic worth and beauty, Jesus urges its adoption by no suspicious solicitations—by no appeal to the passions—by no excitement of the fears—by no specious pretences—by no special pleading—but by a calm and dignified appeal to the benefits and blessings with which it is so replete to man.

This is the necessary characteristic of a religion that is true—of a system that has its origin in heaven: to be admired it is only necessary that it should be known—and when known its interest will be esteemed paramount to every other consideration. How well is this principle exemplified by the conduct and experience of those who were the first to receive, and the first to teach the Christian dispensation. Jesus, living a life of reproach and dying a death of ignominy; Paul, renouncing his kindred, his friends, his hopes of advancement—suffering "the loss of all things that he might win Christ;" Peter, and the other apostles, "rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name;" the early converts, to whom it was "given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe but also to suffer for his sake;" these serve as critics to illustrate our text, and martyrs to adorn our cause.

This cloud of witnesses with which we are encompassed, was not composed of designing or deluded men. Interest—worldly interest—suggested the rejection of what they so gladly received. Prejudice—their prejudices inclined them to a disbelief, not a belief, of the gospel. All of them had doubted, some had persecuted, that faith which they afterwards so nobly supported. But they were sincere, sober-minded men, open to truth, and willing to obey the dictates of an enlightened conscience and a convinced judgment. Some of them had seen the miracles of Jesus; others had received and been convinced of their truth from "those who from the beginning were eye witnesses and ministers of the word." They received Christianity, therefore, on the fullest evidence; and receiving it, they had found in it that hidden treasure, which more than compensated for every sacrifice, privation and suffering. Their conduct explains the parable we have been considering—the parable explains their conduct.

But is this view of the importance of the gospel dispensation a vain persuasion, or a just and well formed estimate? Is Christianity a mean and spurious gem, or a goodly pearl of great price? Let us examine it, for it challenges our scrutiny. We speak now of pure, uncorrupted Christianity—of that enlightened system of faith and practice which Jesus taught, and his apostles promulgated in their discourses and writings, as left upon record in the New Testament scriptures. These scriptures are certainly not free from those obscurities upon minor points which are incidental to all ancient writings; but in their clear, general and express tenor, they place Christianity before us in the following points of view:

As a system, communicated by the Divine Being to man, through the agency of Jesus, his appointed messenger: separated from earthly power, and opposed to its maxims and policy: seeking no conquests but those of conviction—no triumphs but those of truth: proclaiming the rights of conscience, and founded on the liberty and just equality of all its adherents: free from doubt and mystery—simple and easy to be understood by every honest mind: addressed to the mind, and divested of forms, ceremonies and outward observance: communicating to man all that is necessary for him to know of his Maker—his omnipotence, justice, goodness and love: proclaiming pardon for past transgressions, on condition of unfeigned repentance and faith: proposing a satisfactory assurance of eternal life as the reward of present obedience: regulating the mind, controlling the passions, enlightening the understanding, and conducting us amid the temptations and vicissitudes of life, to virtue, security, bliss and eternal life.

How suited is such a system of revealed truth to man in all his circumstances, wants and feelings. Is he ignorant? Christianity will instruct him. Does he wander in darkness and in doubt concerning his duties, his state and destiny? Christianity will enlighten his path, and direct his steps to virtue and to life eternal in the kingdom of God. Does he weakly submit himself to the arbitrary rule or spiritual domination of another? Christianity will emancipate his mind from slavery, and conduct him into "the glorious liberty of the children of God." Is he the slave of sin, looking forward to the wages of death? Christianity proclaims pardon to past transgression, and invites him to holiness and eternal life! Is he oppressed with fear at the contemplation of a just and offended God? Christianity exhibits the Divine Being as full of mercy and of love, to whom "anger is his strange work." Is he exposed to temptation and suspended in his course from the antagonism of passion and of duty? Christianity will strengthen his motives to virtue, and enable him to triumph over every feeling adverse to his happiness and peace. Is he neglected, friendless and alone in the world? Christianity adopts him into the church of God, and surrounds him with the charities and affections of the children of God. Does he suffer from the cares, the pains, the wrongs of life? Christianity brings "life and immortality to light;" dispels our transitory woes; resolves our doubts; discloses to us the future and bounteous plans of heaven; allows us to penetrate the grand scheme of divine benevolence; enables us to contemplate every movement in the natural and moral world, as parts of one vast design of wisdom and of love; and permits us secretly to adore his great unseen power

"By which the mighty process is maintained—
Who sleeps not, is not weary; in whose sight
Slow circling ages are as transient days;
Whose work is without labor; whose designs
No flaw deforms, no difficulty thwarts;
And whose beneficence no charge exhausts."

Divine gift! Inestimable treasure! well did the great Teacher of Christianity esteem the sterling value of his system as the most powerful inducement to its reception; well did he liken it to "treasure found in a field;" and if he who had discovered a perishable treasure joyfully sold all that he had to possess it, how much more dearly ought we to estimate the eternal treasures of religion and of truth?

"BLOW YE THE TRUMPET IN ZION."

BY WM. H. SPENCER

"Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain: let all the inhabitants of the land tremble: for the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand."—Joel ii. 1.

When danger by invasion or rebellion threatened ancient Zion, the trumpets throughout Jerusalem were blown, and its clarion notes echoed far over the hills of Judea, and were caught up and repeated by Bethany, Bethlehem, Bethshemesh and Antioch, until, in a short time, the sound spread from Gibeah to Gerar, and from Jericho to Joppa; the sound swelled up from thousands of trumpets until the whole people were thoroughly awakened to a sense of the danger and aroused for the defence of Zion.

Oh that the world at the present day might be as thoroughly aroused to the danger that is before them, and prepare for "the day of the Lord," which these eventful times assures us "is nigh at hand!" God says: "I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O, Jerusalem." Every one who is looking for the soon coming of "the day of the Lord," is, in a sense, a watchman, and has a great duty to perform. It is the duty of the watchman to warn the people of the approach of danger. But how many of Zion's watchmen are to-day doing their duty? In these ominous times can they fail to see that the great day of the Lord is just before this world?

"The cry is up, the strife begun,
The struggle of the mighty ones,
And Armageddon's day comes down."

Oh watchmen of Zion! why will you hold your peace in such perilous times as these? What care you for the reproaches of a doomed and godless world? Why need you stand abashed at the sneers and mockery of those for whom destruction is treasured up? Now is the time to sound the warning? Now is the time to face sin like a wall of adamant; and in thunder-tones send the warning notes over this judgment-hastening world. Now is the time to blow the trumpet, with "no uncertain sound," until it arouses the mighty men, and its thrilling notes awake those who have fallen asleep under the soothing cry of "peace and safety."

Blow ye the trumpet in the ears of a self-secure and godless world, and proclaim the gladsome news that "our Lord is coming." Time hastens on, and soon the great day of God's wrath will break forth in all its latent fury. Amidst the quicksands of these last days we must sound the divine message in no feeble tones.

But the conflict will soon be over. Jesus will soon come. Oh then what glories await those who have proved faithful watchmen, and have been instrumental in gathering many within the Ark where all are safe! Then "sing, O daughter of Zion; shout, O Israel," for your "redemption draweth nigh."

He's coming, he's coming, awake ye, awake;
Jesus is coming, his kingdom to take."

EXPEDIENT FOR LOVING AND FORGIVING.

Man has an unfortunate readiness, in the evil hour, after receiving an affront, to draw together all the moon-spots on the other person into an outline of shadow, and a night piece, and to transform a single deep into a whole life; and this only in order that he may thoroughly relish the pleasure of being angry. In love, he has fortunately the opposite faculty of crowding together all the light, parts and rays of its object into one focus, by means of the burning glass of imagination, and letting its sun burn without its spots; but he too generally does this only when the beloved, and often censured, being is already beyond the skies. In order, however, that we should do this sooner and oftener, we ought to act like Winckelmann, but only in another way. As he, namely, set aside a particular half hour of each day for the purpose of beholding and meditating on his too happy existence in Rome, so we ought daily or weekly to dedicate and sanctify a solitary hour for the purpose of summing up the virtues of our families, our wives, our children, and our friends—and viewing them in this beautiful crowded assemblage of their good qualities. And, indeed, we should do so for this reason, that we may not forgive and love too late, when the beloved beings are already departed hence, and are beyond our reach.—Jean Paul Richter.

THOUGHTS ON MAN'S "BIRTHRIGHT."

BY HENRY YOUNG.

"Looking dilligently, lest . . . there be any profane person, as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright."—Heb. xii. 15, 16.

WE learn from this reading that the "birthright" here spoken of is sacred, and the price for which it was sold, profane, inasmuch as the person is called profane who preferred the "morsel of meat" to his "birthright."

We wish to inquire, What is a birthright? Not what was Esau's particular birthright, but what is the birthright of man—of the race? Was eternal life man's right at his creation? which was the same as his birth; and is eternal life a right which one has at and by his birth?

If these questions are answered in the affirmative—and how else can we answer them, as death was not the design of the Creator—then every one who is born into the world, is born with the right to live eternally, if he will; is he not?

But this birthright may be forfeited and lost. Yes: but how? We answer: By sin—actual, personal, wilful sin; and not only sin as it is a transgression of law, but also as it is a refusal of pardon, and a disregard of the conditions of reconciliation. Thus only can this right to eternal life be lost, i. e., finally and irrecoverably lost. Did man sin, and so forfeit his birthright? We know that he did; and we know, as well, that he had no sooner forfeited his right to eternal life by sin, than it was restored to him in the gospel of Christ; for the gospel was presented as the good news of eternal life as early as this. We know that the purpose to restore to man his birthright to eternal life—which he might lose by sin—was in the Creator's arrangement before man was created; and so, of course, this purpose would take effect as soon as the forfeiture occurred; and so it did. But are there no sad consequences remaining to the race on account of this first transgression, notwithstanding their birthright is restored? Yes, many; and death, literal death, is the last in the list of these sad ills. But mark, this death cannot be eternal; for, if it was, then the birthright is not, and could not be restored; for the birthright is eternal life, which one may secure though he die; but not if he is dead eternally. But is eternal death thus ruled out? and though all men die, yet will death be eternal to none? By no means is this the conclusion; for, listen to the following texts—and we shall quote only a few out of very many which speak to the point:

"For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the power of the world to come, if they shall fall away; to renew them again to repentance, seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame."—Heb. vi. 4–6. "For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of God and of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins." "He who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing, and hath done despite to the Spirit of grace."—Heb. x. 26, 29. "Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world"—or age—"neither in the world"—or age—"to come."—Math. xii. 32. "He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost, hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation."—Mark iii. 29.

These texts, with many others, plainly declare that the persons they speak of will never live again; they have not only transgressed God's law, but have also refused and despised his grace, and "eternal damnation," or condemnation, must rest on them.

But as their character, acts and condition are very plainly and particularly described in the many texts which speak of them, ought we not to be very careful that we include none in this class, who do not sustain the character here delineated?

I shall be very critically careful here, as I study the inspired volume touching this subject; as, also, when I speak or write, however careless others may be, lest I "add to his words, and he reprove me, and I be found a liar."

OBITUARY.

FELL asleep, at East Eddington, Me., Sister SARAH E., wife of C. W. WALKER, and daughter of A. M. and C. S. BUZZELL, of Monroe, Me.

The husband has lost a true wife, the five children a tender mother, the aged parents a loving daughter; also, three brothers and three sisters to mourn her loss, she being the first taken from the family circle.

Sister Sarah was baptised, in the full belief of the Adventists, at Berlin Falls, N. H., in 1859, by L. L. Howard, of Me., then holding meetings in that place. She died full of faith and hope of a future life. The sad news reached me (her brother) in this distant State; and I sorrow most, because I was not there to speak words of hope and comfort, from the blessed Bible, in her last hours. May God comfort those that are left to mourn.

She was carried to Monroe, and buried in the village cemetery. Funeral sermon by Eld. P. Walker, of Monroe, Me.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

WE some time since reminded those of our subscribers who were then in arrears that the interests of the cause required the payment of the subscription dues. To this call many promptly responded. Others did not respond, and the number of delinquents has since been somewhat augmented by the expiration of terms of subscription. Every thoughtful person must see the absolute impossibility of continuing the publication of such an organ as is the HERALD OF LIFE, unless subscribers faithfully discharge their obligations to the paper.

There must be comparatively few indeed who cannot afford to promptly pay two dollars a year, while those who do not longer wish the paper should certainly be willing to simply inform the Editor of the fact, thus saving the needless expenditure of mailing papers which either never find their way out of the post-offices to which they are sent, or are neither read nor paid for when received. Many there are, doubtless, who intend to pay but who delay from time to time. These should remember that procrastination is a thief, and hence unfit to exercise any influence over those who desire to do right.

We trust none of our friends will longer delay in this matter, else must the interests of truth suffer. Let us neglect no duty, but rather all be faithful in the service. Thus only can we do our work in the appointed time, for "the night is far spent," and the golden streams that guild the eastern horizon betoken the dawn of that glorious day of redemption for which a groaning and travailing creation waiteth.

THE INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE.

THE idea that Scripture language is to be understood different from the same forms of speech in other writings, is a fruitful source of error. Mysticism, or saying one thing and meaning another, is not to be tolerated in a professed revelation. To make plain words of inspiration mean something else than their obvious sense, or pretending the true sense is a hidden one, was introduced into the church, says Enfield, in his Philosophy, "about as soon as the apostles had left the world." Heathen philosophers dealt in the mystical sense, because they designed to keep the common people in ignorance. The primitive converts to Christianity, from heathenism, had great temptations to use the mystical in interpreting Scripture, hoping thereby to multiply conversions to the new religion by the abundance of hidden wonders they thus pretended to find in the Bible. To some extent they were successful; but the church paid dear for this perversion of the word of God. It prepared the way for the Papal apostacy; and since the Reformation, has been the scourge of Christendom, producing fanaticism, wild fancies, and has led to every evil work.

There is but one remedy to this evil, viz., A rational adherence to a literal construction of Bible language, such as would be sound in reading any other book of sober instruction.

There are figurative and symbolical representations and illustrations of truth, but they are such as might be understood by the common people: it was such language as was in common use in that age: hence, if we place ourselves where they were, we need be in no doubt as to the sense intended. The sun, moon, stars, mountains, rivers, various beasts, etc., were used figuratively or symbolically, in the Bible, to denote kings, rulers, governments, kingdoms, states, etc., but they were not so used to hide the meaning, except in rare instances; for it was the common method of conveying instruction in a time when almost every idea had some symbol to represent it, and make it more plain, instead of obscure, as some suppose.

We are not to give those symbols or figures a fanciful interpretation, but let the Scriptures be their own interpreter, carefully examining such teaching in the light of explanations or fulfilments previously presented, which will show us how the language was then understood; thus shall we be made acquainted with the true import of the words employed. Then we may and ought to explain the Bible as we would any other common-sense book written to communicate information to the minds of men in general: i. e., according to its most obvious sense, unless necessity compels a departure from it.

Finally, in our interpretations of Scripture, our conclusions must be according to the analogy of faith; that is, they must be consistent with plain passages that speak on the same subjects or events. Also, the general tenor of the Scriptures must rule in the conclusion arrived at. The language that is obscure is to be explained by that which is plain. In other words, figurative language is not to rule against plain and positive, but is to submit to it. Any position which converts the plain and positive statement of penalty of law into a figurative representation, must be a false position. Such are all attempts to convert the penalty of death into life in misery, when spoken of the final state of sinners.

"Was Paul's call on his way to Damascus an election to grace and apostleship?"

CERTAINLY it was. But does that prove he was also unconditionally elected to eternal life? That is the question at issue. Did Paul so understand it? If so, why does he say "I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway?" 1 Corth. ix. 27. Why does he tell us that he labored and suffered, "If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead?" Does this all look as if he believed himself elected, unconditionally, unto eternal life? Paul understood that an election of grace might end in a reprobation of justice; our Lord had taught him so. What else is the parable of the talents? Three persons had an election of grace. To one was given five, to another two, to another one talent. Here God's sovereignty is seen. He divided the talents according to his own will. The recipients of these talents were called upon to improve their election of grace. Upon that improvement depended their election to a higher position; or, if you please, their election to eternal life. One did not improve, and came under the reprobation of justice. Does any one say the other two received more grace; that was the reason they succeeded? If the amount of grace given is the cause of the success, then how did the man succeed who had less than half as much as the one with five talents? and did not the first have a useless amount of grace? and had not the third ground to file in the plea of an insufficient amount of grace to enable him to succeed? and would justice have rejected such a plea? Here are three persons clearly elected of grace, or favor, and entrusted with goods, or grace, by a Sovereign who had the right to bestow his goods as he pleased, and he wisely "gave to each according to their several ability." He gave only what he knew they had ability to improve. As a righteous Sovereign he could not require an improvement where there was not "ability," neither could he allow the wilful neglect to improve what his grace had bestowed to pass without censure. The election of grace was what made the man responsible, and the neglect to improve the election of grace was what constituted his guilt, and made his condemnation just.

This parable is a clear illustration of the election of grace: it is unconditional in its bestowment of various degrees of divine aid; but that aid is to be improved by free minds: no forced improvement can make any one responsible, praise or blame-worthy. And where there is no ability, a wise and just sovereign can never condemn for not doing. What would be thought of the sovereign who should demand a subject to run a race who was without legs? especially if he should condemn him to death because he failed to comply, or to do an impossible thing? Would not all reasonable men call such a sovereign an unprincipled tyrant? and would not such verdict against that sovereign be approved by every unprejudiced mind?

Let it be remembered, then, that while an election of grace is admitted, that every man is a subject of it, or he would not be a responsible being; but this election of grace by no means secures, absolutely, any man's election to eternal life; it is by the use of this grace that such life is secured. Grace is the "ladder" let down from heaven, without which no man could move in that direction, but hands and feet must be used to climb it, else "the grace of God" is "received in vain;" and the man perishes because he would not use his free limbs (or free-will) to climb the ladder of God's free grace.

Our readers generally, probably, do not wish this question to occupy any considerable portion of our paper. It is true the Government of God is involved in it, and right views of that government are of vast importance to a realizing sense of our obligation to God, and for our love to him. But if the subject is to be discussed, let the point be clearly understood as to what the controversy is about. It is not, whether God is a sovereign, but whether that sovereignty is exercised in an unconditional election of certain individual persons to eternal life? which necessarily draws after it an unconditional reprobation of other persons to eternal death. The disconnection of the two ideas is impossible. We maintain he has elected the whole human race to the possibility of eternal life—that is, "the grace of God that bringeth salvation (Syriac, life), hath appeared to all men:" and our Lord commanded his ministers to preach this "gospel to every creature, in all the world;" and who shall question the possibility of its being free-grace, honestly offered, to all? and that it carries with it the ability, to every man, to accept it and live forever?

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

"According to my earnest expectation and my hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also, Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death. For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. But if I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labor: yet what I shall choose I wot not. For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better. Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you."—Phil. i. 20–24.

OF this language of Paul Mr. George remarks, p. 55 of his book, as follows:

"Every honest reader of the Bible will see at a glance that the contrast is between living 'in the flesh' (ver. 22); abiding 'in the flesh' (ver. 24), on the one hand, and departing 'to be with Christ,' on the other. To establish this needs no argument, as the passage is before the reader. Paul is divided in his feeling, having two objects before him, which seem to stand opposed to each other; namely, his own happiness and the well-being of his brethren. For his own sake, he desires to die and depart; to be with Christ."

We have long been of the opinion that the most reasonable and natural exposition of the text is that which makes the contrast "between living in the flesh, abiding in the flesh, on the one hand, and departing to be with Christ, on the other:" but we are entirely unwilling to say that "every honest reader of the Bible will see at a glance" that such is the case, for there are hosts of honest readers of the Bible who do not see it. Our confident author himself seems to fail to see it long enough to write a single paragraph. Before he has written ten lines he bids adieu to the explication which he affirms "every honest reader of the Bible will see at a glance," and says of Paul, "For his own sake, he desires to die and depart." He forgets that when people die they do not go to Christ, but are generally put in the grave. If Paul desired to die he would hardly have said, "yet what I shall choose" (choose, in the sense of selecting with a view to possession, cannot properly represent the expression of Paul, for the right of choice, in that sense, did not rest with him. What Paul would prefer) "I wot (know) not," for had he desired death he would most assuredly have preferred it; but so far from this he expressed a difficulty in concluding which he would prefer.

Claiming that Paul possessed a deathless soul which was the real man, it is assumed that the "I," spoken of as being "in the flesh," was Paul's immortal soul-entity; and then it is immediately said that he, Paul, the same "I," desired "to die." Think of it, dear reader: an undying, a deathless soul desiring to die! This is a strangely illogical and inconsistent way of complicating matters; but then, his theory compels him to it.

What did Paul mean by in the flesh? Why, in a state of mortality, of course. When he said "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," what did he mean? Was it that there will be no material bodies in the kingdom of God? None, we think, will assert it. He meant that there will be no natural, mortal, corruptible bodies there, for all subjects of the resurrection will "put on immortality," be raised spiritual bodies.

"According to my earnest expectation and my hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness as always, so now also, Christ shall be magnified in my body, (me) whether it be by life, or by death. For me to live is Christ." (Christ what? Why, Christ magnified, for Paul says Christ shall be magnified by his life,) "and to die is gain." (Gain to Paul? No, not necessarily, though in some respects death must have been looked upon by him as gain to himself. Gain to Christ: Paul says Christ shall be magnified by his death; and in that respect Paul's death would be gain to Christ). "But if I live in the flesh" (this state of mortality) "this" (Christ magnified) "is the fruit of my labor; yet what I shall choose I wot," (know) "not. For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better."

Paul was in a strait betwixt two; and the fact that he did not know how to make choice between them is pretty good evidence that he did not believe in going to glory at death; as, had he done so, he could quickly have decided the matter. His "desire to depart, and to be with Christ" could not, therefore, have been one of the straits betwixt which he was.

Speaking of a time when he and his brethren were terribly persecuted in Asia, "pressed out of measure above strength, insomuch that" they "despaired even of life," Paul says: "We had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead: who delivered us from so great a death, and dost deliver: in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us." Thus it is seen that when death stared Paul in the face he had no desire to meet it, but if it were the Lord's will that he should then suffer it, his trust was not that he, or any part of him, should be glorified in death, but that he should be raised from the dead to eternal glory.

Again: says Paul, Phil. ii. 27: "For indeed he" (Epaphroditus) "was sick nigh unto death; but God had mercy on him." Sickness had stricken him down, and it is proper to infer from the language used, that his physical sufferings were equal unto death itself. Would it, then, have been an act of mercy on the part of God to have restored Epaphroditus to a life fraught with all the sorrows resulting from a life of persecution instead of instantly relieving him from all his trials by transferring him right to glory, if taking saints there at death is a part of God's plan? Our theory enables us to readily perceive why Paul regarded the restoration of Epaphroditus to health, as an act of mercy upon both of them, while those occupying the, so called, orthodox stand-point must, we think, recognize an utter inability, on the part of any, to conceive how either Paul or Epaphroditus could see in it the bestowal of any mercy upon the latter.

The two straits we conceive to be life and death. Paul plainly stated that in either case it would be gain to Christ, inasmuch as he (Christ) was to be magnified.

Paul always represented death as undesirable; and subjected, as he was, to sore trials and afflictions, persecuted on all sides, oftimes suffering more than death, daily; deserted and harassed by many from whom he had reason to expect the most faithful co-operation and enduring love, he could not look upon life as desirable; so, neither of the two being desirable, he knew not which to choose (prefer), for he desired, though he did not, perhaps, expect, a third and very much better thing than either of the two, which was to "depart," by translation, "and to be with Christ."

Translation being preferable to either life or death, there was nothing strange or unnatural in Paul's desiring it. There are times when all God's faithful ones desire it. They would hail with joy unspeakable the coming of our dearly loved Redeemer, to relieve us from the fetters of mortality, and instantaneously change us from a natural, or animal to a spiritual existence. Paul tells us, "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." That will be "translation" to all saints who are then alive.

Belsham writes:

"It is commonly inferred from this text, and with some appearance of plausibility, that the apostle expected to be introduced into a state of activity and happiness immediately after death; but this conclusion is inconsistent with his doctrine in the epistles to the Corinthians and the Thessalonians, where he represents the happiness of a future life as entirely dependent upon a resurrection from the dead; without which he assures them that their faith is vain, and all who had fallen asleep in Christ had perished. 1 Thess. iv. 13, 14; 1 Cor. xv. 12–18. To make the apostle, therefore, consistent with himself, we must understand him as comparing the present state with that which will take place immediately after the resurrection, and accounting as nothing the intervening lapse of time. Not, indeed, upon the metaphysical, however just, supposition, that the interval of thousands of ages is in reality nothing; but, because the apostle, and all the Christians in that age, believed that the second appearance of Christ to raise the dead, and judge the world, would take place in the course of a very few years, so that some who were then living would be witnesses to that awful event. It is upon this ground that he regarded as nothing the few years which he supposed would elapse before the resurrection of the dead. See 1 Thess. iv. 15."

Dr. Priestly remarks:

"Nothing can be inferred from this text in favor of an intermediate state between death and the resurrection. For the apostle, considering his own situation, would naturally connect the end, of this life with the commencement of another and a better, as he would have no perception of any interval between them. That the apostle had no view to any state short of the coming of Christ to judgment, is evident from the phrase he makes use of, viz., being with Christ, which can only take place at his second coming. For Christ himself has said that he would come again, and that he would take his disciples to himself; which clearly implies that they were not to be with him before that time.

Accordingly, for many centuries after the notion of an intermediate state was advanced, a notion which was the foundation of the doctrine of purgatory, and many other absurd and mischievous opinions and practices in the church of Rome, and of no good whatever, it was never imagined that departed souls were to be with Christ, but only in a place under ground called Hades, where they were to wait till the resurrection of their bodies, at which time, and not before, it was supposed that they would be with Christ. The opinion, of the soul going immediately to heaven, was not advanced with any degree of confidence by any Christians except the Gnostics, who believed in no resurrection at all, till about a thousand years after Christ."

Says the venerable Bishop Law, "The Scriptures, in speaking of the connection between our present and our future being, doth not take into the account our intermediate state in death, no more than we, in describing the course of any man's actions, take in the time he sleeps. Therefore the Scripture must affirm an intermediate connection between death and judgment, Heb. ix. 28, and represent the coming of Christ as near at hand, James v. 8, 9."—Law's Inquiry, App. No. xiii. xiv. Milton says of the words to be with Christ:

"That is, at his appearing, which all the believers hoped and expected was then at hand. In the same manner one who is going on a voyage desires to set sail and to arrive at a destined port, such is the order in which his wishes arrange themselves, omitting all notice of the intermediate passage. If, however, it be true that there is no time without motion, which Aristotle illustrates by the example of those who were fabled to have slept in the temple of the heroes, and who, on awaking, imagined that the moment in which they woke had succeeded without an interval to that in which they fell asleep; how much more must intervening time be annihilated to the departed (for, the dead,) so that to them, to die and to be with Christ will seem to take place at the same moment? Christ himself, however, expressly indicates the time at which we shall be with him; John xiv. 3, 'if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.'"

Archbishop Whately says some perhaps have found a difficulty in reconciling the expressions of Paul, 1 Thess. iv. 13, 14, where he speaks of "them which are asleep;" and v. 14, "them which sleep in Jesus," with Phil. i. 23, and he then remarks that they may be reconciled together on the supposition of a state of sleep between death and the resurrection. He further says:

"If a man were seemingly at the point of death in some painful disease, and were asked what he thought of his own prospects, he would be likely to answer, 'I long to be released from my sufferings, and to be with Christ;' for I believe that, to my own perception, the instant death closes my eyes, I shall be awakened by the last trump—the summons to meet my Lord. And though, in relation to you the survivors, my dying this hour or a year hence makes no difference as to the time when that day shall arrive, to me it makes all the difference: . . . relatively to me, it does, to all practical purposes, come the sooner, the sooner I am released from the burden of 'this earthly tabernacle.' . . . It is thus then that the apostle Paul, or any other sincere Christian would express himself, supposing him to have such a belief. And just thus it is that Paul does express himself. When he is administering comfort to the survivors respecting their brethren who have departed in the Lord, he always speaks of them as 'asleep.' . . . On the other hand, when he speaks of his eager longing 'to depart and to be' (it is the substantive verb, to exist,) 'with Christ,' he is speaking of himself, solely, without any reference to the perceptions and feelings of the survivors, but only to his own. Now in respect to his own perceptions, the moment of his breathing his last in this world would be, as has been said, instantly succeeded (on the supposition of total insensibility during the interval) by that of his awakening in the presence of his Lord."

Thus we see that these learned men, these master-minds do not find the doctrine of soul survivance in death taught in the passage under consideration. No Christian person will even intimate that they were not honest read- ers of the Bible. We trust all those who have not yet done so will soon realize that wisdom will not be likely to die with the man who is thus reckless in statement. Paul was not inconsistent with himself; and we shall ere long see that his teachings not only give no countenance to the theory of inherent immortality but positively forbid faith in it.

That Paul, by the expression, "having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ," meant that he desired to die is a truly singular position for those to take who, believing that Christ now sits at the right hand of God in heaven, affirm that Paul's soul, together with other disembodied ones, is in hades, and so cannot be with Christ until the resurrection. It involves either, first: that Paul was ignorant of what would be his condition immediately after death; or, second: that God's throne is located in hades; or, third: that Paul did not believe that he would go to Christ when he died. They can take their choice of these positions, the first and second of which are, so far as we know, equally absurd, and certainly at variance with the testimony of inspiration. As the third is doubtless true, it being in harmony with the Word, we are free to recommend it. L. C. T.

The Camp-Meeting.

Although the attention of our friends has recently more than once been called to this subject, its importance suggests the propriety of again laying the matter before you. We are informed by letter from Br. Day, who has in charge the fitting up and laying out of the grounds, that the work is progressing. One building, designed for a kitchen, 31 by 20, with room overhead, is completed; and a dining-room about 66 by 28 is nearly so. Seats, platforms and other items of furniture for the ground are also being made. The work will soon be so far accomplished that the selection of lots may commence, a thing for which, we are informed, quite a number of people are already somewhat impatiently waiting.

The grove, as you were last winter informed by the Secretary of the Committee, Br. Thos. R. Weaver, is a beautiful one of about twenty acres. The trees are large, tall and shady; the ground is dry, and a plenty of good water may be easily obtained. The Secretary of the Committee informed you also that "The Life and Advent Union" voted, at the last annual meeting, to raise $1,000 for the purpose of fitting up the ground. Of this amount nearly six hundred have been pledged. Four hundred dollars, therefore, perhaps more, are still needed. Will not our friends step forward with open hand, and make up the required sum at once? We trust those who can give liberally will do so, and that those who cannot do this will promptly and cheerfully do what they can, for every amount, however small, helps to fill the treasury. If we love the truth we will employ every proper and desirable means to establish it among the people, for thus shall we greatly glorify God, honor Jesus and benefit our fellow-men.

We now publish the names of such as have already pledged, and we trust all will pay in their amounts as soon as they conveniently can, as the money is now needed. Friends, beloved in the Lord, let us all take hold and carry forward this work, asking God's blessing upon it. Since we are to have a Camp-Meeting, let us endeavor, as Br. Ladd has suggested, to make it the best ever held.

All remittances should be made to Geo. K. Carroll, Treasurer, 58 White street, N. Y., or to T. R. Weaver, Secretary, No. 1 Opera House, Springfield, Mass. L. C. T.

The Camp-Ground.

Br. Storrs: I would like to say, through the Herald, to the brethren scattered abroad, that I have visited our new Camp-Ground, and found Br. Day and his son engaged in putting up the buildings necessary for our comfort. They have got the kitchen nearly finished, and the boarding-house will soon look very comfortable. The grove is elegant, and is well adapted for the purpose to which it is to be dedicated.

Now, beloved brethren, as this will be our first Camp-Meeting where we will have the privilege of hearing and speaking the truth of "No life out of Christ," which so plainly sets forth the true character of our heavenly Father, and which makes the plan of redemption so clear and so glorious, let us all decide to be present at the meeting, if the will of the Lord be so. Come that our hearts may be blended together in holy love: come that we may confer together as to the best way of promoting the cause of truth and of proclaiming it far and near; for the time is evidently short, and what we do must be done quickly. Come that we may provoke one another to love and to good works. Let us leave our secular employment for one week, that we may worship God together in the tented grove.

As the children say, Let us begin to save up by denying ourselves, if necessary, some of the luxuries of life, that we may be able to attend this family gathering, as this, our first camp-meeting, will have a decided influence for good to the cause, or otherwise. And let those brethren who have plenty of the Lord's money in trust, think of the acts of those who contributed to the building of the temple of Solomon, and imitate their example. Let all have a mind to work.

Wm. Stuart.

Springfield, Mass., May 24, 1871.

The Conflict in Paris.

After a week of one of the most desperate and bloody struggles on record the insurgents at Paris are reported as completely overcome, and victory proclaimed. But with the news which speaks the dawn of peace, comes a sad, sad tale of horror, of blood-thirsty cruelty, and of suffering. It is confidently stated that more than 50,000 men, women and children are lying dead, and unburied in Paris at the present time, while one-fourth of the city, it is said, has been destroyed.

One of the last acts of the Communists was to murder the aged Archbishop of Paris, along with the Abbe-Duguerry and sixty-two others (whether all priests or not the dispatch does not say) who were held as hostages. For six days previous to the massacre these had been held in La Roquette prison, but when the insurgents found that their cause was lost, the bloody deed was hastily done, by what means accounts do not distinctly state, though it is intimated they were shot. The most lively imagination must fail to more than faintly depict to itself the terror that existed in that unhappy city for about one week. The hideous yells of infuriated demons, the incessant rattling of musketry, the deafening explosion of shells, the blasphemies of the wounded and the groans of the dying, the awful feelings of suspense and insecurity to the peaceable and well-disposed, and over all the thick smoke by day, and by night the lurid light of the burning capital must have combined to constitute a scene not before witnessed in modern times. The following dispatch is dated London, May 28:

Since the street fighting began the Government forces have lost 1,200 men in killed, with a proportionate number of wounded. The losses of the insurgents in killed and wounded since Sunday have been immense. It is impossible at present to form any estimate of the number, as the dead bodies and the wounded strew the streets in every direction. The spectacle presented in the various thoroughfares is the most sickening and horrible imaginable.

The Prussians at Romainville made a thousand prisoners, including several armed women, on Saturday evening. All the insurgents who came within their lines were disarmed and placed under guard.

There are rumors of awful cruelties perpetrated by the Versaillists, who are reported to have shot men, women and children found with arms in their hands.

Gen. Ladmirault yesterday captured Les Buttes Chaumont and Monilmoutant, and Gen. Vinoy at a late hour carried the Cemetery of Pere-la-Chaise, where the insurgents fought with desperation.

The insurgents yesterday shot the Archbishop of Paris, the Abbe Duguerry and 62 other hostages remaining in their hands. The troops had previously captured La Roquette, and saved 169 hostages detained there. The body of Delescluze has been found in the streets and identified.

A court-martial for the trial of insurgents will begin its sittings on Monday. The insurgents in the docks have attempted a rising, and several were shot before order was restored.

It is calculated that there are upwards of 50,000 dead bodies in the houses and cellars of Paris, many of women and children. The women, it is said, have been perfectly furious during the recent fighting in the French capital. The destruction of property is terrible. One-fourth of Paris is estimated to have been destroyed.

Since Sunday 30,000 prisoners have been taken, including numbers of debauched and foul-mouthed women. M. Courbet poisoned himself after he was captured. MM. Rochefort and Assy are to be tried by Civil Court as criminals. The Belgians have arrested several of the Reds, and have telegraphed to the Government here that they will hold them at its disposal. All the National Guards throughout France are to be disarmed. The Luxor Obelisk in the Place de la Concorde is still intact, though the statues have been destroyed. Yesterday 6,000 insurgents surrendered in a body.

What next? Though the Communists are crushed in Paris, it is far from certain that peace is thus suddenly to dawn upon that land thus drenched with human blood.

The following, dated 29th inst., are the latest dispatches up to the time of going to press:

"The fighting at Belleville, Menilmontant, and Pere la Chaise yesterday was desperate. No quarter was given to man, woman or child.

Military law has been established in the city. Executions are proceeding at the Champs de Mars, the Park de Monceaux, and the Hotel de Ville. From 50 to 100 of the insurgents are shot at a time.

No one is permitted to leave Paris without a pass signed by Marshal MacMahon. The troops, fearing incendiary fires, have caused all the cellar-gratings and other openings to be hermetically sealed. The fires have all been extinguished.

Among the hostages shot by the insurgents were the Abbes Susa and Duguerry, the Jesuit Fathers Olivain, Caubert, and Bangy, the Abbe Allard, and the banker Jecker.

Paris looks completely cowed. The shops are all closed, and even those of vital necessity, such as chemists, remain shut. The restaurants, bakeries, and grocery stores have also suspended business. I walked across Paris last night, and never saw any thing so desolate. I saw no human beings, but sentinels every 100 yards, and one shabby civilian. There were no sounds but the footfalls of the sentinels, and the thuds made when they struck their muskets on the flag-stones.

The old revolutionary system of denunciations is going on with terrible ferocity. Nadar, the æronaut, has been arrested for supposed sympathy with the Commune. Nobody is safe, even in the presence of their most intimate friends. A rash word or imprudent gesture by a man or woman insures instant death. Men, women, and even children, are seized by the brutal soldiery and shot. The saddest feature is the conduct of the women, the female insurgents having in many instances been detected firing the houses of innocent persons with petroleum."

The horrors of Communism are succeeded by equal cruelties on the part of the Versailles Government, whose troops, it is asserted, shoot down men, women and children. It is stated that the insurgents "taken in arms are shot down by platoons, a hundred falling at a single fire, and these summary military executions have taken place simultaneously in three or four places." That such enormities are practiced by the Government is evidence sufficient that God does not intend to maintain it, but is simply using wickedness to punish wickedness. He hath a controversy with the nations. The insurgents are overthrown; now what? L. C. T.

From Polly G. Pitts.

Br. Storrs: After so long a time I again write for the Herald of Life. It is not that I have lost my interest in the dear Herald, or the many precious articles found in it. No, no; but soon after I came to Wisconsin I had a dreadful fall, and I can truly say there was but a step between me and death; indeed it seemed like a miracle that I was not killed. I had no bones broken, but my head was badly bruised, and even now, after six weeks and over, since I was hurt, I cannot think closely on any subject without its breaking my rest, and it seems that sleep departs from me; so I have to be very careful, for I am weak and feeble yet. O, I bless God for chastising; it will hide pride from my eyes, humble me out of myself, and cause me to trust more and more in the great Life-Giver.

O how I value the Herald of Life; what deep and glorious truths are brought to light from God's word. O what a theme! "The Divine Adjustment of the Ages," how it strengthened my faith, and I feel that my faith is like the ancient worthies recorded in Heb. xi.; and when meditating on the Divine Word, from Genesis to the present time, I can truly say, "By faith" I "understand the ages to have been adjusted by declaration of God; to the end that not out of appearances should that which is seen (by faith) have come into existence." Is there any thing in the appearance of this age, with its ten thousand improvements, its millions looking for republican principles to govern all nations, its thousands of Protestant churches and ministers, preaching a temporal millennium, a great Sabbath to the world, and their faith having for its foundation the present appearance and working of things? Now I say, Is there any thing in the appearance of all this, that Jesus, our immortal King, shall soon come from heaven with all his holy angels (not with observation) as the lightning shining out of the east even unto the west? So quick shall his coming be. The graves are opened, and those that sleep in Jesus will be raised immortal, and those of his that are alive and remain unto his coming, shall be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, etc. When he shall take unto him his great power and reign; yes, reign on the throne of his father David, and of his kingdom there shall be no end; yes, "of the increase and peace of his kingdom there shall be no end;" bless the Lord. And though almost all are looking for the good time to come, through present appearance, and working of things, yet there is a little flock, (blessed be God and his Christ) who are looking by faith for the coming and kingdom, or age of Messiah. And their faith has for its foundation the immutable Word of the Lord.

And now, dear brothers and sisters, let us look at some of the present truths. What is revealed is for us and our children. In Rev. xvii., John is shown by an angel the judgment of the great harlot that sat upon many waters, etc. John says, "So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness; and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-colored beast, full of the names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. And the woman was arrayed in purple," etc. "And upon her forehead was a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and abominations of the earth." There is no mistaking who this woman is; it is the papal church.

On what beast, or government has she sat, especially since 1849? The answer is plain. On the government of France, or Napoleonic dynasty. The angel said to John, "I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns. The beast that thou sawest, was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition." Has it gone to perdition? If not, where is it? The answer is plain to me, and is present truth, and it was written for our admonition, upon whom the end of the age is come. What of the woman? The angel said, And the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the harlot, and make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, etc. Have they done it? So far, I think we must say, "Yes." In chap. xviii. John says, "And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, that ye receive not of her plagues. For her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities. Reward her even as she rewarded you, and double unto her double, according to her works: in the cup which she hath filled, fill to her double. How much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her: for she saith in her heart, I sit a queen, and am no widow, (had been married to a beast) and shall see no sorrow. Therefore shall her plagues come in one day (O, to me how true, though she has drank draught after draught of the judgments of God, yet in less than one prophetic day she has experienced) death, and mourning, and famine: and she shall be utterly burned with fire (destroyed, consumed, sink like a millstone, and be found no more at all), for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her." Amen.

The Alleluia must come soon, brethren, for it is written, "Rejoice over her, thou heavens, (O, glory), and ye holy apostles and prophets: for God hath avenged you on her. And again they said, Alleluia, and her smoke rose up forever and ever;" or to the age of Messiah, so it seems to me, for we believe, and have good evidence that there is the Messianic age, and that it is nigh, almost at the door, and that it must be the age of ages, world without end. There may arise persecution and awful suffering to the church of God, but to me it seems more like "peace and safety," (as some suppose) that they will be eating and drinking, and marrying, yes, eating and drinking with the drunken.

The Lord knows that we must eat and drink, and we should pray, "Give us this day our daily bread," and be temperate in all things; but, to me, it is the great feasts, suppers, and fairs of Christendom, when they eat and drink with the infidel and the drunkard; not in every case with those that are drunk with strong drink, but with those that are drunk with the customs, the fashions, and the vanities of this present age.

O may God's ministers feed the church of Christ, which he purchased with his own blood, with meat in due season, and with present truth, for there is a fountain of it to make the man of God perfect unto all good works. May God preserve us all blameless unto his coming.

Your sister in the Lord.

How to be Rich in the Kingdom.

If it is prudent to provide for the time to come, how much more so to provide for eternity! While to be rich in this world is the passion of thousands, to be rich in the next be mine. An appetite after earthly grandeur, betrays a mean spirit, and a base soul; but an ambition to be great in heaven, is worthy of an heir of God, of an expectant of glory; for it is to the honor of the supreme Potentate, that all his subjects be nobles, be priests, be kings.

In this short life-time is the foundation laid of things of eternal moment, and the wisdom that is from above will teach me to send all my treasures thither. It deserves little or no pity to be poor in this world, but poverty in the other is deplorable beyond the reach of comparison. And yet, according to the capacity of glorified saints, shall that same undiminished fulness be possessed in greater or lesser degree.

"How rich died he?" is the speech of fools at the decease of an acquaintance or friend. But none ever die rich but the saints; for, how can that man be said to die rich, when the very moment of his dissolution robs him of his all?

"Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven" is the admonition of the dear Redeemer. Let me, then, lay down an imperfect plan to myself, how to be rich for eternity.

1. Then, pre-supposing that I am in a gracious state, I must have a Christian contempt for the world. No man ever filled his coffers with sand; no monarch ever wore the pebble in his crown; so the soul that lays up his treasures in heaven, will not concern himself with perishing trifles. If my affections are not weaned from the creature, and set on things above, I shall be but poor in the world to come.

2. I must be watchful in all things. The man that is anxious to be rich will not waste a penny; so must I watch my actions, my thoughts, my words. Again, I must watch for God against all my secret sins, and also to reprove the transgressor. A bold and sincere reproof of sin, is a stroke against the enemies of the King, from which a palm of victory shall spring in the world of glory. I must also speak in commendation of the good land, that others may be encouraged to set out for the land of promise. Again, I must watch against carnal sorrow. Should the heir of a crown lament the loss of a feather? What can death do in his family who is the resurrection and the life? It may separate them a little while, but it is only to meet again forever. Worldly riches give their owners joy, but joy in the Lord increases spiritual riches. So I must guard against carnal delight; none of the gay things of time must be objects of affection. It would be mean for a noble personage to be charmed with a stable, who has a palace prepared for him; mean for an heir of God to sit down and feed on the refuse of the creation. Again, I must beware of carnal company. These are bankrupts that will spend at my expense, and whatever loss I make by them, yet in their company I shall never be able to add a mite to my celestial treasure. How can I be safe among robbers? They may rob me of a good frame, wound my conscience, and at last leave me with a bleeding heart, which may pain me many days.

3. To grow rich for the world to come, I must study to be heavenly-minded, not by fits and starts, but in one constant, steady, holy frame of spirit. Thus every duty will be my delight; prayer and praise, like my daily food, always pleasant; attendance on the public ordinances like walking in the King's palace garden; reading the Scriptures, like conferring with the dearest friend; and self-examination, like the merchant from a far country, counting over his rich jewels and precious gems, inspecting his gold and silver, that it have the king's stamp, and so be sterling money; that his graces, his duties, his attainments, are approved by scripture and conscience.

4. Holy meditations will mightily augment the spiritual riches. To find God in all things, and at all times, in all places, and in all providences, will enrich me for eternity. To find his power in this, his wisdom in that, and his goodness in all, will greatly improve my inquiring, my admiring soul. Meditating much, meditating often, meditating with delight, on him in whom are hid the treasures of wisdom, is a noble way to enrich me for a future world.

5. To be rich in the better country, I must heartily study to approve of all the dispensations of Providence; though not insensible when he frowns, or when he smiles. When the Christian, with a filial resignation acquiesces in the conduct of his almighty Father, however cross to flesh and blood, and in his unchangeable love, he takes deep root for eternity; while fear and unbelief toss the unstable, like a rolling thing before the whirlwind. It is proper only to children, not to men, to be peevish for toys and trifles; so let the men of this world lament the loss of worldly things but let the heirs of God, the joint-heirs with Christ, rejoice that the treasures of eternity are theirs.

6. To be rich unto God, and for eternity, I must act strong faith on the Rock of ages; for it is from the spoils of battles won by faith, that I amass riches for the invisible world. Faith relying on a reconciled God in all his attributes and perfections, on Jesus in all his offices and relations, on the Holy Ghost in all his graces and operations, must remove mountains of difficulty, pluck up trees of corruption, pull down strong-holds of sin, wrestle against principalities and powers, and be more than conqueror at last, through her all glorious Author and Finisher.

7. I must also redeem time, and improve time; redeem time from this world, and improve it for the world to come. The man of business will be loth to lose a change hour for any trifling amusement; and the soul that would be busy for eternity, should look on every hour as his last hour, and should avoid excess of sloth and slumber. Vain amusements, impertinent employments, are cruel moths of time; and time is to be husbanded, though worlds should be squandered away. As the jeweller deals with gold, so must I with time; he is careful about the fillings, and loses nothing; so should I about the smallest divisions of time, the hour, the minute, the moment. It never made a dying person's bed thorny, that, by a bad bargain, he lost such and such a sum; but misspent time has made the dying moments of many dismal beyond expression.

8. To be rich in the world to come, I must have an intense love towards God and heavenly things. The men that love the world, pant after the dust of the world, and spare no pains to be rich in the world. A man will never toil himself to gather what he despises; so, unless I prefer heavenly things to earthly, I shall never seek to fill my treasure with invisible excellencies. "He that loveth silver," says the wise man, "shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase." But he that loveth God, shall be satisfied with God, and entranced with the exuberant fullness of the covenant.

9. To be rich indeed at last, I must endeavor to maintain communion with God now. To have fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ, in all his divine fullness, his glorious perfections, and his gracious ways, is the most enriching course that I can carry on below. Every moment of divine intercourse would be sinking another sum in the bank of heaven, so that I should be wondrous rich at last. He that quits the Indies for Europe, sends his treasures before him; then, though he be poor at his departure from the one country, yet he is rich on his arrival at the other; so well were it with me, if I could detach my thoughts and meditations, my care and affections, my joy and delight, my hope and expectation, from this perishing world, and centre them on that which is to come.—Selected.

To the Brethren in Maine.

There will be a meeting in Hampden, Me., the third Sunday in June, to choose a Camp-Meeting Committee, for the present year, to locate a place where, and fix on the time when to have the meeting commence.

The meeting in June will be on the Holbrook Road, near the new Paper Mill.

Ary Scheffer.

On the wall of brick and plaster,
  Running down the garden walk,
Little Ary drew a picture
  With a piece of pointed chalk.

For a man it was intended,
  But it looked—oh, such a sight!
On its left hand but three fingers,
  And but two upon its right.

It had neither knees nor elbows,
  And its body was so small!
Both its feet were bent and twisted,
  And it had no mouth at all.

As he drew it, cousin Gretchen,
  With her doll, was standing by;
And she said, "You'll be an artist,
  My dear Ary, if you try."

Truly spoke his cousin Gretchen,
  For, while yet a little boy,
His great diligence and talent
  Filled his mother's heart with joy.*

Much that mother longed to see him
  Grow to be a good, great man.
"I have little money, Ary,
  But I'll spare whate'er I can.

"I will pay the best of masters,
  Who shall teach you all they know.
'In all labor there is profit,'
  Honors too from labor flow.

"Let not earthly fame or glory,
  Ary, be your end or aim;
Let the glory of your Maker
  Have the first and highest claim.

"Then, I doubt not, darling Ary,
  If God spares you, you shall be
First and foremost of the painters
  Which the present age shall see." †

Truly spoke his loving mother.
  A great artist he became;
All the world now loud in honor
  Speak of Ary Scheffer's name.

Vast and varied were the subjects
  Which his skilful fingers drew—
Smiling infants, merry children,
  Men and women, good and true.

And he loved to paint the Saviour,
  With the children round his knee;
And the multitudes that gathered
  Round the shores of Galilee;

And the sick ones crowding round him,
  But to touch his garments' hem;
And that Saviour, in his sorrow,
  Weeping o'er Jerusalem.

Children, ne'er forget the precept
  That fond mother taught her son—
Whatsoe'r your task or labor,
  To God's glory be it done. ‡

* Before he was twelve years old, he exhibited in the Saloon at Amsterdam a picture which attracted much attention and approbation.

A DREAM AND ITS INTERPRETATION.

SHORTLY before the opening of the Mission Chapel and Home for Women in Water street, a friend not connected with the enterprise directly, but whose Christian heart was deeply enlisted in sympathy and prayer for its success, dreamed a dream. She saw the dwellings on that street all covered with filth; presenting a spectacle exceedingly repulsive. She saw also a number of persons, whom she recognized, actively engaged in pouring on the houses a stream of pure water from a deep and inexhaustible fountain. Wherever the waters touched, the houses became transformed and illumined by a clear and silvery light. She saw also that these persons stood in the midst of the street where the flowing mud, washed from off the houses, was running through the gutters, and they picked up many silver coins, which, though taken from such filth, came out clean and bright as if just issued from the mint.

The interpretation of the dream is quite easy; for just in like manner has the Lord saved in this locality even many, "by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost." We cannot but remark how like the vision of the prophet Ezekiel was the dream of our friend. The prophet saw a stream issue from under the threshold of the door of the temple, which, when it had become a mighty river, flowed on into the desert, and wheresoever the waters came there were abundant life, fish innumerable, and fruit-trees of every kind.

This stream is the living Gospel of Jesus Christ, made effectual by the practical operation of the living faith of his people. If this Gospel is not equal to the task of redeeming to the uttermost the vilest as well as the more moral and respectable of mankind, and lifting them into a life of virtue as permanent as grace enables others to abide in, then is there reason to fear a defect in the system, and a misapprehension of those assurances and promises which meet our eye on almost every page, and which plainly speak of the power of God as able and ready to save the harlots and abominable, and fit them for the inheritance of the saints in light.

But there is no defect in the Gospel of Christ; it is equal to the saving of all men. Further illustrations of the power of the Gospel among the deeply degraded are not wanting; they might, indeed, be multiplied to almost beyond the belief of numbers of Christians whose prejudices and limited observations render it difficult for them to extend their faith beyond certain classes, as hopeful subjects of Gospel grace.

A few examples may help the faith of some.

The case of Mary Ford is one of those startling romances of crime hardly credible to the quiet dweller in a Christian land. Before she was thirty-five years of age she had married five husbands, forsaking each in turn after a year or two. She would marry them for their money, and leave them without provocation. Her parents were Protestants, and brought up their daughter consistently. But Mary was wayward, and early inclined to wander from home. At fourteen she left home to live with a relative, but soon ran away and entered a factory in Massachusetts. Here she married, left her husband and went to Boston, where she lived in a house of ill-fame.

One of her husbands was a Christian, and left her, because, as Mary said, the child of God could not live with the child of the devil. After living in Boston a few years she came to this city, and marrying again, opened a dance-house in Water street, opposite where the "Home for Women" now stands. Here she rapidly passed from one degree of crime to another, becoming more and more vile and abandoned in her manners and character. She was the most noted drunkard and blasphemer on the street; she was frequently arrested and sent to prison. She became, because of her violent temper and ferocious demonstrations, a terror to the police of the district. Having left the husband with whom she had united to open the dance-house, she was married again, during the war, to a soldier, whose bounty she wished to obtain, and having secured it, she summarily left him, after an acquaintance of two days. She again returned to Boston and resumed her infamous occupation as keeper of a dance-house; but in a short time broke up and came to New York and into Water street. Mary seems to have been utterly insensible during all these years to any compunctions of conscience. She does not appear to have evinced any desire to escape from her degraded condition. She continued to sink lower and lower in the scale, until she appeared as the wretched inmate of one of the most miserable dens of that loathsome quarter. Her life was vileness. Her time was employed in drunkenness and tobacco-chewing and smoking. The cell of the convict was her usual bed, and the human image seemed forever crushed out from the battered and loathsome form of this, one of the lowest in the moral scale, among the "lost" of this city.

There is a lesson to be studied, in the fact that the first sensible conviction which the seared conscience of this abandoned creature seemed to heed was felt while she was serving out a sentence for crime, in the Blackwell's Island prison. Mary, while in prison, listened to the questionings which inwardly kept forcing their dreadful truths upon her mind. She began to reflect upon the past, the crime, the degradation of her womanhood; while the future opened up a dark and dismal destiny to her disturbed and guilty soul. This is the crisis. Who will be the evangelist to the miserable, ruined soul now in the midst of reckless criminals of her own sex? What voice in the desert will direct her blurred eyes to the Lamb of God? Strangely enough, it was not a Christian voice, nor an evangelist of the Christian church; but when Mary ventured to speak to a sailor, a released convict, of her despair in view of the black future before her, she was advised to go directly to the Water-street Home for Women. The conversation occurring on the last day of her sentence, she permitted him to conduct her to the Home, where he left her.

Here Mary was taught the way of salvation; but the painful convictions remained in full force in her soul for several months before the way of the cross became plain to her. When, at last, in utter self-despair, she threw herself upon the promise given to the one whose sins were as "crimson and red as scarlet," the change was instantaneous, and so marked on her countenance that those who were standing by could not doubt the blessing was divine. Many months have passed since that eventful hour, and this guilty one who had "sinned much" still is loving much. There is no more of the violence of ungovernable temper; but in its stead a quiet and subdued spirit made manifest in word and look. Mary says it was the Lord who delivered her and now keeps her soul in perfect peace. Mary is living among Christian friends, far removed from the scenes of her former life and wickedness, daily growing in grace by the means of the advantages of her situation, where all her surroundings are permeated by the atmosphere of religious influence. Verily, "is there any thing too hard for the Lord?"—The Methodist.

Doing Good.

"YOU know," said an individual in humble life, addressing a circle of Christian friends, "that I am a poor man. Fifty acres of land is all I have from which to support myself, wife, and six children. For fifteen years after I professed religion, I thought myself perfectly excused in giving nothing to religious objects, and I believe others thought so too, for they never called on me for any thing. I was in debt, could hardly bring the two ends of the year together, my family was poorly provided for, and we were even in the habit of receiving occasional donations from our neighbors. Being, about five years since, at a neighbor's, a lady called to ask assistance for a poor family, who had been burnt out, and lost two children in the fire.

"I was so much affected by what I heard, that to be able to give something for their relief, seemed to me would be an inexpressible gratification. I had in my pocket a piece of silver, of small value—it was all the money I had in the world, but still, ere I was aware, my fingers were upon it, and I involuntarily handed it to the lady. On my way home, I reflected upon myself, thought my family needed this money at that moment, to buy necessaries with, and if they did not, it was the property of my creditors, and I ought not to have given it away. It disturbed my mind so much, that I went and spread the case before God in prayer. While thus engaged, the words of our Saviour occurred to my mind—'Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee, turn not thou away.' My faith found here a support for itself, and I rejoiced that our Saviour did not single out the rich from the poor, as under obligation to observe this precept, but addressed it alike to all.

"Satisfied that I had done no wrong, I was willing to leave the result with God, and bent my thoughts to see how I could repair my loss, and allow myself the gratification of doing good in this way, on future occasions. I soon discovered, that in the manner both of purchasing and using articles of consumption in my family, I might practice greater economy than I had been accustomed to. By buying everything on credit, I had subjected myself to the double loss of giving more for articles, and of paying interest on the money they cost After all, they must be paid for; and hence, by contriving to pay when I got them, I should make a saving. And it was only by exercising great care and self-denial, the first year, that we succeeded in revolutionizing these old habits; but when it was done, it cut off no small item of useless expense. I found, also, that there were several articles of previous consumption, such as a number of gallons of ardent spirits, and as many pounds of tobacco, which we could give up altogether, and yet be better off than we had been with them. I contrived also, with the assistance of my wife, who entered into all my plans, to use what I purchased much more economically than before. Many ways both of increasing the comfort of living, and of doing it at less expense, occurred to us, that we had never thought of, which we reduced to practice, greatly to the improvement of our table and fireside enjoyments. By these means, we effected a very considerable retrenchment of our expenses.

"I then looked over my farm and manner of husbanding it, to see if I could not increase my income. By early rising, and being more strict in training my sons to business, I was able to supersede the necessity of hiring a man. I kept up my fences, disburdened my barn-yard of a quantity of manure, which had long lain useless, and scattered it over my fields, greatly to the improvement of the soil; was punctual to get my crops in at the proper season, and to harvest them before they were injured. By all these plans which I pursued with diligence the first year, I closed the crevices through which the little fountain of my wealth had been wasted, and at the same time, increased the stream of my income; I liquidated my debts, paid my taxes, supported my family better than before, and had something to give away besides.

"As God had prospered me so far, I felt it my duty to lay myself out still further for his glory, in cultivating my little farm. I therefore set off one-tenth of that part which was productive, about three acres, determined to cultivate it, and devote the proceeds to God. From this, I realized the first year, about one hundred dollars, which I appropriated to various objects of benevolence, and from the rest of my farm, I obtained more than ever I did from the whole, in any one year before. Since that time, I have enjoyed the luxury of doing good with any money, my family have been better supported than ever, blessed be God, all my children have become hopefully pious, one of them is studying for the ministry, and my house has been like the house of Obed-edom, where the ark rested."—Sabbath Miscellany.

On Straightness.

How frequently do we hear it remarked, by old and young, "I am going straight for Jesus." But it is to be feared, few of these understand what they say. Few realize what that expression means. Most that use it have only crude notions concerning Scriptural straightness. They do not consider the expense of being Scripturally straight; but make a few hasty vows, and pass along. The apostle says, "Consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be weary and faint in your minds." In order to escape fainting we must be filled with holy zeal. We may possess a correct theory, advocate Scriptural religion, be present and take an active part in every meeting; yet, if we have not the mind which was in Christ—are not steadfastly walking as Christ also walked, we cannot with propriety, be termed Scripturally straight. Our daily life has something to do with this matter. We must associate our profession with our life; otherwise our endeavors to instruct others will prove fatal. Our example speaks in thunder tones. We must not live unto ourselves, but unto Him who died for us, and rose again. We should live so that the people may know where to find us at all times. Be steadfast in the faith and practice of the gospel—"unmovable"—not discouraged by opposition or difficulties—"always abounding in the works of the Lord,"—doing something that will honor God and promote his cause.

Some run well for a season. When circumstances are favorable, and they meet with no opposition; when the church is in a flourishing condition, and the tares do not spring up, then they seem to prosper. By and by tribulation comes. Some one has circulated a false report—they give way to an evil spirit—impertinence creeps in—Christ is cast out—there is anger that flies at a word. What follows? Still they profess to be straight—claim to have more power than ever before; while their prayers and exhortations are as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. This is not Scriptural straightness. The Spirit of Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Ever humble—ever loving—ever patient. If we are his children we will possess his spirit. "For if any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." The enemy often comes as an angel of light; and through his influence some become censorious, mistaking this spirit for the spirit of straightness. It is a mistaken zeal that has no love connected with it. The child of God has a zeal—an energy inspired by the Holy Ghost, and a love accompanying it, which reaches the hearts of men. Let us remember, that, while we are to be true, faithful, and searching, we are to be humble, loving and patient, having a spirit that harmonizes with the spirit of Christ.

There is a class of individuals who style themselves preachers—professedly straight—who make the chief excellence of their preaching to consist in the eloquence of language. They deliver their sermons eloquently and containing words of truth. "What is lacking?" you ask. We answer, They lack the vital, the essential element—the power of God. Also they are not imitating the example of Paul. He says, "My speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." Why did he thus preach? "That your faith," he says, "should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." The apostle sought, not to become popular—not to rank among the great and the noble, but to save men. It was more than his meat and drink to do his Master's will. But, alas! how many professed preachers are seeking the applause of men, rather than the approval of their Maker. And the consequences are, the faith of the great mass is founded in human wisdom. May the Lord hasten the time when we shall have less man and more God-made preachers. Men who are independent thinkers—valiant hearted—not afraid to die—who will not confer with flesh and blood. Men who are so filled with Divinity, as to have the human utterly annihilated. If the ministry is lifeless, the people are apt to partake of their spirit, and be lifeless also. Like priests, like people. There are those who profess to be worshipping God, while no preparation whatever is made for him. Alas! with what eagerness is the present generation grasping after that soul-destroying sin—popularity. This only proves the truthfulness of the inspired words: "The ungodly shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." Beloved, beware! lest of us, as of the church in Sardis, it be said, "I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead."—Selected.

THERE is no room for indifference where the gospel is concerned—it is either the most astounding of impostures, or the most amazing of revelations: no man can safely remain undecided about it; it is too weighty, too solemn, to be snuffed at as a matter of no concern. Foes and friends alike confess that the mystery of godliness is great. It is no rippling rill of dogma, but a broad ocean of thought; no molehill of discovery, but an Alp of revelation; no single beam of light, but a sun shining in its strength.

Harry's Revenge.

MRS. SPENCER was sitting in her pleasant sewing-room, busily engaged in making a new summer suit of clothes for her only little boy, Harry, when she was interrupted by a sound of bitter crying, and words of sorrow from this same little boy. She put aside her work, and was hurrying from the room when the door opened and Harry came in. In his arms he held a little monkey, not much larger than a squirrel, dead and stiff. At first his sobs were so violent that he could not speak, and Mrs. Spencer, seeing his little pet dead, could easily understand his sorrow. Dick had been a present from his uncle, who brought him himself from South America, and had taught him quite a number of comical tricks; the little creature was very fond of his young master, and out of Harry's school hours the two were constant companions and playmates.

After the first violence of his grief was over, Harry spoke, often interrupted by tears, and with his anger rising at every word.

"John Pierce's Jack killed him, mamma. I will kill Jack the first chance I get."

"Oh! no, Harry. Jack is a dog, and it is his nature to kill little animals. You should not have put Dick in his way."

"I did not. I was in our own yard, when John went by. Jack never noticed Dick till John set him on, clapping his hands and hissing to him. Dick got frightened, and would not come to me, but ran across the yard, and John cheered at Jack, and he chased him and choked him. I'll kill him for it. I'll put a stone round his neck and drown him, and then we'll see how John likes to have his pet killed. O mamma! look at poor Dick. He'll never run to the gate to meet me when I come from school again. He loved me so much, and I loved him. O Dick! Dick!" and poor Harry sat down on the floor and cried again most bitterly, stroking the little animal, who could never again return his affection by his comical ways.

It was a child's sorrow, but it was very bitter, and Mrs. Spencer herself felt so indignant at the wanton cruelty that had caused it, that for a long time she could only try to comfort her little boy. But as Harry became quieter, and poor Dick was put into a little grave in the garden, Mrs. Spencer pointed out to him the sin of his angry, revengeful feelings.

"I am sure, by this time, John is as sorry for his thoughtless cruelty as you are, Harry," she said.

"I never hurt Jack," said Harry, "and I always let the other boys play with Dick. It was only last week we were talking of teaching Dick to ride on Jack's back. What do you think made John do so, mamma?"

"Perhaps he did not think the dog would hurt the monkey when they had been so much together."

"Perhaps that was it. I will try, mamma, not to feel so angry about it; but it does seem now as if I must kill Jack, or have some revenge."

"How will you try to conquer that feeling, my son?"

"I will say my prayers, mamma, and ask God to take the angry thoughts out of my heart."

"He will, Harry, if you try yourself to forgive John."

Mrs. Spencer was right in her thought that John did not realize the danger of setting his fiery little terrier on the monkey. It was not until he saw Harry going sobbing into the house with his little pet dead in his arms that he saw what pain his cruelty had caused. He went home with a sense of shame and discomfort that was worse than Harry's sorrow, for there was a self-reproach in his heart that he could not drive away. Too late he repented his act, and would have given the life of his own pet to have seen Dick sitting again on Harry's shoulder, cracking nuts and playfully throwing the shells at the boys. He soon found, too, that the school-boys felt Harry's grievance to be their own. Dick was a universal favorite, and everybody in the school blamed John for the comical little fellow's death. Worst of all was the loss of Harry's company.

"I do forgive him, mamma," Harry said, "but I don't want to play with him. I can't. It makes me feel wicked to see Jack following him, and jumping around him. I feel just as if I must kill him, and make John feel as bad as I do."

It was six months after Dick's little grave had been dug in the garden, and winter snows lay thick upon the ground, when one evening a fearful storm arose. Mrs. Spencer and Harry were in the cosey little sewing-room, puzzling over a difficult sum in algebra, when a low, piteous moaning near the outside door made them both start. In a moment, Harry was on his feet and running toward the door. He soon returned with a little snow-covered object in his arms.

"It is a poor little dog, mamma, who seems to have broken his leg, and he is half frozen."

"Poor fellow! Put him on this cushion, Harry, and get some warm milk from Hannah. I will wipe the snow off."

Dried, warmed, and fed, the poor dog held up his broken paw.

"Mamma," Harry said very gravely, "this is John's dog, Jack. I need not kill him myself, to have my revenge. If I only put him again just where I found him, he will die. See him lick my hand, as if he knew what I was saying."

Mrs. Spencer made no reply, only stroking the little dog's head with her soft, white hand.

"If I put him out again," continued Harry, "I wonder if John would feel as badly as I did when Dick was killed. Do you know you killed my pet, Jack? Don't you deserve to die for that? See how he looks at me, mamma, as if he was asking me to pity him. Do you think we could bind up his leg if I made some splints?"

"I think so, Harry."

"Well!" and the little boy drew a long, deep breath, "I will make them, and we will try."

For two days the storm kept every one indoors; the snow-drifts were so deep that no one in the village left the houses, excepting for necessary chores. But on the third day the sun came out again, and the boys were all busy clearing the paths and roads from the deep snow. School-time found them all assembled, and John's grave face soon attracted attention.

"What is the matter, John?" asked Harry.

"You will be glad enough to hear," was the somewhat sulky reply. "I have lost Jack. He ran away the night the storm came up, and I suppose he was lost in the snow."

"Oh! no, he wasn't," was Harry's cheerful reply.

"Yes, he was. He would have come home if he was alive."

"He didn't come home because he broke his leg. He came to our door, half frozen, and with a broken leg."

"I suppose you turned him out again, or killed him, you seem to feel so good about it," said John.

"Of course he did," said one voice.

"Served you right!" said another.

"Who killed poor Dick?" cried a third.

"I did not turn him out or kill him," said Harry gently. "Mamma and I bound up his leg, and nursed him and fed him. He is almost well now, John, so you can take him home whenever you are ready."

There was a moment of deep silence among the group of boys. Then John gave a deep, choking sob.

"I don't deserve it, Harry," he said. "But I have been as sorry about Dick as you were."

And this was all the revenge Harry ever had.—The Methodist.

A Bible View of Hell:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

All names of persons sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the Post Office, County and State must be given, and written plainly, and if a change is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

A REMINISCENCE.

IN 1841—thirty years since—we published our first work on Immortality; which was "Three Letters," written to a prominent minister of the Methodist E. Church. Those Letters drew out the Editor of a Universalist paper in the village of Montpelier, Vt., where we were then residing, and several articles passed between us, in his paper. The following, which was "No. 4," on our part, we give as a reminiscence of the past, and as showing how far we had advanced at that time:

DEAR SIR:—I shall now notice your inquiry contained in the following words:

"Does Mr. S. suppose that to 'seek for Immortality,' means to seek to purchase, merit or secure immortality for ourselves, or does it not rather mean to seek to ascertain whether God has designed us for immortality?"

I do not suppose that sinning men can "purchase" immortality; nor do I believe man could have done this if he had never sinned. I have no doubt, immortality would have been as really the gift of God if men had remained holy as it will now. It is not possible for a creature to purchase, properly speaking, any thing of his Creator; because, all he has, he has received from him, and therefore can not pay him with that which belongs to God. But all this does not touch the question. The question is, does God, or does he not, make the gift of certain blessings dependent upon something to be done by us; not to purchase, but as a condition, without which, he will not give the offered benefit?

That this is the case, with regard to some of the things of this life, every man must admit. God has given to us being without anything performed by us in order to our coming into life; and, for the obvious reason that till life was given we could do nothing. But is it not just as evident, that when God has given us life, or being, that man must actively use that life in labor for food to sustain life, or he must die, notwithstanding it be admitted that his Creator has power to preserve the life he has given, though man should refuse to labor at all? What would be thought of the man who, when he is commanded to 'work' or else 'neither shall he eat,' if he should reply, 'I cannot purchase food of my Creator; and when the apostle says, 'If any will not work neither shall he eat,' all he means, is, that I should 'seek to ascertain whether God has designed me to have food or not?' Would you not reply—God has promised, seed time and harvest, and you must work or starve. Though God has given you life, the sun to warm the earth, and the soil itself, yet he will not give you bread, unless you use those primary, or first blessings, according to his appointment; neither his goodness, power nor mercy will save you from famine if you will not work.

Now, though God has given us some great primary spiritual blessings, such as, His Son to die for us—the day of grace, in which we are blessed with the merciful visitation of His Spirit, etc., does it follow, that all other blessings will be given, even to those who make no effort, not to purchase, but to secure the offered benefits? Will it not rather be an aggravation of our guilt that God held up to our acceptance eternal life, on the simple conditions of repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, followed by a holy life unto death, according to the promise of our Saviour, 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give you a crown of life?' And does not the promise itself clearly imply, that if these things are not done the 'crown of life' shall not be given?

I know it is said, this is salvation by works. In reply, first,—It is not by the merit, properly speaking, of works, but by works as a condition. A man by labor, literally, does not, before God, merit food, or the fruits of the earth—they are the gifts of the God of providence but suspended on man's industry. So, by doing all that God has commanded, we do not purchase, or properly speaking, merit immortality—it is the gift of the God of grace, but suspended on man's obedience to the requirements of the gospel. This, I think, I can make plain. I say to a child—'Bring me that apple, and I will give you a thousand silver dollars.' The child sees at once that he will not have the money unless he complies with the condition; and when he has brought me the apple, and I have fulfilled my promise, does he depart with his treasure and say, I purchased it? Not at all. He says, "Mr. Storrs gave it to me." But, one inquires, 'Did you not have to do something to get it?' 'Yes,' says the child, 'I carried him an apple, but that's nothing to this great treasure.'

That is—the work performed bore no comparison with the benefits bestowed; and, the child's mind perceives it, and hence never thinks to mention the condition upon which the gift was imparted; though, he knows if he had not performed the specified work the thousand dollars would not have been bestowed upon him. I hardly need make the application. God gives eternal life; a great and invaluable blessing; an eternal weight of glory. It would be blasphemy to say that the sinner purchased it, and yet it cannot be possessed without complying with the conditions specified in the gospel.

The latter part of your question, which I quoted at the commencement of this article, viz., Does to seek for immortality not rather mean to seek to ascertain whether God has designed us for immortality? reminds me of the difficulty those persons find themselves involved in, who believe in the doctrine of unconditional election of certain persons to eternal life, when pressed with the text, 'Give diligence to make your calling and election sure:' that is, say they, 'make it sure unto yourselves.'

'Life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel;' it requires no great seeking to ascertain this fact with the Bible before us, however the heathen 'Philosophers' were puzzled about it. But, let it be observed that seeking for immortality by searching the Scriptures, though proper in itself, is not the seeking that the apostle speaks of. Let us hear him.

'God will render to every man according to his deeds; to them who, by patient continuance in' [what? seeking after it in the Bible? no—but in] 'well doing, seek for—immortality,' etc., 'but to them who do not obey the truth' [not to those, who do not seek to ascertain whether God designed them for immortality] 'indignation and wrath,' etc.; just the opposite of immortality; and, of course, it appears to me, they perish.

You have illustrated by referring to a 'will and testament,' and I like the reference. Now an inheritance by will may be given conditionally or *un*conditionally according to the pleasure of the donor; or, a part of the inheritance may be given in one way and a part in the other. If any part is given conditionally, no matter how small the condition, if it is the payment of one dollar only, that sum must be paid or the inheritance given fails. Now, I admit that God has willed to all men eternal life; but I deny, that he has willed to any man eternal life unconditionally. It seems to me the conditions are as clearly expressed as it is possible for language to describe them. They are such, thank the Lord, as all may, and by the favor of God all men can comply with; but they no more purchase eternal life by this compliance, than the man purchases an estate of a million of dollars willed to him, by paying the dollar specified in that will, though he could not inherit unless he paid that dollar. You inquire:

"But, if God has not bequeathed the free gift of Immortality or eternal life to all, I ask, why is it to be preached to all for the obedience of faith? Why are all called upon to believe, that God has given them eternal life, and how does the unbeliever charge God with a lie by disbelieving that God has given eternal life? See 1 John v. 10, 11. If God has not, in his purpose, given eternal life to the unbeliever, then, is not the unbeliever called upon to believe a falsehood, when he is called upon to believe that God has given him eternal life and this life is in his Son? Will Mr. S. answer me these questions?

I appeal to your candor, if I have not given an answer to the foregoing questions? You have here admitted one of the conditions for which I contend, viz., that 'all are called upon to believe, etc., and you admit also that the unbeliever charges God with a lie by not believing, etc. I, on my part, have admitted, that God has given eternal life to all; but, he has given it conditionally, so that he who hath not the Son of God, by faith, hath not this life; and, continuing in his unbelief, he "shall not see life," which implies, to my mind, most clearly, that he shall perish, cease to be, or "be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord." Let us recollect the testimony of inspiration, that "faith works by love" that it "purifies the heart"—that it "overcometh the world"—and that "without works" it "is dead:" hence, no faith can be of any avail, for eternal life, that does not bear this stamp, or divine impression.

Yours for the Truth,
GEO. STORRS.

ALMOST ADVENTISM.

"THE New York Herald" had an editorial last week Tuesday which, if it had gone one step farther, must have been pronounced genuine Adventism. We like such articles better, though in a secular paper, than much that comes from avowed Adventists. We have no doubt the following from the editorial referred to will interest most of our readers:

THE COMMUNE AT LAST EXTINGUISHED—THE CHAOTIC CONDITION OF EUROPE—WHAT IS TO BE THE RESULT?

We live in times which for their revolutionary character have had few parallels in the world's history. The Deluge, the Exodus, the Captivity, the fall of Babylon, the destruction of Jerusalem, the collapse of the Roman empire, the Crusade outburst, the Reformation, the first French Revolution, the great discoveries in California and Australia, our great civil war—these are the grand historic epochs of which we are forcibly reminded by the events which are now taking place in France, and, indeed, all over Europe. The latest sensation is the extinction of the Paris Communists—the men who have revived the Vandalism of the barbarians of the North who destroyed the Roman empire, and who have re-enacted the worst scenes of the first French Revolution. Paris is once more in the hands of the representatives of order, and the heart of the world is gladdened at the prospect of France being restored to herself.

At the same time we feel it to be impossible to look at the events of which Paris is still the scene to consider the wretched condition of France, and, indeed, the condition of Europe generally, without pausing and asking the question, whether the end of another historic epoch has not been reached, and whether the fearful predictions of the bards and seers of ancient Israel are not now, to a large extent, at least, being fulfilled? Certainly, so far as Papal Rome and imperial France—the mother and the eldest son—are concerned, the vials of Divine wrath are being emptied. Which of the seals is being opened we know not. Most, certainly, however, there has been a great earthquake; there has been no lack of blood and fire and vapor of smoke; and there are not a few to whom the sun has become black as sackcloth of hair and the moon as blood. If the heavens have not departed as a scroll and the mountains been moved from their places, it has to be admitted that the kings of the earth, and the great men and the rich men, and the chief captains and the mighty men, have been made to tremble. The Papacy, the most ancient of all existing European monarchies, the power which more than any other has given shape and character to our Christian civilization, is now the dependent of Italy. France, whose pride it has been for many generations to be the protector of the Chair of St. Peter, has fallen, and to all appearance fallen forever. Austria, too, so long a main pillar of the Papacy, is, with the whole of South Germany at her back, on the verge of a great religious revolution similar to that which shook the world in the sixteenth century. Italy and Spain struggle into new life, but the new life wanders away from its ancient religious centre. The empire of Charlemagne, of Otho, of the Great Frederick, after the lapse of many years, has been revived; but in the restored empire there is no place provided for the spiritual Chief before whom of old kings trembled and haughty emperors bowed the knee. In the Holy Roman empire the theory was—and the practice was all along more or less consistent with the theory—that the imperial crown was the gift of the Vicar of Christ. Looking at the Papacy in connection with the restored German empire, and remembering the days of Hildebrand and Henry the Fourth, and the days of Alexander and Barbarossa, we cannot help exclaiming, how are the mighty fallen! It is not to be denied that the fall of the temporal power of the Papacy is one of the greatest historical events in many centuries. That the Holy Father is comfortably provided for we are satisfied; that as the spiritual chief of a large religious body he will continue to be useful we must admit; but the thunders of the Vatican will never again terrify the nations. Like the divine right of kings, the lofty pretensions of the Papacy must be abandoned forever. On France the Papacy has leaned for the last twenty years. With France it has fallen. With the collapse of France and the fall of the temporal power, the Latin or Roman nations have lost whatever they had of unity and strength. The star of empire shines in the northern sky.

Religious and political troubles are not wholly confined to the south of Europe. We have already alluded to the religious excitement which exists in Austria and South Germany. There are some who seem disposed to belittle the Dollinger movement. If Dr. Dollinger stood alone, it might be safe to do so. He is a man far advanced in life, and in the natural course of events he must soon pass away from the scenes of human strife. But he is not alone. He has the sympathy of the most intelligent Catholics, not in Germany alone, but all over the world. One of the latest addresses of sympathy which he received was from a body of priests in Naples—showing that outside of Germany he finds encouragement and support. Our readers have not forgotten the letter addressed to him by Father Hyacinthe. He is on the best of terms with the King of Bavaria and the imperial family of Austria. In spite of the excommunication he continues to lecture to the students, although for the present he wisely refrains from officiating at the altar. His associates in this movement, Dr. Friedrich, Dr. Schulte, Professor Huber, Dr. Michelis and others, are quite equal to Dr. Dollinger in learning and influence; and we are not permitted to doubt that were he recalled from these scenes his mantle would be caught by another Elisha. At the present moment the question is being vigorously discussed in Bavaria whether the decrees of the Vatican Council have not actually created a new religion, and consequently a religion contrary to the requirements of the Bavarian constitution. But what shall we say of Austria and her political difficulties? The condition of the Austrian empire is anything but satisfactory. She is doing her best to satisfy the peoples and yet to preserve the form of unity. Hungary has obtained autonomy; but Bohemia and some of the other sections clamor for what Hungary has won. Then, again, the German population of Austria proper fret at being shut out of the new German empire. The Hapsburg empire is anything but satisfactory. At best but a rope of sand, it may break up all of a sudden or be compelled to seek a new centre in Pesth. The prospects of Germany are no doubt bright; but signs are not wanting that much hard work must be gone through, and possibly some painful experience, before the new empire is consolidated. Too much as yet depends on the life of one man. Russia and Great Britain, strong as they are, peaceful and prosperous as they are, have much to dread from internal dangers and from foreign foes. Germany has become a kind of terror to them both. Englishmen are already dreaming dreams, and in imagination seeing the spiked helmet of the terrible Prussian on English soil. From the North Sea to the Mediterranean—from the Atlantic to the confines of Asia—there are everywhere signs of change—political and religious unrest. Men's minds are filled with wonder and alarm as they study and peer into the future.

What is to be the result? Is the Pope once again to be restored to his position as a temporal prince? Is the Hyacinthe and Dollinger movement to die as so many such movements have died—a natural death? Is France once more to fall under the heel of despotism? Or is the past to be entirely swept away and the departure made entirely new? To these questions we cannot say either "yea" or "nay." The possibilities are numerous—the probabilities few. Much depends on France. If M. Thiers can give to France a solid, strong, yet popular government, the revolutionary tide may be partially checked and a general European convulsion avoided. The fall of the Commune has given M. Thiers his opportunity. We do not say that he should recall the Emperor or restore the empire in any form, or that he should restore the Bourbons, younger or elder, or that he should insist upon the empire. His duty clearly is to consult the wishes of the French people, and, in conformity with these wishes, to set about the establishment of a government strong and likely to endure. This can only be done by calling upon the people to elect a new Assembly. Let President Thiers do this without delay; let it be distinctly understood that the new Assembly shall have the power to decide upon the future form of government, and whatever be the voice of the people—whether it calls for the Bonapartes, for the Bourbons or for a republic—let that voice be obeyed. Delay is dangerous. If the President does not show some vigorous activity in this direction Gambetta may leap into power, rally France around him and repeat the role of the First Napoleon. M. Thiers has behaved with so much firmness hitherto that he has a claim on our confidence; and the presumption is that with the fall of the Commune, France will find peace. It is not, however, permitted us to think that the restoration of order in France will undo what has been done during the last nine months. There is but small chance that it will restore the temporal power of the Papacy. It will not check the progress of liberalism in Italy and Spain. It will not stay the course of events in Austria. Most certainly it will not prevent Germany from reaping the full fruit of her glorious victories. If all our good hopes and good wishes should fail—if the end should yet be found to be afar off—we see for France and Europe a dark, dreary and desolate future. Let us rejoice that our lines have been cast in more pleasant places; and, while we sorrow for those who suffer, let us find comfort in the thought that out of all this chaos may come a better and wiser France—a nobler Europe.

Note by Editor of the Herald of Life.

The "one step farther," to which we referred, is to see that the "Kingdom of God" is nigh at hand, even as "the bards and seers of ancient Israel" have said, and Jesus, the rightful King of "this world," is at the door to take possession of His own throne and reduce earth to order, destroying all usurpers out of it, and causing "wars to cease to the ends of the earth," according to the promise of God.

THE WOMAN WHICH TESTIFIED.

BY REV. ISAAC M. SEE.

"And many of the Samaritans of that city believed on Him, for the saying of the woman which testified."—John iv. 39.

THE character of the persons with whom Jesus had communication was both little and much to Him. Little to hinder Him from His work. He would go among the vile as among princes, for it was much to bring them up and set them on high.

We need fear nothing in the Lord's business, but be bold, seeing who is with us, who makes our steps, and guards our way. Jesus boldly conversed with this woman of Samaria as though she lived among the best; for she had a soul to save, and was to be made an instrument for lasting good to others. She was ready for his words, and, when He had spoken them, to carry them to others. But she was a singular example of misapprehending Him. When she did go to tell the people, she knew nothing about His work or character. She saw He was a wonderful person, that He might do the people good.

The Samaritans were a hard people in religious matters. "The city Shekem became the metropolis of the Samaritans, and was inhabited by Gentiles mixed with apostate Jews." Their religion therefore was merely nominal; and we may imagine them as living far from God.

We must notice of this woman that she told what she knew of Jesus. It was very little indeed. We know more, vastly more, by reason of the treasures of Holy Writ, and the experience of our souls through his grace; and yet how little of Jesus does the nearest know. It will, however, be well if we do what the woman did—tell what we know. Now, what she knew, though very little, was enough to bring out crowds from the city of Sychar to see him, hear him, and probably be saved by him. Now, suppose we should make a practice of telling about Jesus all we know. God has clothed personal testimony with mighty power.

Utterances of the lips bear much increase. The Bible might be a sealed book, for multitudes would not trouble themselves to read it, and, when they do, they do not always understand it. When we tell it, they have a new illustration of it, and that helps to give them a life-view of truth. It becomes then not merely truth, but experimental truth; it lives and glows with power so as to catch the eye and enkindle the heart.

Now, what have we to tell about Jesus? Not merely that He told us all that ever we did, causing all our sins to pass before us, but He saved us. That word "saved" how much it means! Let none of those who have not really experienced its meaning affect to despise it. Saved—it means that our sins are forgiven, that through the precious blood of Jesus we have a right and title to all the privileges of adopted sons of God. A precious love feast can be had wherever believers meet. Each one would have a story to tell, and the telling of it would kindle in the company a flame of glowing praise.

And so we could go on one after another to make up a testimony before which the most eloquent sermons would seem powerless. There would be one difference between this woman's testimony and ours: she went and told all she knew about Jesus; we could not. It is not simply in regard to time that we should not be able to tell all we know of Jesus: the depths of his work in us we could not reach—the powers of sin He has slain; the powers of a holy life which He has quickened so that our whole being is renewed with life and immortality. Some of us could tell of Jesus as our full salvation, wherein we are lifted into conscious oneness with the will of God and the abiding sense of his continual presence, so that the ecstatic bliss of heaven is a frequent experience of our souls, though not in degree, yet in kind.

Your weightier testimony of a living Christ within shall bring souls to the cross. Many are waiting to hear you. They may not come until you go to them and bid them come. You may be a proper guide to Jesus for some, even though you yourself cannot see your peculiar adaptation. Now, then, comes the solemn question. Do you want to enter the pearly gates alone? Shall no white-robed ransomed soul be the fruit of your labor? Shall yours be the starless crown because none owes his or her salvation to your efforts? Nay, let me not be speaking as though the entrance for you into glory were to be purgatorial. You lovers of Jesus that dwell in his wounded side, will not enter heaven alone; there shall be with you the souls that have been given you. This and that man shall say, "I was born again by the instrumentality of such a one." Do not say, "Come to our church; you will be interested in our preacher." They might even be very much interested in your preacher, and yet sink into perdition. If this has been hitherto the lean character of your testimony, now tell them the beauties of your Jesus. Give them something from the well of living water in your own heart. If it be only a word that you can speak, say that word; it may be the word ordained in the wisdom of God to save that soul.

Private testimony is good—is sometimes best. Go, speak privately everywhere. But there is a place where we are called upon to speak out. These latter days have been marked by a more general fulfilment of the promise of the Father than has been had since Pentecost. At Pentecost, Peter standing up told the wondering multitude: "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel: And it shall come to pass in the last days (saith God), I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams; and on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit, and they shall prophesy."—Acts ii. 16–18. Why then should not the dear people of the Lord, male and female, hold themselves in readiness on every hand to declare his doings in their souls in the place of worship? It is his will. Let our meetings resound with his praise. Let the spirit of criticism be hushed, and its mouth be turned to declare the doings of the Lord in the great congregation. Yea, let every mouth be open to say, "I will declare what He hath done for my soul." We are not to despise any of the Lord's little ones, or any of their honest testimony. Jesus can make it all tell, and He will. Let it be little or much from little hearts, fired with holy zeal, whose only aim is to keep the ego (I) out and to praise the Lord. The Lord will give that increase and will never frown upon it. The testimony of this woman did her good. And this in two days: 1. Personally. She was communicating with one who could truly benefit her and all others. It exalted her above her usual life to tell of Jesus. And so she herself was blessed in it.

2. Besides, this woman gained friends. Many were glad to be told by her of the presence of Jesus, and probably it was the commencement of new friendships, which, with grace received, strengthened into strong attachments, and which possibly are now glowing in eternal freshness and joy. If you desire to make fast friends, do it by the name of Jesus. Those who love Him much will stick to you closer than a brother. If you desire to make loose friends fast, do it by the name of Jesus. This makes good husbands, good wives, good sons and daughters, and fathers and mothers and neighbors.

If you desire good friends, whose souls shall glow with love and whose words shall be like precious stones for benefit to you and yours, lead them to Jesus, the fountain of wisdom.

Go, tell them that Jesus is at the well, and that He has living water to give. Tell them what is true, that He told us all that ever we did. And they shall come and believe Him; and both by our word and by his grace (glory be to God that He makes the two work together) they shall be friends with Jesus, stars in your crowns, a generation to serve the Lord. And our fellowship with those not strangers shall be enrapturing on earth.

"And if our fellowship below
In Jesus be so sweet,
What heights of rapture shall we know,
When round His throne we meet."

FROM ELD. SAMUEL L. WALTER.

BR. STORRS: I am again at home, after an absence of over sixteen weeks, in which time, I have seen much for which to praise my heavenly Father. Truth is advancing; the advocates of error are dumbfounded; and for want of argument, resort to holding us up as objects of contempt; calling us Infidel, Universalist, Soul-sleepers, etc., in order to get up prejudice against us. I will give the case of a M. E. Local Preacher, who sent a challenge to Br. S. J. Branson, to discuss the topic, "That the wicked will be raised to life and eternal suffering." He sent to Br. S. J. B., that he "only wanted fifteen minutes to confound him." They met on the 22d of April. The M. E. Preacher, when he found Br. S. J. B., there, and ready to discuss the subject, backed out, and said that if I would preach he would follow me. The house was full to overflowing. I took for my subject: What did Christ come into the world for? Ans. To deliver His sheep from perishing in death. "And that they (his sheep) may have life, and that they may have it more abundantly;" or, life more excellent; and not to save from Messrs. Benson, or Watts, or Spurgeon's hell. No, but to give life without a liability to die, and give a glorious victory over death. I presented a life crowned with an eternal weight of glory; and death, "the wages of sin." The Methodist Preacher replied; or, rather, never attempted to reply to any thing that was said, but said that the extracts which I read from the Bible View of hell, from Benson, Watts and Spurgeon, were not true, but only got up for effect by these soul-sleepers, etc. He assumed that God could not be just if He did not eternally torment the sinner. He occupied half an hour in telling us what he assumed, without one thus saith the Lord, for any thing assumed. The rich man and Lazarus came like a thunder-clap. This is no parable. He said, parables say, "It is like." Here it says, "There was a certain rich man," etc. Said he, if this is a parable, it is a lie, and a great big lie. He said, that if death was all the punishment, and he believed it, he would take his fill of sin, and be as big a sinner as could be found, if he could keep out of the way of the officers of justice. When dead he would take a comfortable sleep; that would satisfy him as well as deathless life. He was the robber or any thing that would satisfy such a soulless soul, etc.

Br. S. I. B., followed with some cutting remarks on "the rich man," etc., and asked him, if the water was literal water. The M. E. Preacher replied, "Lager Beer." How low it sinks a man thus to answer. I told him that he did not serve God from principle, but fear, and that he had sunk below the beasts that perish. O, how the cause of Christ suffers from such lovers of sin, who can't see any thing in God's love, or in virtue, to induce them to seek life by a resurrection from the dead.

The next day I spoke twice. The night meeting was disturbed by some of the sons of Belial. They talked quite loud about knocking me down. A young man heard what was said, and told them if they would come out doors he would tan their mean hides. But they were afraid. I went on my way home without fear or molestation. I advised them to let Cæsar execute his own laws; that our Father will take care of us all. Here ended my labors in Wayne Co., Ill. I was sorry to leave, because the people had become anxious and willing to hear Bible truths. I pray that truth may triumph gloriously. God grant it for Christ's sake. I intend to go back as soon as I can do some work to raise the means to pay my liabilities. I believe the Lord will open my way.

The door to preach the word of life is opening, and the people say, Come to our place. Br. S. I. Branson writes me that he met Mr. West, the champion of Juka, Marion Co., Ill., at Donohow Prairie, on the 29th of April. The debate lasted six hours. Subject: Double entity; or man has an immortal soul; and that all will be raised to life. West affirmed. Branson denied. The crowd said, West was routed, and went home defeated. I expect to hear that he is a convert to the faith he has been opposing. I am sure he will if he reads the tracts I left with him: they tell on the sincere inquirer after truth.

I am trying to do something about home. I preached at Centerville last first day. I shall try and hold meetings in this neighborhood whilst I am at home. I ask all to pray that good may be done, and God glorified. I shall try to go and help Br. J. Lewis, at Mode, if I can.

I am sorry that our HERALD is trammelled so that it can't speak out on "the promise and oath of God to Abraham." I hope it will be for the best.

I was made glad this morning by the receipt of a letter from a Br. beloved, whom I have never seen, that I know of. I read it: tears came to my eyes, and I thought that dear Br., had no need to come to Bunker Hill to see that I needed help. He wrote: "Dear Brother: Enclosed $10 for the Master's glory. Yours, awaiting." I know God will bless him with every good, for this life and that which is to come. I pray that his doing and waiting may be crowned with glory and honor in God's kingdom.

BUNKER HILL, ILL., May 22, 1871.

THE LOVELY ONE.

HUMAN nature presents its fairest aspect to the distant eye. Nearness dissipates its fancied beauty, and leaves a form of little power to attract. Many of the most distinguished for greatness or goodness suffer loss of reputation by familiar intercourse. The noble mien of the statesman lowers to the base grovelling of the sensualist. The majestic bearing of Truth's ambassador degenerates to the levity of a man of pleasure. The yearning compassion of the philanthropist appears a selfish itching for public fame. But the capability of our nature for the attainment of dignity and purity of character, is demonstrated by the model—the man Christ Jesus.

He was the fairest among ten thousand, and the one altogether lovely. Facing the throng, proclaiming the gracious words of his mission, or silencing the cavils of wicked men, you saw the dignity of his manhood, the glory of his divinity. Nor less attractive was he when by the well of Jacob he sat talking with the woman of Samaria. His public walks and private ways alike command our admiration. Upon the stormy lake, tossed by the wild wind's fury, stilling it with a word, you feel the kindling of enthusiasm, and an involuntary desire to worship. While beside the grave of his friend, and in sight of the sisters, you see the heaving bosom and the falling tear showing how much he loved him, your melting heart overflows with sweet affection.

The triumph of his fame as the one altogether lovely, is now complete and universal. Friends and foes of Christianity alike agree. The one who is adored by the believer is also eulogized as a model of perfection by the skeptic. That prophecy of himself which he uttered long ago, is even now in an important sense fulfilled. "And I, when I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." And how earnestly should we draw near to contemplate his character, who is the desire of nations—the perfection of beauty—the praise of the whole earth.

ELD. H. ROCKWELL, from West Winsted, Conn., writes: I am in comfortable health. I arrived here last night (May 25), intending to visit the graves of my family; but as I am wearing out, my strength failing and the life current swiftly ebbing out, I know not but I shall forget for what I came. O, I hope never to forget God, or the way of life.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, JUNE 7, 1871.

CAMPAIGN DOCUMENTS.

THE largest portion of the stereotype plates on which these works are printed are our private property, procured by us before the HERALD OF LIFE came into being. These plates have been used for the issue of tracts and Campaign Documents, for near eight years, without our making scarcely any charge therefor: only by our so doing could the works have been afforded at the low rate they have been, or supplied so gratuitously, as thousands of them are. Necessity will compel us hereafter to charge a reasonable sum for the use of our stereotype plates, unless the friends of the Tract Cause choose to purchase them of us.

We shall not, at present, increase the price to purchasers of the Campaign Documents, except on three of our works; the "SIX SERMONS," to 18 cents: "MAN'S DESTINY; or, Review of Dr. Post, to 18 cents; and LIFE FROM THE DEAD," etc., to 10 cts. These are Nos. 1, 9 and 22 of the Campaign Documents.

PROPHECY AND THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

SOME may wonder that we say no more on these topics. One principal reason is, we wish not to seem even to countenance a state of excitement, which we believe to be an injury to true piety. We have seen too much of this in the last thirty years to be easily drawn into that state in which nearly all definite time-setters are found. The tendency of nearly all who make the advent the chief matter of their preaching or writing is to run into a "definite time" setting for the event; and that is followed too often, with an uncharitable spirit toward all who do not accept their time conclusions. We know enough of such things to wish to keep clear of such a result, believing it neither promotes piety nor a preparation to meet the Lord. We have no faith in any of the calculations about the "definite time" of the conclusion of the present age, based on figures; but we are settled that the end is not very distant. Everything in the Eastern world indicates the overthrow of the "harlot woman," or the downfall of "mystic Babylon;" which event is closely connected with the second advent of Christ to reign on the earth and over the nations.

Let us all watch and pray, and not suffer ourselves to be carried into any whirlpool of excitement, whether it comes from politicians, speculators, or religionists of any class or character. A calm faith in God our Saviour, and resting in him as our hope and joy, is what we all most need to fit us for the coming events, now evidently "nigh at hand." Let us all strive to cultivate the meek and lowly character of our blessed Lord. So shall it be well with us when he calls us to himself, though it may be through fiery trials.

"PENALTY FOR SIN."

WHAT is it? "Death." What is death? It is a state, a condition, in which the once living are no longer alive; life is extinct. The circumstances which brought about that state have nothing to do with the state itself. It is the state itself that is the wages of sin, or penalty for sin. No matter how the person came in that condition; refusing or neglecting to believe in Christ, when made known to him as God's appointed LIFE-GIVER, daeth holds him under its dominion. "The law of sin and death" holds its empire over him; and unless he is a believer in Jesus, he cannot be redeemed from death. God has only one appointed medium of deliverance to those who have had made known to them the way of life, and that is, "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus." Faith in Christ brings us under this law, and by that law "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies." He that neglects this medium of life, when made known to him, remains under the law of sin and death, and he remains there by his own act; he is not left in death for Adam's sin, but for his own, in refusing God's way out of death. The wages of sin is not dying, but being held in death.

This relying on the idea, that because men die in consequence of Adam's sin, and not for their own, and that therefore they must be made alive to die again for their own is a mere play upon words, without recognizing the fact that it is not dying, but death—a state without life—which is the wages of sin. Ten thousand times dying would not meet the penalty unless death holds him; and once in death the penalty can claim no more than to maintain its dominion unbroken over him. That such is the teaching of the Bible, with regard to all who have had the good news of Christ as a LIFE-GIVER proclaimed to them, is clear to our mind.

"HOW SHALL I ACT?"

A YOUNG man convinced of the truth of the Life views, tells us he is in trial, because his friends are grieved at the idea that he should leave the orthodoxy of the sect in which he had been educated. Before him he has the prospect of some eminence in the ministry. The parents are full of entreaties, to persuade their son not to cast himself away by avowing such unpopular views, and entreat him to keep in the old paths wherein they have so carefully and prayerfully educated him. In these circumstances he asks, whether he ought to renounce his new views out of respect to his parents, or whether he ought to go forward embracing the truth and reducing it to practice, notwithstanding the affliction of his parents?

We answer, we know of no consideration that can justify a person in going contrary to his own views of truth and duty. According to the doctrine of Christ, we ought to go contrary to every one, rather than go contrary to our own convictions, or our own consciences. A young man circumstanced as our friend appears to be, should do everything to meet the views and wishes of his parents that he can do with a good conscience; but he ought on no account to do violence to his own conscience. Let our friend give every proof of respect and affection to his parents that he can consistently with his views of Christian truth and duty, and then let him leave the rest with God. If we are never to give up old errors, and set ourselves against long standing errors and superstition, till our parents and wives, and other friends and kinsfolk give us their consent, we may be slaves for ever. If we are never to advance in the knowledge of truth, till our friends and kindred give us their consent, we may never increase in knowledge at all. Where would the reforming efforts of Jesus have been, if he had allowed himself to be influenced by his relations and friends? Even his disciples themselves savored not the things that were of God, but the things which were of men; and if Christ had hearkened to their counsels, he would have shrunk from death, and left the glorious work to which his Father had appointed him unfinished. If we wish to have eternal life, or if we wish to be the means of life to others; if we wish to see a Christian reformation; if we wish to see error, and craft, and profligacy, succeeded by truth, and purity, and joy, we must rise above every influence but a regard to truth and righteousness, and be content to lose the respect and affection of every friend or relative on earth.

We have had too much temporizing; there has been too much endeavoring to accommodate the views and wishes of friends and relations. It is time to act on a higher and nobler principle. Parents should not be encouraged to expect their children to prefer their will to the will of God, and friends should not be encouraged to expect their friends to buy their favor at the expense of truth and conscience. It is time to let all men know that we can accept neither friendship, nor wealth, nor reputation, as the price of our spiritual freedom, or of the approbation of our conscience and our God. If people can love us and befriend us with the understanding that we judge and act in all things for ourselves, as the servants of God alone, and not of men, we can accept their love and friendship with delight; but if they cannot love us or befriend us unless we can give up our judgment or our conscience and make their will or their opinions our law, then we must forego their love and friendship, and be content to have our nearest relatives our foes. These are our views; and we accordingly advise our friend, and we advise all who may be placed in similar circumstances, to be faithful to the truth, to be faithful to that God who has revealed the truth to their minds; and to be content to suffer the loss of all things rather than be unfaithful to the truth for a single moment.

And we are persuaded if they follow this advice, that they will find great reason to rejoice in having done so in the end. That which is right, will always have the best results. Whether we wish to promote the welfare of our friends, or the spread of truth, or to secure our own advantage, we ought always to be faithful to the truth. We can gain nothing worth having, by complying with the will of friends in opposition to the truth; and we can lose nothing worth keeping, by unbending, unflinching adherence to principles. Be faithful to truth, to conscience, to God, and all things will work for your good.

AN ASSUMPTION OF A D. D.

"'Fear not them which can kill the body but cannot kill the soul.' Man cannot kill the soul. But if it is one with the body, any man can kill it. There is no such thing in the universe as a dead soul."

IGNORANT as this D. D., says we are of Hebrew and Greek, we think we know enough to comprehend the fact that he does not possess the attribute of omniscience, and therefore there may be such a thing somewhere in the universe as a dead soul. If he will turn to Rev. xvi. 3, he will find testimony that "every living soul in the sea died." Then there must have been such a thing as a dead soul. Should he say, "That means the fishes and whales died," we reply that they were souls, and they died. If he understands Hebrew and Greek, he knows that the principal word in Hebrew for soul is Nephesh, and that the only word in Greek for soul is Psuche. In the Hebrew we find the expression dead nephesh—dead soul—of not unfrequent occurrence, though our translation does not always suffer that fact to appear, but a D. D., should not attempt to conceal it. The Greek term psuche is primarily and properly expressive of life, though our translators have sometimes rendered it life, and at other times soul. Of this Dr. Clarke complains, particularly in Math. xvi. 25, 26. If our D. D., maintains a nephesh or psuche cannot be killed by man, yet he must admit that God is able to destroy both soul (psuche) and body; for so the remainder of the text declares, from which he quoted partially. Besides, if souls cannot be killed by men, in some sense, will our friend tell us how we are to understand the record, Joshua x. where in the overthrow of certain cities, it is said six times, with slight variations, "All the souls that were therein he utterly destroyed!" That looks as if men might kill some souls! Will he say, That means he destroyed their persons. Agreed. So soul sometimes means person, or personality. Now whose person, or personality, cannot men kill or destroy? Or, of whose persons or personality did Jesus speak in the text under consideration? Was it the soul or person of all men, or of a certain specific class of men? Luke introduces the words thus, "I say unto you, my friends;" and Matthew shows that it was in a discourse with the disciples, and to fortify them against apostacy under their coming suffering, that Jesus spake the words under consideration. They express a fact, viz.: That man cannot extinguish their personality, or deprive His followers of life, so as to destroy or deprive them of that future and eternal life which he promised; but that God was able to do both—therefore fear not them who kill the body [deprive you of life now] but are not able to kill the soul (or extinguish your personality); for whosoever shall lose his life—psuche—for my sake shall find it." Compare Matt. x. 28, and Luke xii. 4, 5, with Matt. xvi. 25.

The text, then, gives no countenance to the assumption of an entity in man, called the soul, that survives in a state of consciousness when the man is dead; but it does give the glorious hope to the followers of Christ, that however they may be tortured by men, even unto death, their personality shall be maintained by God, and they shall be raised up to an endless life at the last day. But it is also a warning that if they deny Christ, and apostatize under their sufferings, God will do that which man cannot do—destroy both soul and body—extinguish their being, their personality—forever: therefore fear Him, and not men who have no such power.

IMMORTALITY as an offered benefit, through Jesus Christ, is the most powerful motive to a life of holiness, and devotion to God, that can be thought of. This motive the notion of inherent immortality entirely removes from man, and thus deprives him of a mighty influence for good. This consideration writes condemnation on the popular view of immortality, and makes it justly chargeable with being the betrayer and destroyer of men. It wrests from their hands the most powerful engine that infinite wisdom has provided to lead men to "seek for honor, glory, immortality, eternal life." Can any reflecting mind believe that God is the author of a doctrine whose legitimate result is to abrogate all the promises of a future and endless life? Can we believe that God has sworn by himself that he has "no pleasure in the death of the wicked," and yet has so constituted man that his death is an impossibility? What mockery thus to address man, if he is, by his constitution deathless. Let the truth be proclaimed that deathlessness is an object to be secured and that it can only be secured through Jesus; and hence a union with him is essential to this end; which end is only arrived at by having our "fruit unto holiness." Such is God's order to arrive at immortality. Let men beware of all attempts to "climb up" some other way, to an endless life, than that which the King of glory has opened; for all such attempts will prove a failure. "There is none other name given under heaven whereby men can have life" except the name of Jesus. All the honor of bestowing eternal life or immortality must be given to him, or we are a "thief and a robber."

"NOT SATISFIED."

SOME people suppose because they are "not satisfied" with the exposition of a text, or with the defence of a doctrine, that therefore it is not true; and they return with the same objections and the same texts and demand that we give them some other argument or explanation. The man that undertakes to "satisfy all objectors," will find he has engaged in a hopeless task. Inveterate prejudices, traditionary ideas, and the pride of one's own opinion, all or either of them, form a battlement or shield that it is next to impossible to overcome; and however strong we may attack their position, they have determined "never to surrender." Like the ancient Jews they want additional evidence, till they cry out, "Come down from the cross and we will believe." It is impossible to reach such minds by any amount of evidence: they are not to be convinced; and it is useless to spend time arguing with them; though they may think, because you determine not to spend your time in such a course, you cannot "come down from the cross" on which they fancy they have fixed you. The direction of our Lord on one occasion, is the only course to be taken with such persons after we have candidly presented our views, viz., "Let them alone." Keep to our work, if satisfied ourselves, that God has called us to it, and not waste time in repeating to the same persons arguments which you know they are "not satisfied" with. We are, happily, not obliged to satisfy everybody; and the task is hopeless. Proclaim what you regard to be the truth of God and leave the matter with Him. "What if some do not believe?" It has always been so, and always will be, to the end of this age.

The above has been our course with some cavillers with our views on the life theme. It is manifest to us that they have had sufficient evidence if they were in a state of mind to be benefitted by evidence; and we might as well spend time to convince some rejectors of the Bible, itself, that the Book is given us of God to guide us in the way of life: they will not believe. "Let them alone," then, and leave them to their own master.

With sincere inquirers after truth—and it is generally easy to discern who are such by the spirit they manifest—we are to have all patience, and give them, if need be, "line upon line;" but at a certain point, it is best sometimes to leave them to digest what has already been said, rather than to multiply words with them.

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

"I knew a man in Christ about fourteen years ago, (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth:) such an one caught up to the third heaven."—1 Cor. xii. 2.

In order to press this text into the service of their theory, advocates of inherent immortality assume that Paul is not talking in verse 2 of what he directs attention to in verse 1. This assumption, we are free to affirm, is equally bold and unwarrantable. Says the Apostle, verse 1, "I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord." Of the expression, I will come to visions, Dr. Adam Clarke remarks: "Symbolical representations of spiritual and celestial things; in which matters of the deepest importance are exhibited to the eye of the mind."

Paul gives account of a certain item of his experience, as follows: "And it came to pass, that when I was come again to Jerusalem, even while I prayed in the temple, I was in a trance."—Acts xxii. 17. It is, of course, impossible to say with certainty whether this is the occurrence of which Paul speaks in his second epistle to the Corinthians, but we deem it not unreasonable to suppose such is the case, for there is evidence that he was in Jerusalem about the time that he says he had the vision and revelation.

It is generally believed that the second epistle to Corinth was written A. D. 57. Fourteen years back (I knew a man in Christ about fourteen years ago) would be A. D. 43, just about the time that Paul and Barnabas were sent from Antioch as bearers of "relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea." Thus it is not improbable that the vision which he had in the temple, while in trance state, is that to which he refers. This opinion was entertained by Dr. Benson, Dr. Adam Clarke, and Dr. Priestly, the last of whom remarks: "Paul did not know whether he was carried up into the third heaven, or whether it was only a vision. That it was a vision, is much the most probable."

Rev. Thomas Belsham, in his notes on the epistles of Paul, writes thus:

"Here we may observe, that though through modesty the apostle conceals his name, yet it is plain from the connexion, that he could mean no one but himself who was thus highly favored. And further, that the whole was probably a visionary scene; and that by the expression, in the body or out of the body, he does not mean to decide any thing concerning the metaphysical nature of the soul, and a state of intermediate existence, but merely to say, that the expression was so vivid that he could not ascertain whether it was a real fact, or a scenic representation supernaturally exhibited to his mind. We may be well satisfied that it was the latter; because there is no such place as that which the gross philosophy of the Jews called the third heaven.... Paul imagined himself transported into the third heaven; but this no more proves the existence of such a place, than the representations impressed upon the imagination of Isaiah, Ezekiel, and John, are proofs of the real external existence of those places which they saw in vision. Paul saw and heard what he was either not permitted, or not able, to describe. It is therefore vain and useless to form any conjecture upon the subject. There can be no doubt that it answered the purpose intended, of strengthening the apostle's mind, extending his views, confirming his faith, and improving his qualifications for his apostolic office."

Mr. George affirms of the passage under consideration: "This clearly teaches that there is a conscious entity which can exist in the body or out of the body." In contrast to this assertion we quote from Dr. Clarke, who says: "That the apostle was in an ecstacy or trance, something like that of Peter, Acts x. 9, there is reason to believe; but we know that, being carried literally into heaven, was possible to the Almighty. But as he could not decide himself, it would be ridiculous in us to attempt it." We agree with the Dr., though we should hardly have felt willing to speak so plainly of the affirmation noted. That it is possible to the Almighty to carry people literally to heaven, the experience of Enoch, of Elijah, and of our Saviour fully attest. Peter also "fell into a trance, and saw heaven opened." Did a spirit-entity leave the body, and go to heaven and see it open? Certainly not; but he saw in the trance vision "a certain vessel descending unto him."

"And it came to pass . . . as I sat in mine house, and the elders of Judah sat before me, that the hand of the Lord God fell upon me. And he put forth the form of an hand, and took me by a lock of mine head; and the Spirit lifted me up between the earth and the heaven, and brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem."—Ezek. viii. 1–3. The prophet was not taken bodily to Jerusalem, for he was all the while with "the elders of Judah," who sat before him. Was a spirit-entity separated from him and taken to Jerusalem? Not unless it had a literal head, with literal locks upon it, for "he put forth the form of an hand, and took me by a lock of mine head." All will at once see that Ezekiel simply had a vision, an experience shared by Peter, by Paul, and still later by John, on Patmos; and any one of the instances teaches that man possesses an entity capable of conscious existence separately from the body, equally with either of the others, which is precisely not at all.

If, as is affirmed, Paul had such an entity, or, which is a more consistent way of stating it, Paul was such an entity, then when he was out of the body the body must have been dead, for physical death, it is claimed, consists in the separation of soul and body. From this conclusion, ridiculous as it is, there is no escape. An English writer, endeavoring to shun the dilemma, produces the following:

"We may conceive the soul to receive a supernatural vision, either while it remaineth still in the body, or by its departing from the body for a season. The latter may not be called death, because either the sensitive, or at least the vegetative, soul or faculty continues meanwhile in the body, either naturally or miraculously vivifying it."

So, then, man, as beheld in every-day life, consists of three distinct parts, viz., a body and two souls, one of these latter being the essential and ruling party, while the other is a lower, a sort of grovelling, "vegetative" fellow, a part of whose business it is to stay at home and keep house, having everything snug and warm for the return of the master-spirit. Lange's Commentary, in which the above singular language is not altogether unapprovingly quoted, sometimes favors a somewhat similar style of reasoning, and takes nearly the same ground. There is so much in the position which reminds one of its heathen origin, it cannot be thought eminently calculated to deceive.

If our friends on the other side of the question will have error in preference to truth, we have no special objection to their enjoying whatever of comfort can be derived from such philosophy, but we cannot hold them quite justifiable or even unblameworthy in deceiving the unthoughtful by pretending to find it in the word of God. We do object to the practice indulged by many theologians, of adopting certain conclusions of a false philosophy and, taking advantage of the credulity of the ignorant, imposing those conclusions upon their fellow-beings as Scriptural truth.

What Mr. Lee remarks on the subject of inspiration, we conceive to have been the experience of Paul on the occasion to which he refers. Lee says: "The infusion of spiritual influences supersedes at the same time the usual succession of ideas and the ordinary current of thought; the power of imagination alone remaining active, and the sense of spiritual vision being excited to the highest degree of intensity." We are justified in the confidence that they who think 2 Cor. xii. 2 affords any evidence of inherent immortality are supported in the opinion by few indeed among the thinkers of even the spirit-entity faith. They must go to heathen philosophy, the origin of the theory, for proof to sustain it: the Bible does not teach that kind of immortality. The "life and immortality" which it brings to light comes by a resurrection from the dead, through Jesus Christ.

"Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation."—John v. 28, 29.

We will not dwell at any length on this text, what we conceive to be the meaning of it not being in the range of our present purpose; for whatever the language may be thought to import, it will not be regarded by any reasonable or logical mind as affording even a hint that the wicked will not be destroyed, "annihilated."

Every reader of the work under review must recognize this peculiar and unhappy feature, that whenever the author is unable to produce argument having the semblance of effectiveness, he is pretty sure to immediately set to work denouncing some one. We have heretofore noted some of the numerous instances of this unreasonable, unfortunate and unchristian procedure, and now we are again pained at meeting with the following concerning "Mr. Storrs, who," he affirms, "from long experience is well skilled in twisting, combining, misapplying . . . to say nothing of other resorts," etc. He says of the same writer, that he "attacks all Scripture which stands in his way, and breaks them down, no matter how." Charging upon others a desire to "murder" texts is also a seemingly favorite pastime with our ardent author.

If we desired only the triumph of truth we would rejoice in such displays of creaturely effusion, and would wish that all opponents might adopt the same style of defending error, for we hold that no humble, consistent and honored defender of truth is ever so secure in the exercise of his influence for good as when thus assailed; but to see reproach thus carelessly brought upon the blessed cause of Christ is saddening and humiliating, and it would be disheartening as well, did not faith assure us that the Lord will overrule all and amply protect his work.

To the attention of those who accept the text under consideration as teaching the popular view, we commend the following: "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."—Luke xx. 35, 36. This text admits of no explication which makes the subjects of the resurrection other than just what Jesus positively declares they will be, viz., "children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

Our Saviour did not contradict himself, and hence if it be insisted that all the dead will live again it must also be insisted that Universalism is true, or else deny the plainest possible declarations of Christ. Which will they do? The reply of Jesus to the Sadducees is in perfect harmony with all other well understood Scripture testimony; while the popular interpretation of John v. 28, 29 cannot be harmonized with other Scripture. We used to think, sometimes, that certain texts of Scripture were about to be broken down, but when the smoke of controversy had cleared away, we found the texts not only safe and sound but brighter than ever, and pouring out their rich treasures of Divine light; but our expositions of them were broken down, yet, total wreck that they were, we rejoiced in their downfall because that downfall was our freedom.

We cannot close these remarks without calling the reader's attention to the very great improbability of ignorance on the part of the author of "Annihilationism not of the Bible," of the fact that the writer of whom he so unbecomingly speaks, prayerfully seeks to "bring out the meaning" of Scripture texts, and in doing so has no conflict with any theory which he does not conceive to be in conflict with the word of God. He may err, and he makes no pretensions to infallibility, but he desires the triumph of truth, whatever human theories are overthrown. Having only feelings of tenderness and love toward all followers of Jesus, we are constrained to suggest to N. D. George the wisdom of henceforth refraining not only from all such unreasonable and false charges, but from all charges of like character, for God will yet judge between him and those fellow-servants whom he thus smites.

From Eld. Wm. P. Shockey.

Br. Storrs: I am still teaching in the school room. My eyes are very weak yet. With pain and difficulty do I work. I go from five to sixteen miles every first day and Saturday to preach the word. Large attendance generally; but very few seem willing to obey, although several at different places declare belief in the things concerning the kingdom and the only Life-giver's name, yet obey not the word.

In much gratitude and deep obligations I acknowledge the receipt of $10 from Br. E. Wolcott to aid me in preaching the gospel. Would to God I were able to recompense him: but as I am not, Jesus, the Christ, will, out of the treasures of our heavenly Father. How few ever think of that aid to sound the word. God save us.

In very deep affliction ourselves, and our daughter and son-in-law, we have to record the death of our second grand-daughter, aged twelve years and six months. She had the scarlet fever about four weeks before; had a relapse; then another with dropsical appearances. On the 4th of May she was attacked with severe spasms which continued for sixteen hours. Her sufferings were most affecting. She expired May 5th.

Being entirely delirious all the time. We have buried four, though none quite so old, of our own. This is our first grand-child of any age, and it is difficult to perceive any difference. While we mingle the tears of sorrow, we are led to inquire, What can be our hope in the cause; and on what is it predicated?

We answer to the first, after mature examination and prayerful thought, The child shall come back from the land of the enemy, and shall dwell in her own border if the parent or parents be Abraham's seed. Our Lord said, "of such"—or rather—"theirs is the kingdom of heaven."—Math. xviii. 19. Now, it is self-evident that those, who brought the young children to him, that he should lay his hands on them, were believers in him as the Holy One of Israel. Those who rejected him, and put him to death, would not have done so. There is no element of faith can exist in an infant, of itself, that connects it to the second Adam; but love for "such little ones that believe on me" is the basis on which he promises to bring them again from death.

The Lord knew that Jer. xxxi. 14, 16, had made such promise to weeping Rachel. "A voice was heard in Rama, lamentation and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children refused to be comforted for her children because they were not."

That these were infants, literally dead, of Rachel's, and not her descent that shall remain and be restored to Canaan, as some have written, appears evident from Math. ii. 18. "When Herod saw he was mocked by the wise men . . . he sent and slew all the children of Bethlehem and the coasts thereof, from two years old and under." These are unquestionably infants. Now the point is, were such the ones Jeremiah meant? Hear the next words: "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremiah the prophet." Then quotes the verse only of mourning; showing that the balance containing the hope must be learned from Jer. xxxi. 16, "Thus saith the Lord, refrain thy tears, for thy work shall be rewarded, and they shall come again from the land of the enemy. There is hope in thine end, saith the Lord, that thy children shall come again to their own border."

Oh glorious hope! what an inducement for us, believers, to live soberly, righteously and godly in this world. What can be any more adapted to us than to have our infants made immortal? We may have our "little boys and girls running through the streets of Jerusalem" about the glorious mount Zion and at the Moriah, where Abraham offered Isaac.

As when an infant is well, a child is playful, and all are engaged in sweet family concord, we enjoy happy sensations, then we have a mere foretaste of that infantile and childish source of pleasure that shall be uninterrupted by having our immortal little ones throughout the "ages of ages."

Let us then, as parents, live devoted, in patience, and willing industry; as the surviving kindred of our dear little Mary, daughter of William and Lorilda M. Tidrow, as her brothers, sisters, shun all worldly vanity and self-indulgence. That we may see her raised from the cold grave, and be her companions in the kingdom. O blessed hope!

Aspinwall, Neb., May 17, 1871.

Spirit.

"But there is a spirit in man."—Job xxxii. 8.

To determine the import of the term spirit under every variety of circumstances in which it may be used in the Sacred Writings, is a task which neither our space nor our design warrant us to undertake.

Treatises commensurate with such a view of the subject already exist, and by a reference to these the reader can easily satisfy himself on those points which lie beyond the limits of the following remarks. Our present object is very simple, and concerns merely the question—What is the spirit of Man? In answering which we are desirous of echoing only the testimony of Scripture, whose verdict we feel bound to regard as forever decisive.

And, as the language of our text is at once positive and direct, we would respectfully submit what appears to us its fair and natural meaning; a meaning we presume, in strict harmony with the universal deliverance of both the Old and New Testament.

The statement reads: "But there is a spirit in man."

Now, the first thing which strikes us here is the evident distinction between the spirit and the man. To this distinction we wish particularly to call attention, inasmuch as the theory about the human spirit which now floats in the mind of Christendom, is borne up solely through an obstinate disregard of this plain Scripture fact.

This will at once appear if we attend for a moment to the difference between the assertion that "man is a spirit," or spiritual being; and the assertion that man has a spirit, a something which while performing an essential function in his constitution, is not to be regarded as a distinct entity, according to the prevailing notion.

The former of these propositions, it will be seen, is plainly negatived by the latter: and as the proof of the one must necessarily be the refutation of the other, we will briefly adduce what seems to us clear and decided evidence in support of the proposition, which affirms, that the spirit in man is only an attribute of his physical organism, and is in no respect to be regarded as capable of a separate and independent conscious existence.

And here the term itself claims primary attention. The word spirit, which, whatever may be the sense attached to it in actual usage, is the English equivalent for the Hebrew ruach, and the Greek pneuma, both of which, according to lexicographers, radically import breath. The term is used in a variety of senses, throughout Scripture, but in every case, except when intended as a metaphor, when spoken of man, it is to be held simply as a synonym for breath.

The primary relation which this breath or spirit sustains to man is not intimated in the text, but as both the philosophy and the facts of human existence demonstrate this, we have only to reflect on the state of man when bereft of his breathing powers, or, as orthodox conventionalism would have it, "when his spirit has departed," in order to ascertain the exact nature of the union. Immediately breathing ceases, life is at an end, and all mental and moral faculties at once paralyzed. The function, then, of the breath, or spirit in man, is no other than the maintenance of life, his deprivation of it producing the phenomenon we call death, which we hesitate not to pronounce complete in relation to all that constituted the sentient being.

Hence seems to have originated the phrase, "breath of life"—breathing, or the inspiration of the electrified air by the lungs, being essential to the life of all flesh (Gen. vi. 17.)

This being the case, it is certainly not stretching language too far to speak of the breath or spirit as the "vital principle," or life-sustaining power, life being connected with the performance of its functions in the human system.

This will help to account for that class of passages where "spirit," which as above defined, literally denotes breath, is spoken of as the life itself, and sometimes even as equivalent to the whole man; man being regarded as consisting of "soul, body, and spirit," or, more simply, as an organized being, kept alive by breathing, the withdrawal of which breath or spirit, resulting in nothing less than the total dissolution or annihilation of his conscious being. Hence Elihu, "If he (the Almighty) set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath, all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again to dust."—Job xxxiv. 14, 15. And again the Psalmist, "His (man's) breath (or spirit) goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish."—Psa. cxlvi. 4. So also Solomon, "Then (at death) shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit (or breath) unto God who gave it."—Eccl. xii. 7.

This view of the spirit of man may appear to some as inconsistent with such passages as ascribe to it personality and intelligent attributes.

To this we can only make the general reply, that though at first sight, inconsistent with some of the language employed, a careful examination of the real import of terms will satisfy any impartial reader whose mind has not been wholly "spoiled through philosophy and vain deceit," that neither personality nor intelligence are to be attributed to the human spirit; but, rather, that the "spirit in man" being the principle or power through whose agency, in connection with the mechanical parts of the human organism, intelligence is produced and identity or personality, maintained, they are rhetorically predicated of the spirit itself.

This is clearly established by the fact, that in numerous instances personality, and intelligence are alike referred to soul, body, and spirit; as "my soul," "my flesh," "my spirit;" so that if it be contended that the "my" in cases where spirit is intended, proves its distinct intelligence and separate identity, then, on the same ground, we are authorized to maintain the essential personality and intelligence of soul and body; and man, instead of being a simple self-conscious unity, is to be regarded as a triune compound of consciousness; which is only in other words to say, that man is three distinct persons—an hypothesis at once unphilosophical, irrational and unscriptural.

From all, then, which we can discover from the Book, we think we may safely presume that the "spirit in man" and the work it performs in his constitution, while indispensable to his existence and development, is no more independent of the laws which regulate this physical organism, than the liver which secretes bile, or the heart which propels the blood through his veins.

At this conclusion, we can imagine many "orthodox believers" to start back in absolute despair, while the exclamations "infidelity" and "atheism" sound forth the pious horror which possesses them at the thought, which divests man's nature of that mysterious and God-like principle, of which his future existence is supposed only to be predicable.

To such we would say—pause, and reflect. The truth is even as we have said. But then—what then? Certainly not despair! Not Infidelity! Not Atheism! Nay! If infidelity or atheism exist, it is all on the other side. For what is our position? Why, this, That the popular grounds on which the hopes of futurity are reared, are altogether false and unscriptural!

Yea, and further, that till the delusion is dispelled the mass of professed believers are without the shadow of evidence that there shall be any future state at all.

Platonic—or may we not rather say Satanic?—argument, endorsing the "immortality of the soul" or the "indestructibility of spirit" may be adduced (Gen. iii. 4, 5); but beyond this, the creeds of Christendom at present think it not expedient to pass.

Infidelity forsooth! Yes, 'tis, alas! too potent to be denied, for what with immortal soul and Spirit-ism, and other kindred creations of the pagan mind, Bible testimony is hushed—her august deliverances on the nature and destiny of man silenced, and the groundless speculations of "divines" substituted in their room.

But this must end. The Bible is struggling to be heard again; and to aid her emancipation from the thraldom of the bigotry and intolerance under which she has been groaning during these centuries of darkness and superstition, we would here echo her voice on behalf of a mortal and death-doomed race—by announcing Resurrection and Life as Heaven's one grand pledge for the redemption of humanity—when, from the dark confines of oblivion the conqueror of hades shall summon the candidates for "Glory, Honor, and Immortality!"

Aristotle.

"Though Aristotle writes very largely concerning the soul, and, according to his custom, proposes and answers a variety of subtle questions relating to it, his sentiments on the subject are by no means evident, except that they are different from those of Plato, who preceded him, and those of the Stoics, who came after him. Indeed, on all subjects, he seems to have taken pleasure in differing from all others, and appearing as the author of a system of his own.

"Though Aristotle did not, with many other philosophers, consider the soul as the whole of a man's self, he acknowledged it to be the principal part of a man. 'It is so,' he says, 'of all other animals.' 'The intellect is immiscible with the body, but the latter has its senses, as the instruments of it. He did not think so meanly of the body as not to be of opinion that it had some properties in common with the soul. 'The soul,' he says, 'has all its affections in common with the body, as anger, gentleness, compassion, confidence, joy, hatred, and lastly, love; because in all these cases the body suffers as well as the mind.'

"The motion of the intellect is always said to consist in thinking, so that when this operation ceases, the soul ceases to exist. He therefore says, 'The intellect is always in motion, and an equable one.'

"According to a metaphysical distinction of Aristotle, and I believe peculiar to him, every substance consists of matter and form. 'What then,' says he, 'is the essence of the soul? If it is said to be form, it is said wisely and rationally, being part of the compound and not of the whole. They think justly who are of opinion that the soul is to be classed with forms. It is not, however, wholly place, but intellectual, nor does it consist in act, but in the power of forms.' This last expression to me is wholly unintelligible. But the opinion that the soul is the form of the body, whatever was really meant by it, was the common language first of the Christian Aristotelians, and then of unbelievers, on the revival of the Aristotelian philosophy in the West. It was condemned at the twelfth council of Lateran.

"Like all other philosophers, Aristotle considered the soul as consisting of different parts, each having its peculiar functions. 'Nothing,' he says, 'is very clear concerning the intellectual or contemplative part of the soul; but it seems to be another kind of soul, and that this is separable, meaning from its other faculties, 'immortal and incorruptible.' 'The soul,' he says, 'is divisible into two parts, that which has reason, and that which is without reason,' which he must have learned from the Pythagoreans. 'In the part which has reason are the virtues of prudence, wisdom, genius, memory, etc.; but in the part which has not reason, temperance, fortitude, justice and whatever else is praiseworthy in the class of virtues; since on account of these we are deemed worthy of praise.'

"Concerning the state of the soul, or of the man, after death, Aristotle is nearly silent; and what he does say, or rather hint, is expressive of much doubt. 'If anything,' he says, 'be enjoyed by the dead, whether good or evil, it must be very little, either in itself, or to them; not sufficient to make them happy or unhappy, who were not so before.' This with respect to the soul, or the shades, of the virtuous, is pretty nearly the sentiment which Homer puts into the mouth of Achilles in the Elysian fields; who says, he had rather be a slave to the meanest person upon earth, than king of all in the regions below."

"If I had thought it was Jesus."

A few days since a sermon was preached in D——, from the text, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me." The preacher set forth that Christ Jesus, the Lord, is represented in all his disciples. That if a man strike a disciple the Lord feels the blow. That if injustice makes even the humblest Christian weep, tears of sorrow course down the Saviour's face. On the other hand, that whatever kindness is bestowed on a disciple, is all the same as if bestowed directly upon the Lord himself. Assuming this to be the doctrine of the text, the preacher exhorted his hearers to visit the poor in the spirit of liberality and kindness, that would actuate them as if it were the Saviour who received their benefactions in person.

After the service was closed, a gentleman whose liberality is known in all the churches, remarked:

"A few days since I carried to a poor Christian woman a comforter, warm, but well worn, and two loaves of bread—good bread, but a little stale. The weather was very cold, and the comforter was gratefully received. The poor woman was hungry, and the bread was better than she usually obtained. But while listening to the sermon to-day, I thought that had I reflected that it was Jesus I was visiting, in the person of one of his disciples, I would have taken a new comforter and fresh loaves of bread."

The remark is worthy of remembrance by Christians when about to go on an errand of mercy, or perform a deed of good will to man.

When the wise men came from the East to visit the new-born Lord of the universe, they brought gold, frankincense and myrrh—rich and costly gifts. Now, we cannot visit the holy manger; we cannot pour costly ointment upon the Saviour's head; but God has placed it in our power to perform services equally acceptable to him. He sits in many a lonely hut with the children of misfortune and misery, and all our visits to him there, and all our benefactions, will be recorded upon his heart, and the record will be imperishable.

On the other hand, if any man hopes to secure the favor of God by professions of personal piety, while he is guilty of acts of cruelty, injustice, or neglect—even though the persons suffering thereby may be the least of all human creatures—let him read the concluding passages of the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew. He will find the grandest and the most forcible exposition of the nature, necessity and importance of practical religion ever recorded in any book.—Selected.

Kind Words.

They never blister the tongue nor lips; and we have never heard of any mental trouble arising from this quarter. Though they do not cost much, yet they accomplish much. They help one's own good nature and good will. Soft words soften our own soul. Angry words are fuel to the flames of wrath, and they make blaze more freely.

Kind words make other people good natured. Cold words freeze people, and hot words scorch them, and bitter words make them bitter, and wrathful words make them wrathful. There is such a rush for all other kind of words in our day, that it seems desirable to give kind words a chance among them. There are vain words, and idle words, and hasty words, and spiteful words, and silly words, and empty words, and boisterous words, and warlike words.

Kind words also produce their own image in man's souls; and a beautiful image it is. They soothe and comfort and quiet the hearer. They shame him out of his sour, morose, unkind feelings. We have not yet begun to use kind words in such abundance as they ought to be used.—Selected.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

Br. Storrs: I have just returned to this place: found three Heralds of Life. Was glad, truly, for the contents are cheering to a poor old pilgrim that has all the opposition that ever any mortal man had in this our day; for we have a variety, such as Methodists, United Brethren (so called), and the Old and New Presbyterians, and the old Hard Shell Baptists, together with three or four other names, such as Free Will Baptists, Universalists, Campbellites, etc., all combined together to whip the old Soul-sleeper, as they call us. But in spite of all they can do or say, the Life views are on the increase. Many are getting quite tired of the old theological hell-fire and eternal conscious misery; and the tracts that we distribute as we go, and wherever we preach, are doing the work. From the tract they have them to read and examine after we have gone to other places; and they are more than we can possibly attend to. The truth is, if there were more preachers of the right stamp, our views would soon prevail. But what can one poor old one-armed man do in such a field, hundreds of miles in extent? We are not complaining, though we thus speak. No, we feel thankful to our heavenly Father for health and strength to travel, and for dear friends to help me in time of need. May the Lord bless them with life everlasting.

Obituary.

Hart.—Fell asleep, in Unionville, Conn., May 10, Jennie L. Hart, wife of Sanford Hart, aged 31 years.

Sister Hart first professed faith in Christ among the Baptists about twelve years ago. About seven years since she embraced the view of future life by a resurrection alone at the coming of Jesus Christ. In this faith she fell asleep, leaving a loving husband, a mother, sisters and brothers to mourn her loss. Two children (one an infant) too young to realize the loss of a mother, are also left to the afflicted father as mementos of a happy union.

Br. Hart sorrows deeply, but not as those "which have no hope." The prospect of a speedy re-union sustains him in his hour of trial. May his hope soon be consummated.

ANASTASIA.

BY MRS. GRACE WEBSTER HINSDALE.

Ere the sunbeams touched the earth
  At the coming of the dawn,
Mary rose to seek her Lord
  On that gloomy first day's morn.

All her sad and breaking heart
  Was a rayless, hopeless gloom,
As with tender, tearful eyes,
  She beheld the empty tomb.

As each blade of grass was wet
  With the dew-drops of the night,
So her eyes were dewed with tears,
  Since the Lord was lost to sight.

To that spot she'd longed to go,
  Where she saw him gently laid;
Now, behold! he is not there,
  And she turns, with grief dismayed!

"He is gone," she weeping cries
  To the friends who share her pain;
Soon the presence of the Lord
  Reassures their hearts again.

Lo! the friend whom Jesus loved
  Heard the words which Mary said,
And with Peter ran to see
  If the grave had lost its dead.

John outran with loving step
  Peter's timid, doubting heart,
As with anxious fears he thought
  How he from his Lord did part.

"Will He meet me with a smile
  When he makes his triumph known?
Is he still my loving Lord
  When such faithlessness I've shown?"

But his faith was not to fail;
  For a hope, divinely sent,
Cheered this soul so grieved for sin
  As o'er Jesus' tomb he bent.

True it is, the boasting grave
  Has restored its mighty dead,
For the Lord no longer lies
  Sleeping in that rocky bed!

With full power o'er life and death,
  He laid down his precious life;
Now he lives, and man is saved—
  Christ is victor in the strife!

Going thence they talked of Christ;
  Of the words their Lord had said;
How he would himself awake
  While he rested with the dead.

Jesus soon himself revealed,
  As a mighty one to save:
Breathing peace where'er he went—
  Bringing sight from out the grave!

"THE LIKE FIGURE."—1 PETER I. 21.

REMARKS BY S. S. CALL.

NOAH'S voyage in the Ark, "wherein eight souls were saved by water: the like figure, whereunto baptism doth also now save us:" evidently those in the Ark were saved by the water raising the ark. Hence water raising the Ark was, and is the figure of our salvation. What is water the figure of? Baptism, to be sure. Well, did they go down into the water? O, no; they went into the Ark. How then does water typify water baptism? That figure will not answer; so let us search further.

In John iv. 10–14, and vii. 37–39 we have our Saviour's figure of the water, and his explanation of it, thus: "He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. (This He spake of the Spirit)." It strikes me, very forcibly, that water was a figure of the Spirit: and we receive the Spirit by the hearing of faith: for, by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body. Does this Spirit leave us at death? Some say, it does. Why then are we baptized for the dead? Did not the Saviour say, the Comforter shall abide with you forever? Does not Paul say, If the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you? If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His.—Rom. viii.

The Ephesians heard the word of truth, the gospel of salvation; and after they believed they were sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise. Then they were exhorted not to grieve the Holy Spirit of God whereby they were sealed unto the day of redemption. Thus we see why they are baptized for the dead; that as the water raised the Ark the Spirit will raise all who are in Christ, the Ark of safety; and the only way to obtain a resurrection is to be in Christ.

PROSPER, MINN., May, 1871.

"THE SECOND DEATH."—WHAT IS IT?

BY DANIEL CLOW.

IN the outset, our thoughts are inclined in the direction of the scriptural use of the word death, because that is to govern us in the investigation of this matter.

In the ordinary use of the word, we all admit that it means the total cessation of all the vital functions of life. But this is not the only sense in which it is used in the Scriptures, as we shall see in the course of our remarks.

Now it is conceded, that there can be no "second death," in the literal sense of the word, without a relative antecedent, in the likeness of death, in some shape, literal, moral, or spiritual. And if the text, Rev. xx. 14, is genuine, and not an interpolation (as many suppose it is, for the reason that it is not found in many of the oldest manuscripts), and if it relates to the total destruction of the ungodly, (as it most assuredly does) then we must look for a death antecedent to this, that will carry with it the sanction of the word of God, in order to confirm the second. For if there is no death of any sort, anterior to the second, then indeed there is no second death. And in that case we will be forced to the conclusion that the said text is spurious or figurative.

Now I am not inclined to question the genuineness of the said text, nor yet to subscribe to the popular dogma of the resurrection of the wicked, simply for the purpose of clothing it with a literal signification, when there is a better, nay a more logical interpretation, and in perfect harmony with the whole tenor of the Bible.

I have said that the ordinary use of the word death, signifies the cessation of all the vital functions of life; but this is not the only sense in which it is used. Let us see: "Let the dead bury their dead."—Matt. viii. 22. Now we all believe that the Saviour never uttered an idle expression, and therefore it is inadmissible to say that he spoke of the literal dead only in this connection. No one believes that. But we all believe that he used the word death (in this case) in a compound sense, meaning both the literal and the spiritually dead.

Nor do I deem it worth while to advance one step farther to prove that the living are in a state of death, and so recognized and regarded by the blessed Saviour himself. But why stop here when the Bible is full of like testimony? "And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins."—Eph. ii. 1. In this we have a positive declaration that the saints at Ephesus were once dead. Ver. 5, "Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ." In this we are taught that they had experienced a spiritual resurrection from a state of death. "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God."—Col. iii. 3. Here again we learn that death is recognized among the saints at Colosse. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by (with) sin, and so death passed upon all men, because all have sinned."—Rom. v. 12. In this we learn the chronological epoch of sin and death, and it is confirmed in the enunciation of the law. "In the day (moment) that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die, or dying, thou shalt die" (margin).—Gen. ii. 17. O wretched man that I am—who shall deliver me from this body of death? (Margin).

We have now abundantly settled the fact, that sin and death are co-existent, that they entered into the world hand and hand with man, their victim, and sheol (the grave) was appointed the common receptacle of all. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Then we have found, in the Scriptures of truth, a fair and legitimate counterpart to the said text, Rev. xx. 14. The first a spiritual, and the second a literal death. And we are not, therefore, driven to the extremity of the resurrection of the wicked in search of an apology for the word of God. But says one, What do you make of the text, Rev. ii. 11, "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death?" and if the literal death is the "second death," as you understand it; are not the "overcomers" hurt in the same sense as those whose names were not found written in the book of life?" "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power."—Rev. xx. 6. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." —Psa. cxvi. 15. "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous hath hope in his death."—Prov. xiv. 32.

Now I am bold to say, that however much evidence may be drawn from other portions of the Bible, to prove the resurrection of the ungodly, there is none in the several texts found in the book of Rev. with the words "second death." And if they (the advocates of this peculiar faith) have no better support for their dying pet, they had better abandon it at once, and come over to the advancing columns.

Are you still in doubt, gentle reader? Have I not reasoned upon logical premises? Have I not demonstrated that the Bible recognizes two distinct deaths? the first spiritual or moral, and the second literal? Then the language of the revelator is consistent and harmonious; without the slightest color of reference to the resurrection of the wicked.

But still I hear a feeble voice, away in the back-ground, saying, "Nay, but the wicked must be raised to hear the sentence of the law, and to be cast into "the lake of fire and brimstone, and shall be tormented day and night forever and ever." Now it cannot be expected that I can go into criticism upon this exploded heathen dogma. The limits assigned to this article forbid it; nor am I inclined to recognize it as worthy of a single thought, for it is out of all harmony with God and his word, and should be treated with scorn, when presented for our serious consideration. But as there are some who are lingering by the way, and feeling along in the darkness yet, I will add a single quotation or two from the unerring word, and leave the matter for the consideration of all who may chance to read and reflect.

"It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment."—Heb. ix. 27. Now, in the face and eyes of this positive declaration to the contrary, will you still insist, kind friend, upon the baseless theory, "The resurrection of the wicked dead" simply, (as some assert,) to "listen to the sentence of the law," and to die again? Or, as others say, to be plunged into a lake of fire, in the immediate neighborhood of the saints' residence, who are represented as looking out upon the horrid scene, and chuckling over the sufferings of their own friends and relatives. Once I listened to this, worse than heathen trash, but I can listen to it no more. Nay, I will not go in the way of this blasphemous folly. None the less blasphemous because it fell from the lips of a Calvin, and was foisted into the Protestant Christian code by an Edwards and others, before and since his day.

"The wages of sin is death." "It is appointed unto men once to die." "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" We have heard the sentence of the law a thousand times, and we would not understand it any better if we were raised from the dead a thousand times. Nay, the wicked will not be raised. "They are dead, they shall not live. They are deceased, they shall not rise." —Isa. xxvi. 14.

JANESVILLE, WIS., 1871.

"ANIMATED SUBSCRIPTIONS AND JOLLY COLLECTIONS."

"AFTER such a speech I thought they would, of course, hit the nail on the head—as the most excellent of Episcopal Churches always does—by an animated subscription and jolly collection; but no! all were coolly told to notice the coupon at the bottom of the order of exercises, which they could fill and send by letter to the Treasurer of the Society. It was just so much good effect thrown away, and my Methodism came away disgusted."

Allow me to make the above extract from an article in a recent number of the "Advocate" the text for a few remarks. I greatly fear that the subject of Christian beneficence is not receiving the best attention of the churches either as to the duties it imposes or the methods of performing them. I cannot believe that the slightest necessity exists among intelligent church members for the intermittent and spasmodic character which their efforts at raising money for proper purposes usually manifest, and feel convinced that the remedy for it is neither far-fetched nor difficult.

The usual course of the solicitor of a collection is to seek to convince his hearers that his cause is an important one, and that it has superior claims upon their support. And while the methodical and systematic steward of his Lord's goods feels no embarrassment in deciding upon its merits, and perhaps has long since pre-determined the very amount to be given for the support of the cause presented, the good impulsive Christian, without any fund "laid by in store as God hath prospered him," nor plan for distributing it, is swayed by the eloquence of the solicitor, and is not unfrequently led, in the gushing enthusiasm of the moment, to contribute sums (perhaps to a third-rate object) which are much needed by enterprises of really greater importance, but less favorably presented.

On reflection these good men cannot but regret their lack of system. But, alas for them! the practice of our churches tends only to confirm them in their ways. And I believe that as long as the "animated subscription and jolly collection" plan is adhered to, just so long will their giving be unreliable and spasmodic, and the prosperity and maintenance of every good thing depending on the contributions of the church, will be at the mercy of the fitful generosity engendered by the glowing periods of stirring speeches.

Let us for a moment look at an animated subscription and jolly collection. Every Methodist knows them, and almost every one dreads them. The "eloquent brother" has effectively presented grave truths. All have been made to see the perishing condition of the heathen, the needs of the Church Extension Society, or the sad condition of the superannuated. Some cases of special pathos are tenderly recited, and while the audience is bathed in tears, it is mildly insinuated that "the cause needs money, and we will proceed to take up a subscription for its support." Ah! that gives another bath—not quite so warm as tears, perhaps not so cold as ice-water, but practically effective in drawing the mind away from the cause to the competition now about to begin. Gossipy surmises are current in the congregation as to how much Brother A. will give, how much Brother B. ought to give, etc. "Now, brethren," says the speaker and engineer, "we want to raise $250 by $10 subscriptions." ("This coach, dear friends, is only for first-class passengers. We don't tell you so, but you know it all the same.")

Fifteen or sixteen bidders take tickets by this line, and this proposition begins to lag. "Don't some of you want to remember in your subscriptions your grandfather, or your beloved wife, or your d-a-r-ling dead boy," says the auctioneer. "O yes," says some tender heart, "in memory of my departed grandmother put me down ten dollars." But this coach must wait now.

"We want $150 in $5 subscriptions." The same course is repeated, and the persons present have been made to feel by the direction things have taken that these are "less honorable than the first." Perhaps among them some dear enthusiast, whose real ability, and therefore his true indebtedness to the cause, was measured by five dollars, believes (for half a minute) he can give ten dollars, when with a shout he is passed over the heads of the second class passengers, and to his own and their astonishment finds himself in the unexpecting company of the first class. He rides this time, but the next he can't afford even to start.

"And now we want $100 in $1 subscriptions. Now brethren, be lively! Our Secretary writes fast, and is competent to do a large business this morning!" Some thirty or forty one dollar fire-crackers are fired off, interspersed with an occasional report of ten dollars or five dollars from some reluctant and stingy brother goaded into giving by the importunity of others, and then the whole affair lags miserably. Exhausted by their efforts and frightened by the rapid dissolution of the audience, collectors are exhorted to hasten "to gather up the fragments" in plates.

I fancy gaping gossips have followed the subscription thus far only to lose their interest just as the blessed Saviour is beginning to look for the "two mites that make a farthing," or the gift equal in value to "a cup of cold water given in the name of a disciple."

And now it is over. The gratified vanity of the large subscriber, the vain regrets of the gushing, the dishonest evasion of payment by the extravagant, the heart-burnings of the poor, the public humiliation of the prudent, constrained by his circumstances to deny the solicitor or give but little, the fixed determination of the stingy never to be so caught again, have all done their work of demoralizing the congregation, and the next collection must have more vigorous appeals, and more stimulating plans to evoke the least enthusiasm.

Is this picture overdrawn? and has not your Methodism often "come away disgusted" from such scenes? And, as this is a practical age, I appeal to stewards, and others who manage them, whether jolly collections do not usually show a shrinking of 20 to 30 per cent.

The vicious character of this method of raising money has many parallels. Does a church need to be built? "We will put in a memorial window for you for so much." Or is the cause of education presented? "We will endow the Snook professorship in our college if you will give so much, Mr. Snook." Or do your Sunday-schools need money? "We will have an ice-cream festival," where for fifteen cents' worth of cream, you may imagine you are paying twenty-five cents (the price of a ticket) to the cause. Or is some asylum the object of beneficence? Nothing less than a fair will do, and then begins every sort of emulation except the best. Who keeps the most splendid table? What church has the most alluring salesmen? Who seduces the most people to buy the things they least need? Whose minister shall have this splendid chair or this gold watch? And Christians who love their Master are found competing in methods which, I fear, he cannot approve.

I appeal to your best judgment, brethren, is not any good cause degraded by such things? Why, then, have them?

I know a church that has graduated out of them. I know no meritorious cause is ever presented that does not receive an effective and, according to means, a liberal support. For years, by the blessing of God, they have not known embarrassment in their finances. But jolly collections and fairs and festivals to raise money have been unknown for a long time. At their Centenary Collection they weakly gave way and went in for an "An. Sub. and a Joll. Coll.," and at its close fondly imagined they had raised enough to pay off their church debt. But the subscription was not animated enough to survive, and the J. C. was found to be ignominiously short thirty-three per cent. when the harvest was gathered in. I don't believe they care to repeat the experiment.

There is one remedy for all this—to learn once and forever whose money we are spending, and diligently to seek how much dare we retain, and not how little we can give. When we own any thing it will be time enough to talk of our giving. Having considered these things, let us distribute according as God has given us ability, and, above all, let not pastors or stewards despise the gifts of the poor.

A coupon, then, at the bottom of the order of exercises, filled up in sums prompted by a thoughtful heart, and quickly handed in to the treasurer of the society, will be worth a hundred cents on the dollar, the cause will have a reliable supporter, and God will see that the contributor does not lose his reward.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

THE LITTLE TAILOR BIRD.

"WELL, I never would build my nest on such a tree as that," said little blue-jay, tossing her top-knot with an air of wisdom. "Those great round limbs will give you no sort of foundation. Your nest will slip off any way you can fix it. I always choose a tree with plenty of fine twigs and little branches. I twine grass around, and make my nest as strong as the tree itself. The wind will blow you away, little red poll."

"Never fear for me, my dear," said the placid little builder. "Just call when my work is done, and you shall see how I succeed. I choose this tree because its leaves just suit me."

"Well, every one to their own taste," said the "fop of the forest," flitting away to a tree-top, and singing the prettiest note she knew. But the industrious worker was not ruffled so much as a feather by the scornful air her little friend put on. No one expected any thing else from blue-jay, who was always a little coquettish, in consequence of being so much admired.

The little house-carpenter selected her site with great deliberation; and what spot do you think she chose? A cluster of broad swaying leaves which hung quite at the extremity of a bough, far out of reach of any meddlesome boy. Then she brought a long thread of grass; and, piercing one hole at a time in the thick leaves, she drew the thread through as nicely and evenly as a tailor could do. Up and down her long seams she patiently wrought, until she had made the outer wall of her hexagon castle as secure as could be wished. The remaining work was comparatively light; and, in a few days, she had a fine soft carpet spread, and her little house was furnished as cozy and luxurious as a bird's could be. She had fairly won her title of "tailor bird;" and a wonderful piece of work she had wrought, considering that she had never served an apprenticeship.

But there was a great Teacher who took notice of all she did, and guided her always from any mistakes such as human builders often make. That little bird's nest was his especial care from its commencement to its end; and he even took care of it after the little fledglings had flown away. He directed to the spot a thoughtful, studious lad, who managed to secure it, and bear it away to his little cabinet, where it hangs now on a mossy spray, as a monument of the wisdom God gave to a little bird.—Selected.

"IT'S JUST LIKE HIM."—A VICKSBURG INCIDENT.

THE night scenes were sometimes grand, indeed; shells discharged from the land batteries traced their beautiful, fiery paths high into the air above the beleagured city, and meeting there the missiles ascending on the same errand from Commodore Porter's fleet, crossed them in beautiful curves, making the beholder almost forgetful of the mission on which the monsters were sent. On one of these brilliant nights, I came upon a regimental prayer-meeting under a bluff within short range of the enemy's works. Whenever there was a discharge from our batteries, the rebel sharpshooters along their lines would reply by a shower of minie balls, which cut the leaves over our heads, and occasionally glanced down to the ground at our feet. By order of the brigade commander, to prevent drawing the attention, and perhaps the fire of the enemy, the hymns were sung in a low, muffled voice, but loud enough to "make melody in our hearts." The meeting was led by one of the captains of the regiment. There was something genuine and manly in the piety of the leader, which seemed to win the affection and attention of the soldiers. I was so much struck with it that I could not forbear seeking his acquaintance; and, on invitation, meeting him the next day, we walked over to the colonel's tent.

As the custom was, we were courteously offered a drink from the ubiquitous bottle. As the single glass passed round the circle, nearing me every moment, I questioned in my own mind what terms I should use in declining; but I was yet more interested to see what course my Christian captain would take. When the colonel called upon him he declined; was invited again, and again declined, and the third time did it so decidedly and yet respectfully, as not to give offense, nor to be further importuned. I said to him afterward,

"Captain, do you always do that?"

"Yes," said he.

"Do you mean you have never taken any intoxicating liquor?"

"Yes, just that."

"What, not even to 'correct' this Yazoo water?"

"Never."

"You must have belonged to the cold water army in your boyhood?"

"Yes; but I learned something better than that; my mother taught me this one thing—'what is right is right,' and coming to Mississippi don't make any difference. It would not be right for me to accept an invitation to drink at home; I don't believe it's right here—therefore I don't drink."

A few weeks afterward, passing up the Mississippi river, I addressed a Sabbath evening congregation. After the service, a lady came to inquire about her boy—"foolishly," she said, for it was not likely that in an army of 40,000 men I had seen her boy; but still she wanted to ask me if I had met him. She told me of her anxiety for his welfare—how she feared that the bad influences of the camp would lead him astray.

"He promised that he would do well," said she, "and I've no reason to think he doesn't do well; but if I could only see somebody who could tell me from actual knowledge how he is doing, it would be such a relief."

She told me his name and regiment. I assured her that there was hardly ground for all the fear mothers were exercising for their absent boys; that very many soldiers were actually becoming better men, growing strong under trial. And then, to illustrate, I told her, without mentioning names, of my captain, of the prayer-meeting, and of the scene in the colonel's tent.

"Oh," said she, "that's beautiful—that's beautiful. His mother must be proud of him."

"Yes," said I, "that she ought—and you are the mother!"

I never shall forget the joy that leaped into her face, and how she sprang across the carpet, and catching my hand in both her's, wet it with grateful tears.

"Is that my boy—is that Will? It's just like him; I knew he would do so. He always was a good boy; he told me he always would be—and I knew he would."—Selected.

A BIBLE VIEW OF HELL:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. Address all orders to

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

AN EXPOSITION OF HEBREWS II. 14, 15.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

"Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that, through death, he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them, who, through fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage."

I. WHO are the "children" of the text?—"Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood." We reply, his brethren of the seed of Abraham. "For both he that sanctifieth, and they who are sanctified, are all of one: for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren; saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren: in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee. And again; I will put my trust in him. And again; Behold, I and the children which God hath given me. . . . For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham. Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren," etc.—Heb. ii. 11–17.

II. The expression "flesh and blood."—"Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood."

The expression is a Hebraism for our Adamic or earthly nature. The nature of angels is higher than our own. The same expression is found in Matt. xvi. 17; Gal. i. 16; and 1 Cor. xv. 50. Man, who is flesh and blood, did not reveal to Peter that Jesus was the Christ: God, who is a Spirit, did. Paul did not confer with man, but he learned from Christ the head of the new creation. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," for corruption cannot inherit an incorruptible kingdom: incorruptible flesh and bones can. The children have a weak, mortal, corruptible nature, "for the life of the flesh is in the blood." Man is dependent on his blood for his present life, and when its proper office is disturbed, sickness and death result therefrom.

III. "He also, himself, likewise took part of the same:" that is, Christ "took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham."

IV. "That, through death, he might destroy," etc. "He also, himself, likewise took part of the same, that," for this reason, "through (HIS OWN) death he might destroy," etc. The seed of Abraham die because they are flesh and blood, and Christ took on him that nature in order to die, and thus, by means of his death, "destroy him that had the power of death." "We see Jesus . . made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death . . . that he by the grace of God should taste of death for every man."

V. "That, through (his) death he might destroy him," etc. The Greek word rendered "destroy" in this text, is Katargese. The simple form of the word as given in Hudson and Hastings' Greek Concordance is Katargeo. Under thatword the following renderings in our version of the Scriptures are given:—

Make without effect, Rom. iii. 3. Make of none effect, Rom. iv. 14. Gal. iii, 17. (Pass.) become of no effect, Gal. v. 4.—come to nought, 1 Cor. ii. 6.—to be done away, 2 Cor. iii. 7.—fail, 1 Cor. xiii. 8.—cease, Gal. v. 11.—vanish away, 1 Cor. xiii. 8. Make void, Rom. iii. 31. Cumber, Luke xiii. 7. Deliver, Romans vii. 6. Loose, Romans vii. 2. Do away, 1 Cor. xiii. 10. 2 Cor. iii. 11, 14. Put away, 1 Cor. xiii. 11. Put down, 1 Cor. xv. 24. Abolish, 2 Cor. iii. 13. Eph. ii. 15. 2 Tim. i. 10. Destroy, Rom. vi. 6. 1 Cor. vi. 13. xv. 26. 2 Thess. ii. 8. Heb. ii. 14. Bring to nought, 1 Cor. i. 28.

From the foregoing, it is easy to obtain the correct idea expressed by the Greek term in Heb. ii. 14, which is rendered "destroy." It simply means to make void, of none effect, to put away, and abolish.

VI. "That through (his own) death he might destroy (or abolish, put away, etc.) him that had the power of death, that is, the devil."

From this verse, the idea that Beelzebub the prince of demons is the devil that had the power of death, is derived. It is the only text in the entire Bible that can be produced to sustain such a theory, while very many texts can be quoted to prove that a different party altogether had the power of death: hence we believe the idea mentioned is quite unscriptural, and this one text should harmonize with the others treating upon the same subject. Before giving our own view of this matter, we will notice the more common and popular one.

In Genesis the serpent is a prominent character. In both the Old and New Testaments the terms Satan and Devil occur, and they are used in various ways. It is claimed, that Beelzebub, Satan and the Devil are identical, and that he was the serpent of the garden, by some,—others, that he used the serpent as a medium by which he might lead Adam to sin and entail death upon himself and his posterity. It is in this manner, it is declared, that the Devil had the power of death.

That such a view is exceedingly unscriptural, we now proceed to show.

The third chapter of Genesis informs us 1st, that it was a serpent that beguiled Eve. 2d, that the serpent was more subtile than any beast of the field which the LORD God had made. It is quite evident that the serpent was an animal which the LORD God made of the dust of the ground. 3d, that the LORD declares that the serpent beguiled Eve, for "the LORD God said unto the serpent, Because thou has done this," etc. It is folly to presume that that serpent was what is commonly called Beelzebub, Devil and Satan. It was simply a serpent, just as the Word declares.

Those who hold that the serpent was none other than what is generally called Devil, Satan and Beelzebub, quote John viii. 44, Luke x. 18, and Rev. xx. 1–3. The latter is the more prominent quotation, but it has nothing to do with either of the others. In the last reference we find these words: "And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years." Simply because of the phrase "That old serpent," it has been gratuitously assumed that it was the serpent of the garden of Eden. If it was that one, it might with great propriety be called "old." But it was not that one. His serpentship is first introduced to us in Rev. xii. where John writes, "And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and, behold, a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his head. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth . . . And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not, neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him." The "old serpent" is a devil with seven heads and ten horns, and a tail of fearful length and power. That could not have been the serpent of the garden of Eden, for John lived at a period more than 4,000 years off from the days of Adam and Eve, and his old serpent and his angels were still in heaven, for he saw them there, and he saw them when they were cast out. John saw events prophetically. The Satan that Christ saw falling had fallen before John's vision, so that was not John's Satan, and the "angels that sinned" were cast down to hell before John's angels were cast out with their dragonic head. Peter writes that the angels that sinned were in Tartarus in his day. John's angels of the old serpent were still in heaven years after Peter's and Christ's death. Thus we are well assured that the Devil and old serpent of John's vision were not the serpent of the garden of Eden.

A more common theory is, that the Devil used the serpent in Eden as a medium through which to seduce our first parents. This latter theory is as wide of the mark as the former.

1st. No devil is mentioned in connection with the transaction of the garden of Eden. 2d. Eve charged the crime upon the serpent and, evidently, she had no idea that there were fallen angels in Eden, either in or out of the serpent to control it. 3d. God charged the serpent with the crime, as we have already shown, and passed sentence upon him for it, as follows: "And the LORD God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field: upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life." Surely the LORD knew whether it was the Devil or the serpent that was guilty. If the Devil was guilty he got off without being declared so, while his medium got blamed for the whole thing, and had sentence pronounced and executed accordingly.

In Job's day we find Satan "going to and fro in the earth, and walking to and fro in it." In Peter's day the Devil as a roaring lion was walking about seeking whom he might devour.

When Satan talked with the Lord concerning Job, the Lord said unto him, "Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life." If Satan had the power of death, then eventually Job fell into his clutches wholly, for Job is now dead.

VII. Having shown the unreasonableness and unscripturalness of the common view, we will present our views concerning "him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." The original word for "the devil" of this text, is Diabolos, which literally rendered, is, an accuser, an adversary, a slanderer, etc. The Devil of Revelations is called "the accuser" of our brethren. "Moses" is frequently spoken of in the Bible where the Law is meant. In John v. 45 we read, "Do not think that I will accuse you unto the Father, there is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust." Moses was the accuser of the Hebrews, that is, the Law given through Moses was their accuser, for Moses was dead when Christ said that Moses accused the Jews unto the Father. His Law must be meant. Those without Law are accused or excused by their thoughts.

Heb. ii. 14, literally defined, would read, "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of a corruptible nature, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through his death he might abolish and make void that which had the power of death, that is the accuser, the Law."

This is the transgression of law. Law is a system of justice. According to the Bible, "the wages of sin is death." God made man mortal, he made the Law, and he defined the penalty. The Devil was not taken into the counsels of the Almighty, neither did God make him an executor of the law. The Law referred to in Hebrews is without doubt the Law of Moses. It was constantly accusing the Hebrew, for none of them kept it, so every year the High Priest appeared for them in the Holy of Holies, not without blood, which he offered for himself and for the sins of the people. Through fear of death, the penalty of that Law, they were subject to bondage. Their sins were passed over, under the old Covenant, from year to year, until Jesus came, when their sins were laid upon him. "For this cause he is the Mediator of the New Covenant, that by means of (his) death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first Covenant," etc. "And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses; blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross," etc. So "Christ was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." Christ was the only hope of Abraham and the Hebrews, and he is our High Priest to-day. Christ has abolished the Law, which was the Old Covenant, and he has rendered the penalty null and void to all who believed on him; or who may believe. Christ becomes "the END of the Law for righteousness to every one that believeth." Life cannot come by the Law as all have broken it. "Life and Immortality are brought to light through the gospel." Christ is the Mediator of the New Covenant which is better than the old. How glorious the fact that Christ hath abolished the Law and its penalty, Death, and enabled the perishing to seek for Immortality. If Christ had not died, the Old Covenant would still be in force, and the children would still be in bondage through fear of death, and all at last perish.

The word rendered "destroy" in Heb. ii. 14, is the same that in 2 Tim. i. 10, "abolished,"—"who hath abolished death." Christ did fulfil the Law, and then nailed it to his cross. The Jews were then free to be married to Christ. Much more might be written to show that the Law is the accuser that had the power of death; but this may suffice to establish the point.

Diabolus is rendered "false accuser" in 2 Tim. iii. 3, and in Titus ii. 3, and in 1 Tim. iii. 11, it is rendered "slanderer." In the first text, it is applied to some of the professors of religion in the last days; in the second it is used concerning aged women, by way of warning; and in the third, it is used in connection with advice in regard to the qualities of deacons' wives. If it be insisted by some that Diabolus always mean the Devil, we beg such to consider the three passages just noticed. Perhaps they may concede that we are right concerning Heb. ii. 14 after that, that the devil of that text is not Beelzebub, but the accuser, the Law.

Finally, at the resurrection the saints will sing, "O Death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the Law; but thanks be unto God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

PHILADELPHIA, May 17, 1871.

NATURE AND IMMORTALITY.

WHEN we endeavor to explore the future, or discover the character of those things that are unseen, by the light of nature, the first thing that demands our attention is to learn the means by which nature divulges the truths in her keeping. Having learned this, we are at once prepared to enter upon the investigation of any subject that may come under our observation.

How then do we learn of nature touching things future or unseen? Let this point be fixed and then we may advance with safety—with some hope of ultimately arriving at just conclusions.

I conceive the only means by which we can gain any light from nature, upon the unknown, is by fixing general principles by observation, and then following those principles where observation is precluded. When we see a train of cars enter a tunnel we justly conclude that the track within the tunnel is the same as without it, because we have previously established the principle that cars always run upon certain rails beneath them. Just so when we reason from nature upon our future destiny, we must first settle a principle from observation, then follow that principle into the unknown future, and thus we may receive whatever knowledge nature can afford us. It is true that to all principles there may be exceptions, but in reasoning from nature these exceptions can never be allowed, unless there is first shown an evident necessity for them. This possibility of exception will always prevent a demonstration from nature, and such exceptions may even exist in the unknown, where we now see no reason to look for them, but it is still self-evident that to make possible exceptions the basis of an argument is to ignore reason and nature, and launch on the boundless ocean of conjecture. We must reason from what we know. Our premises must be positive truths established directly or indirectly by the evidences of the senses, not wild theories that have as little to do with observation as fancy has with fact; and thus reasoning it is possible, nature might give us many lessons.

Having laid down the principle by which I shall be guided, I now propose to enter upon a search for some of the truths made known by nature concerning the constitution of man, and his chances for a future existence. For the present I shall attempt no demonstration, but having found some facts, and settled some general truths concerning those facts, I shall deduce the conclusions.

In the first hasty survey we take of man, we discover prominent in his character, the desire of life and immortality; which is but the desire of life indefinitely extended into the future. To prove that the desire of life is universal, we have only to appeal to the disposition shown to preserve it, and to the united testimony of every sane mind. No man desires non-existence. The suicide may choose it, not because there is in nonentity anything desirable, but because he thereby hopes to escape certain other and greater evils. If life without misery could be retained, or secured, by a single volition, death would be unknown. So far as I know, the fact that all men desire immortality has never been questioned; and should any man proclaim himself an exception, the world would look upon him as one beside himself. Let this fact then be noted—All mankind desire immortality.

Following the plan I have marked out, I now proceed to fix certain general principles concerning human desire, and thus a path will be formed upon which we can enter the future.

I observe in myself and other beings of my nature, a multitude of desires, some operating only under certain circumstances, as hunger, thirst, desire of rest; others more general in their object and continual in their action, as the desire for wealth and knowledge; and still another class, more comprehensive than either of the foregoing, as the desire for happiness and immortality. To the agency of these desires, operating singly, or in combination, we owe every voluntary action of our lives. From their stimulation arises all the marvelous energy and activity of the human character. A moment's consideration will make this apparent. Take from man the desire for food, and the race would soon be exterminated. Take from him the desire for wealth and knowledge, and all would sink into idleness, or be only active to supply their immediate wants. Commerce and manufacture would be at an end, and a universal lethargy would pervade the world. Let man lose the desire for future life, and who would seek immortality? In short, take from human nature the one ingredient of desire, and it is easy to see our existence would be impossible.

Here then, I think, is fixed one general truth connected with desire—that it is the impelling power which nature uses to urge us to seek some real good.

Again, there is every reason to believe, that under certain circumstances, nature has provided for the gratification of every desire she has given: for if nature's God is a being of goodness he would not tantalize his creatures with desires for the satisfaction of which he had made no provision. But aside from this, observation shows us that every desire points toward some object. In natural desire the object is real, and, under specified conditions, attainable; as the desire for food, drink and knowledge. In perverted desire the object is sometimes real and attainable; as in avarice and ambition, and sometimes imaginary, as in the paradise of the Musselman, and the heaven of the spiritualist. Observation, then, teaches this fact, that all natural desires and many perverted ones may be gratified. This is a second general truth.

A third truth is, that desire always implies conditions; or, in other words, that nothing which we desire can be secured but by effort made by ourselves.

If true, this is a most important principle; and that it is true, a little reflection will convince the most skeptical. Hunger and thirst imply the necessity of procuring something to eat or drink; and unless the soil is tilled, the seed sown, and harvest gathered, all our desires would not save us from famine and death. So of our desire for health; it can only be gratified by obeying the physical laws under which we live.

This is the case with all those desires which recur at regular intervals, or exist only under specified circumstances; they point directly to conditions, without compliance with which not one of them ever has been satisfied, or ever can be. Every desire connected with our animal organization comes to us as active beings, and we must forego its gratification or comply with its demands.

If we look at another class of desires, not necessarily universal, as the desire of wealth, civil or military distinction, we find the same thing true of them. How has it been with every man that has been distinguished for success in his favorite pursuit? Whether in oratory, war, science or literature, the best years of long lives, or the mightiest efforts of surpassing genius, have been essential to perfect their various designs. Human greatness has always been bought at the price of severe and constant toil.

The desire of fame has always imposed upon its votaries labor as the only condition by which the end could be attained. That "there is nothing worth having that can be had without labor" depends on the truth that desire always implies conditions.

So far then, whether we look at man as an animal or an intellectual being, we find everywhere connected with desire, conditions. Let us approach still nearer the desire of immortality, to those of life and happiness. Except the desire of life, that of happiness, in its universality and comprehensiveness, absorbs all other desires that pertain to our present state. And who can doubt that happiness is conditional? Let us gaze for an instant around us. The whole world is in motion—ceaseless activity pervades every community—heartless despotism—the most cruel oppression, murder, robbery, and vice in all its forms, blight the fair face of the earth. The ocean is whitened with the commerce of all nations; manufactures of almost innumerable variety are to be met with in every quarter of the globe, and agriculture is pursued with an earnestness that shows an object of importance in view. Nor does this busy world lack noble instances of philanthropy and self-sacrifice to the general good. All mankind, by means innumerable, are eagerly, often mostly in pursuit of some end, to attain which all their energies are put in requisition;—that end is happiness. All seek to comply with what they conceive to be the conditions by which the end can be gained. The practical opinion of all the race is, that happiness is conditional; and were there no other reason, the experience of every day would place the question beyond doubt. The desire of life is, perhaps, the strongest feeling of our nature; and it is most intimately connected with that of immortality, which is simply life indefinitely extended in the future. But, that life is conditional none will deny.

This examination might be pursued, but the result would be invariably the same. No sooner would desire develop itself, than conditions for its gratification would immediately follow. This is so obvious to every observing mind as to need no proof. Desire and conditions always go hand in hand, and there is no hazard in saying, that not one instance of the unconditional gratification of natural desire can be produced.

I think my third principle is established, and will add, as self-evident, that we never desire to obtain what we now possess, or to retain what we cannot lose.

Here are four principles:—

1. That desire is the impelling power which nature uses to urge man to seek or retain some real good.

2. That nature has under certain circumstances provided for the gratification of every desire she has given.

3. That no desire can be gratified except the individual in whom it exists complies with certain conditions.

4. That we never desire to obtain what we now possess, or to retain what we can by no possibility lose.

The first position was—that all desire immortality; and an examination of natural desire shows the four propositions also to be universally true; thus the premises are complete, and the conclusions are apparent.

1. Desire is the impelling power which nature uses to urge men to seek or retain some real good. Therefore immortality is a real good, which nature, by desire, urges us to seek or retain. We cannot desire to retain it, because we do not know that we are immortal. True, men not seldom say they are conscious of indwelling immortality, when in truth they are conscious of exactly the reverse, but hope there is something within of which they are not conscious, that can never die: therefore nature does not urge us to retain immortality. But if this were not the case—(4)—we never desire to retain what we cannot lose; therefore, however durable our natures might be, there would be a possibility of death. But (4) we never desire to obtain what we now possess: yet we desire to obtain immortality, and consequently do not now possess it.

2. Nature—or rather nature's God—has made provision for the gratification of every desire he has given; he has given the desire of immortality; and hence has somewhere made provision for its gratification—man may be immortal.

3. The gratification of every natural desire depends on our compliance with conditions; and it follows that immortality is conditional. These conditions are not revealed in nature, and hence the necessity for some other revelation. But desire is a universal energizing force given to urge us to seek out those conditions, or comply with them when known; and without it we should care as little for the future as the day-fly, whose existence is bounded by the setting sun. But man is made capable of a nobler destiny: he grasps the unending future, and is filled with inexpressible longings for life—eternal life: and these aspirations are the voice of God urging him to seek and use the means by which he may be made immortal.

To reason then from the known to the unknown, so far as desire is concerned, the inevitable conclusion is, conditional immortality. There is no escape, no evasion. Nature never came nearer a mathematical demonstration.

Yet, who has not heard that the longing we feel for endless existence is the "voice of God proclaiming our immortal destiny!" That is, all men desire immortality, therefore all will be immortal! Let us apply the same logic to other subjects. All men desire happiness, therefore all will be happy! All desire food and clothing, therefore no one can be hungry or naked! All desire health, and hence sickness is unknown! What sane man believes such nonsense? Still, in the eye of reason, it is just as near truth as the position that all men desire immortality, and hence all will be immortal.

Suppose however my premises are wrong—that all men do not desire immortality, and that the four propositions drawn from the fact of desire are untrue. What then? Simply this:—Non-existence. Universal immortality, and conditional immortality, would both fall together, unless one or the other could be proved true from other premises; for though it is true, that if immortality is inherent, we could no more desire it, than we could desire the light of the sun when it is shining upon us in mid-day brilliancy, yet the fact that we do not desire immortality would be far enough from proving that we possess it. If we deny the evidence of desire upon this subject, to me, it appears that the strongest, if not the only argument, against universal and eternal nonentity is broken down.—Where does nature clearly indicate even the possibility of eternal life, if not by our desires? It is said, and with apparent plausibility, that the capabilities of our nature afford presumptive evidence that we shall have a future and eternal existence.

This argument will hardly bear the light for however we look on the human organization, it must be granted that physically, intellectually and morally it is imperfect, or in that condition in which surrounding circumstances will inevitably lead to that imperfection. We cannot suppose the God of nature created man with this inherent imperfection, or incapacity to resist those expressive forces which produce that imperfection: hence man must have fallen from some position where his capabilities might have been harmoniously developed; and when this degeneracy occurred, the elements of discord and evil were introduced, though many of his capabilities still remained. Now, when man thus became degenerate the mystery is that he was not destroyed at once and forever—a mystery that nature cannot explain; but Revelation can—"For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life."

Aside from this, however, if we can affirm with reason that the God of nature would not create such capacities with a view to their final destruction; with equal reason we can affirm, that he would not create them with a view to their remaining undeveloped, or in idleness. Yet in the immense majority of our race the development of their capacities has been in obedience to the same law that develops the capacities of the brute—that of necessity: and nearly all those powers which are said to give man right to expect immortality have lain dormant; and if thus they lie dormant a life time, it cannot be very unreasonable that they should remain so forever. Again, if it is unreasonable that those capacities should be destroyed, it is much more so that they should be perverted and used to blight the earth with crime and woe: but that they are thus used none will deny. Hence, I conclude that the destruction of these capacities is not near so unreasonable as their existence a lifetime in idleness, or their perversion to produce misery; and no more so than the simple fact of human existence in its present degenerate state: and therefore we are driven back to desire, as the foundation which nature gives for any hope of immortality. Thus if my premises are denied the only result is to take away all hope of an endless existence, and to doom the race to nonentity!

I think I have shown that the utmost that can be proved by human desires is, conditional immortality; and that the strongest argument presented by nature for endless being is found in desire.

In looking at these conclusions one cannot help observing that the God of nature, who in the gift of desire indicated that he had prepared the means for its gratification, is the same God who has "brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." Desire gives man reason to hope for future life as something that can be secured by complying with conditions which nature does not reveal. But here, where nature is silent, the God of nature reveals to man the means by which he may become immortal; here, where the wisdom of man and the voice of nature have been alike important to give assurance of life, the Creator, by direct irradiation, illuminates the distant boundless future. The "Light of Life" dispels the doubts which nature leaves, and meets us with the assurance that of all things, that are committed unto him, nothing shall be lost; but he will raise it up at the last day. He has severed the bonds of death, and at his command the sepulchre shall vainly desire longer to retain its unconscious inmates.

Only by faith in him can that universal desire for being be gratified. He alone holds the keys of death and hell, and he only can unlock the grave, and give life to the sleeping dead; for he only can redeem the soul from the power of the grave.

PLATO.

"THE sentiments of Plato concerning the human soul are by no means clear and distinct, nor are they pursued by them to their natural consequences, as they were by the Stoics afterwards.

"Matter was always acknowledged to be incapable of any kind of action, and was always thought to be acted upon; whereas, the igneous nature of the soul was supposed to give it natural activity. Agreeably to this, Plato says, 'The soul has the power to move itself.'

"He is not uniform in denying what was called passion to the mind. He must, therefore, mean it in a gross sense, when he says, 'Where there is passion there must be generation; and this applies to the body,' meaning, no doubt, that where there is generation, there must be a succession of beings produced from one another, that the death of some may make room for others; whereas, mind is incapable of any such thing, and, consequently, of that kind of passion which leads to it. It must, therefore, be immortal, and in this doctrine Plato is perfectly uniform and consistent.

"'Every soul,' he says, 'is immortal. That which is always in motion is from eternity, but that which is moved by another must have an end. Accordingly, he mentioned the pre-existence as well as the immortality of the soul; and in the East these two doctrines always went together, and are always ascribed to Pythagoras; the soul and the body being supposed to have only a temporary connection, to answer a particular purpose. 'The soul existed,' he says, 'before bodies were produced, and it is the chief agent in the changes and the ornament of the body.'

"Agreeably to this doctrine of pre-existence, Plato maintained that all the knowledge we seem to acquire here is only the recollection of what we knew in a former state. 'It behoves man,' he says, 'to understand how many sensations are united in one, and this is the recollection of what the soul, when in a state of perfection with God, saw before.'

"So greatly superior, in the idea of all the heathen philosophers, was the soul to the body, the latter being entirely subservient to the former, that we cannot wonder that they considered the soul as the whole self of a man, and the body as a thing foreign to him. 'The mind,' says Plato, 'is all that we call ourselves, and the body attends it,' meaning as a servant. 'It is only after death,' he says, 'when it has got rid of the clog of the body, that we can see what the soul really is, whether compound or simple, and the whole of its condition.' It is on this supposition of the independence of the mind on the body that he advances one of his arguments for the immortality of the soul. 'The soul,' he says, 'cannot die by any affection of the body, but only by some disorder peculiar to itself. The soul, by the death of the body, does not become more unjust, and the death of the body is not the punishment of its injustice, but other punishments; for death is to it a freedom from every evil. Since, then, neither the death of the body, nor its own depravity, can destroy the soul, it must be immortal.'

"That the souls of men are emanations from the Supreme Being, the fountain of all intelligence, seems to have been taken for granted by Plato, but I do not find it distinctly expressed in any part of his writings. He seems, however, to allude to it in a passage that I quoted before; but he generally considers it as retaining its individuality after death; as when he says, 'In truth, the soul of each of us is immortal, and goes to the other gods, to give an account of its actions.' This agrees with his uniform language about the rewards of virtue; and the punishments of vice after death. Whether souls are to be reunited to their source afterwards, which he probably supposed, as being held to be the necessary consequence of their being originally derived from it, this retribution he must have thought would previously take place."

PROPHECY.

OUR Lord commanded to "Search the Scriptures;" which at that time embraced only the Old Testament; thus stamping them with Divine authority; and to them, both He and his disciples made all their appeals; and Paul said to Timothy, "From a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus."—2 Tim. iii. 15.

Peter saith, "We have a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well to take heed," etc. "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."—2 Pet. i. 21.

Such testimonies show that the prophecies of the Old Testament are not to be frittered away, or spoken of as if of little or no consequence.

Thus much in regard to our view of the authority and importance of the Old Testament prophecies. But we now design to speak, specially, of a New Testament prophecy. It is that found in Luke xxi. 23–36.

In this portion of scripture our Lord speaks of things future relating to the Jews, their city, the Gentiles, signs to be witnessed, his own second coming, the redemption of his people, and concludes with solemn admonitions and cautions. To these things we "do well to take heed." A large portion of what our Lord here utters in prophecy, has since become history. The fulfilment of so large a part makes it certain that whatever may remain unfulfilled will assuredly come to pass. This prophecy, in the part accomplished, is demonstration of the truth and divinity of our Lord's claim to be the Messiah, and establishes the truth of revelation beyond any attempt to overthrow it; and infidelity is as powerless for evil, to a sincere inquirer after truth, as the foaming waves dashing against the rocks of Gibraltar. Said the Saviour, "There shall be great distress in the land and wrath upon this people"—the Jews. Did it not happen exactly as prophesied? Will any one pretend to deny but that unparalleled distress fell upon that people? Let them read the history of the Jews, particularly from the time Jerusalem was "compassed about with armies," in A. D. 67, to the siege and fall of the fortress of Masada, A. D. 74.

Luke xxi. 24—"And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled."

"They," the Jews, "shall fall by the edge of the sword;" that is, in war, many of them; not all. Hundreds of thousands of them did thus fall. The remainder of them were "led away captive into all nations;" thus the prophecy has had an exact fulfilment; and the Jews are a standing and perpetual monument that Jesus, whom their nation abhorred and rejected, is in truth the Messiah of whom Moses and the prophets spake. They bear an unwilling testimony to this great gospel declaration that Jesus of Nazareth was approved of God, and is the anointed Saviour. But the prophecy goes on to say—"Jerusalem shall be trodden down, [i. e., be made subject to, or be under the government] of the Gentiles, [i. e., other nations, as distinguished from the Jews], until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." So it has come to pass. From the days of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, no Jew has held power or authority there, and much of the time has not been permitted even to approach the city; or, if there at all, only in the most abject condition. "The times of the Gentiles," of course, is an appointed time, indicated in some other prophecy, most likely in the book of Daniel; but of that we shall not now inquire; it is sufficient for us to know that the time of Gentile rule over Jerusalem has its bounds beyond which it cannot pass. Our Lord next proceeds to give signs which were to indicate to the watchful and sincerely inquiring mind that this treading under foot was about to terminate. These are as follows:

Luke xxi. 25, 26—"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring. Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken."

The signs in the sun, called in other places the sun being darkened, are supposed by some to have had a fulfilment in the dark day of 1780. We cannot, with present light, assent to that view. The darkening of the sun on that day was not on the prophetic land at all. It was confined mostly, if not wholly, to the United States, and was witnessed only by a small part even of these. The phenomena, or signs, according to the analogy of prophecy, must appear in the prophetic earth or land. This, at least, embraced only the old Roman empire, which was in its imperial glory when the prophecy was uttered. If then, these signs in the sun and moon are to be witnessed in those literal orbs, we are compelled to the belief that they are future. We suggest, however, a different interpretation, which, if not correct, is at least very remarkable.

We learn from Gen. i. 14–18, that the lights in the firmament of heaven were not only to divide the day from the night, but "for signs;" and that the sun was "to rule the day," and the moon and stars "to rule the night." Hence, in very early times, the people of God used them as signs of authority and dominion. Thus, we find Jacob interpreting Joseph's dream of the sun, moon and eleven stars, making obeisance to him, as an indication that the father, mother and their other sons were to do him homage, or become subject to Joseph. Whence this conclusion but from the well-known fact that these heavenly bodies were signs of power and authority? The sun was the sign or symbol of the highest authority which, in the case before us, pointed out Jacob the head and supreme ruler of his house, or tribe. The moon denoted the next in authority, viz., the mother of the family: then came the stars—the sons, or rulers of an inferior class. This use of the sun, moon and stars is seen throughout the Jewish prophets, and we may therefore conclude such was the design of our Lord in the text before us, Luke xxi.

We now proceed to an inquiry as to what ruling powers are denoted by these luminaries in this prophecy. We conclude we are to look for them in the Roman empire; and that which most naturally presents itself as symbolized by the sun, is the imperial power of Rome, which was holding its sway at the time the prophecy before us was uttered. That the sun is used as a symbol of that power, by the "faithful and true witness," Rev. viii. 12, is admitted, so far as we know, by all commentators. This point established, then, in symbolical language, the darkening of the sun, or signs in the sun, will signify signs of its decay and extinction. Centuries ago there were signs of the decay of imperial Rome, but its extinction did not occur till the present century. That power was removed by Constantine to Constantinople. There it continued till 1453; when, in the eastern empire, it gave place to the moon power, of which we shall soon speak. Before the imperial power was displaced in the east it had been restored in the west by Charlemagne, A. D. 800. In the western Roman empire it continued down to the days of Napoleon Bonaparte. The earliest date that can be given for its extinction is 1806, when Bonaparte overthrew the Emperor of Germany, or Austria, in whom resided this power at that time. It may, however, be doubted whether that time is the proper point at which to date its extinction, as Napoleon claimed and exercised this power as "the successors of the Cæsars." If, then, it was continued in him, as seems most likely, it was not finally extinguished till the battle of Waterloo, 1815, which sealed the fate of Bonaparte, and put an end, as we believe, forever, to the imperial Roman power. The attempt of the present Napoleon to revive it, has been a miserable failure.

If this view of the subject be the true one, we have the first and most prominent sign of the times of the Gentiles being near an end directly before us, and in our generation. Let it not be forgotten that the signs given us in this prophecy were to be marks of the end of Jerusalem's bondage to other nations, and the signal of the near approach and reign of David's Son on David's throne.

We now proceed to inquire after the power symbolized by "the moon." Let it be remembered it must be found in the old Roman earth, or land; and it must be second in magnitude to the Imperial. Thus situated, we are at no loss to designate the power, viz., the Mohammedan. It is remarkable that "Crescent"—the increasing moon, is the standard of that power. And further, that this power has held possession of Jerusalem ever since A. D. 636, with the exception of about one century that it was in the hands of the Crusaders. This power waxed stronger and stronger for a long period; but within the last century it has given "signs" of waning—and what is remarkable, in about six years after the extinction of the Roman imperial power, in 1815, the Mohammedan, or Ottoman power began to wane and fall with a rapidity that made even her enemies afraid. From the commencement of the Greek revolution, 1821, a series of calamities fell upon this moon power that marked her certain and speedy downfall. She now gives "signs" of soon being turned to blood, or, of having her light as a ruling power extinguished. Here, then, is another sign of the end of "the times of the Gentiles," and of the establishment of the kingdom of God.

Having thus prepared the way, we can have no hesitation in saying that the various monarchies of Europe are the powers symbolized by "the stars." Just prior to the times of the Gentiles ending, and the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth, under the reign of David's Son on the throne of his father, there would be "signs in the stars"—or indications of these lesser monarchies being extinguished. Here we need hardly enter into any details. The convulsions in Europe, commencing in 1848, though they have seemed, at times, to be at an end, proclaim, with a trumpet tongue, that this part of the prophecy is being fulfilled before our eyes, which leaves us in no doubt as to the point in earth's history which we now occupy. Every throne in Europe was shaken in a manner that indicated in 1848–9 they were soon to fall like stars from heaven, to rise no more; but more on this point hereafter.

USE OF WORDS AND PHRASES.

WE have never denied but what words and phrases are sometimes used in a figurative or secondary sense: but we affirm that living existence is chiefly meant by the term "eternal life" in Scripture language; i. e., it embraces that as the first element. That the term life has special reference to a living existence in some passages, and that such is the leading use of it in the Bible, we see not how any impartial mind can doubt.

Take the first chapter of Genesis, where the terms life and living occur for the first time in the Bible, and see if it is not a living existence that is set forth by the terms. "God said, let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life," etc. "God created . . . every living creature that moveth," etc. "And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature," etc. "Every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life," etc.

It is easy to multiply these expressions from Genesis, which must be the basis of our conclusion for the use of these terms elsewhere in the Bible.

Let us now look into the New Testament. John v. 26. "As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself." Is there any doubt but that life proper—or living existence—is what is meant in this text? This is an important text as the foundation, showing from whence the promised life—eternal life—is to come. Our opposers quote verse 24, of the same chapter:

"He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life," and say "Everlasting life is here affirmed as a present possession of the soul, and death is spoken of as a past condition of souls that have begun to live." He adds—"Surely that condition was not one of non-existence, but of mortal ruin. But the import of death, by antithesis, must define that of life used in immediate juxtaposition."

Here, as usual, they substitute "soul" for our Lord's "He that heareth," etc. Our Lord makes it the person, the man. Our opposers make it "the soul." "Everlasting life is a present possession of the soul," say our opponents, "of souls that have begun to live." Let us here ask them—can these souls now suffer? Can they be unhappy? Can they be "exceeding sorrowful?" If so, the "possession" of "everlasting life" is no security for unmixed happiness: and what becomes of the idea that "eternal life" means "eternal happiness?" That notion is exploded, for the believer has "everlasting life as a present possession;" but he is not always happy: far otherwise.

"Everlasting life is here affirmed as a present possession" to him that "believeth." That, in a qualified sense, we believe. Christ takes the believer's life into his own keeping. If the believer falls "asleep"—for that is all he does—his "life is" still "hid with Christ in God; and when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall" the believer "appear with him in glory."—Col. iii. 3, 4. By sin Adam lost the right to everlasting life, and was excluded from the tree of life, lest he should "take and eat thereof, and live forever."

Will some of our opposers tell us if the Lord God meant by that exclusion of Adam to prevent his ever obtaining a "spiritual life?" Did he mean to keep him from ever becoming holy? But this is a little digression, though a very natural one.

After all, the actual "possession of everlasting life" is reserved for "the world to come." "He shall receive," saith our Lord, "in the world to come eternal life."—Mark x. 30. And Paul said to Timothy, "Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life."—1 Tim. vi. 12. It was still future, notwithstanding Timothy's "spiritual" life.

The believer "is passed from death unto life." "Death is spoken of," say our opponents, "as a past condition." True; but do they not observe that it is "condemnation" to "death," that was the "past condition?" So it is evident from the text itself. Besides, our Lord taught Nicodemus, two chapters previously, "He that believeth on him [the Son of God] is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already," etc. The believer does now pass from "condemnation" to "death, unto life." The sentence of death, in his case, is so far revoked that he may come again into a life that is eternal. He is in Christ, and Christ's Spirit is in him; and saith an apostle, Rom. viii. 11, "If the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you."

Was Jesus spiritually dead? Was that the death from which God raised his Son? But it was the same death from which the same Spirit would quicken those in whom it dwelt.

"'If one died for all then were all dead.'"—2 Cor. v. 14. "Who imagines by this," say our opposers, "is meant, then were all non-existent?"

Truly, who does "imagine" it! We know of none; and how the imagination entered their heads to ask such a question, we cannot tell, unless "the soul" spectre induced it.

"If one died for all then were all" condemned to death, is the natural import of the apostle's words: for saith he, Rom. v. 16, "the judgment was by one to condemnation;" and he adds, verse 17, "by one man's offence death reigned:" all were condemned to death, and Christ died for all, because all were thus condemned to death. Hence we find an easy and scriptural solution of the text.

We now wish to state a fact. Our Saviour gave as one of the evidences of his Messiahship, "To the poor the gospel is preached;" Luke vii. 22; and Paul saith, 1 Cor. i. 26, "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called," etc. The fact in these texts is this, "the poor" and the unlearned were those, chiefly, who embraced the gospel and were benefitted by it. Hence it is both unreasonable and absurd to suppose the gospel promises were in mystical language. According to that theory there ought to have been many wise and learned men to teach the poor and unlearned that the words of promise, of "life, and eternal life," meant not what they seemed to import, according to the laws of human language, interpreted according to the laws of human speech; but "moral life," or "spiritual life;" which phrases, however, we believe never once occur in the Scriptures of truth; and hence are suspicious phrases, to say the least.

Our Lord and his apostles use the phrases life, eternal life, everlasting life, hundreds of times, and never once caution their hearers that these terms are to be understood in any other sense than that of a literal living existence—such an existence as their hearers now possessed, extended without being interrupted by death, as their present life is. This fact outweighs all the learned efforts of theologians to establish a contrary view.

For our opposers to thrust forward perpetually the idea that we maintain life includes no more than "mere existence," is to show they are not informed as to our real sentiments, or are unwilling to have them appear. We maintain that life, and eternal life—as promises of the gospel—embrace a living existence as "the gift of God through Jesus Christ," and that living existence one of uninterrupted enjoyment and delight. Theologians reject the living existence, as a gospel blessing, and contend that eternal life is only "eternal bliss and excellency." Which of us most honor our Lord Jesus Christ? and which speaks most according to the laws of human language? Let the reader judge.

We now proceed directly with our evidence that a living "existence," and that chiefly, is meant by the terms live, life, and eternal life in some passages of Scripture. Bearing in mind the one, "As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself," we proceed.

"I am he that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive forevermore."—Rev. i. 18. Does any one question our risen Lord here meant literal life and death?

"Because I live ye shall live also."—John xiv. 19. Is here any room for doubt that a literal life is meant?

"I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me though he were dead yet shall he live."—John xi. 25. Are not life and death literal here? If not, so may not the "resurrection" be; and our Lord's words were but poor comfort to weeping Martha whose brother was dead.

"He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal."—John xii. 25. "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it."—Matt. xvi. 25. Is there—can there be—any doubt but literal life is here spoken of? We are sure there cannot be according to the laws of human language, interpreted according to the laws of human speech.

Again—"Who is made not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life." . . . "Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."—Heb. vii. 16, 25. Do any doubt that literal life is the true, if not the only idea here? The Priests under the law "were not suffered to continue by reason of death," verse 23; but Jesus was made a Priest "after the power of an endless life," and "ever liveth to make intercession for them that come to God by him." Nothing can be plainer.

"For if by one man's offence, death reigned by one, much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ."—Rom. v. 17. Here the connection shows that literal death and life are subjects of discourse. "Sin entered into the world and death by sin." . . . "death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression." Verses 12, 14. Here we see what death is spoken of; and verse 17 repeats the identical words "death reigned by one," but those "which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life"—a future blessing promised, to be obtained "by one, Jesus Christ;" and it is not a "moral state" that constitutes the life; but a specified moral state is a pre-requisite to attaining that life eternal.

These texts are a sample of many others in which life, or eternal life—meaning a living existence—is the subject of discourse, and the promise of the gospel. Our opponents' efforts to establish a contrary view may satisfy their own minds; but we are sure, in this, they "speak not according to the law and to the testimony;" nor could they speak as they do, at all, with even an appearance of truth, if they had not changed man's personality for a soul-entity; the existence of which they have assumed, and then converted "he—him—man," etc.,—terms used by our Lord—into their ideal "soul:" thus departing from Scripture language to teach the "traditions of men."

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

"And after six days Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them: and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light. And, behold, there appeared unto them Moses and Elias, talking with him."—Matt. xvii. 1–3. (See also Mark ix. 2–4; Luke ix. 28, 30).

THESE texts, like many others that have no reference whatever to the subject, and hence cannot, without doing violence to principles of sound reason, be thought to favor the idea of consciousness in death, are not unfrequently urged in support of that theory. As Elijah did not die, but was carried bodily up from the earth into heaven, we may fairly suppose, it will not be contended by any that his participation in the scene of transfiguration affords, even by the remotest implication, the slightest evidence of conscious survivance in death.

With Moses, however, the case is somewhat different, for he died and was buried. To those, therefore, who base their explication of the text upon the assumption that an entity in man (an entity which constitutes, it is held, the real man) exists as a living, responsible being while the material organization is dead, the circumstances of Moses' presence at the transfiguration seems somewhat indicative that a soul-entity survives the death of what is termed the body. These should not fail to consider the fact that this mode of approaching any passage of Scripture, while it may result in strengthening their existing convictions, must of necessity work them positive injury if their convictions happen to be erroneous. Mr. George remarks:

"That the soul survives the body is evinced by the fact that Moses was alive in the time of the Saviour, although his body had been dead more than fourteen hundred years."—p. 127.

The reader will perceive the pointed distinction here between Moses and his body. Moses was alive "although his body had been dead more than fourteen hundred years." This is consistent with the popular theory, which makes the material organization no part of the man proper, the man being an assumed immortal part, called the soul; but we will show that it is not consistent as well with the testimony of inspiration, but is directly opposed thereto. It must not be forgotten that our "Rev." author and his coadjutors insist that an immaterial soul was Moses himself, all else being merely his body, a mere tenement, its life and sense depending upon the presence of the soul.

"And the Lord said unto Moses, Get thee up into this mount Abarim, and see the land which I give unto the children of Israel. And when thou hast seen it, thou also shalt be gathered unto thy people, as Aaron thy brother was gathered."—Num. xxvii. 12, 13. How was Aaron gathered unto his people? "And Aaron shall be gathered unto his people, and shall die there. . . . And Aaron died there in the top of the mount. . . . And when all the congregation saw that Aaron was dead, they mourned for Aaron thirty days."—Num. xx. 26, 28, 29. Moses himself said: "But I must die in this land, I must not go over Jordan."—Deut. iv. 22.

"So Moses the servant of the Lord died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord. . . . And Moses was an hundred and thirty years old when he died: his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated."—Deut. xxxiv. 5, 7. God afterward said unto Joshua, "Moses my servant is dead." If an immaterial entity constituted the intelligent, responsible Moses, then that entity must unquestionably have been that which served God, and hence was said to be "the servant of the Lord." This conclusion is positively unavoidable; but it is said, "Moses the servant of the Lord died." Therefore, arguing from their own chosen premise, our friends of the inherent immortality faith must of necessity admit, if at all consistent, that their soul-entity Moses died. Then again: why should it be said of this soul-entity Moses, that "his eye was not dim," if he was immortal and consequently had eyes which could not grow dim? And why the expression, "nor his natural force abated?" Is a purely spiritual existence, such as a soul-entity is said to be, possessed of natural force, which may abate? How many are the gross absurdities into which the theory inevitably leads. How unfortunate for such a position is it that inspiration did not say it was only the "body" of Moses that died, instead of again and again declaring it was Moses himself. Notwithstanding the word of God so plainly declares that Moses died and was buried, Mr. George and others affirm he did not die, and was not buried. What an awful responsibility do they assume who thus speak against God. May they yet see their error, and repent of it.

But the question arises, why was not Moses permitted to enter the promised inheritance? In answering this we shall see that other insuperable objections to the theory we are considering present themselves. The Lord said to Moses: "Get thee up into this mountain Abiram, unto mount Nebo, which is in the land of Moab, that is over against Jericho; and behold the land of Canaan . . . and die in the mount whither thou goest up, and be gathered unto thy people; as Aaron thy brother died in mount Hor, and was gathered unto his people: Because ye trespassed against me among the children of Israel at the waters of Meribah-Kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin."—Deut. xxxii. 49, 50, 51. Moses told the children of Israel how he said: "O Lord God, thou hast begun to show thy servant thy greatness, and thy mighty hand: for what God is there in heaven or in earth that can do according to thy works, and according to thy might? I pray thee, let me go over, and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon. But the Lord was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me: and the Lord said unto me, Let it suffice thee: speak no more unto me of this matter."—Deut. iii. 24, 25, 26. See also Psa. cvi. 32, 33.

Thus we see it was in punishment for transgression that Moses died without entering the promised land: it was "because" he "trespassed against" the Lord "among the children of Israel at the waters of Meribah-Kadesh." The popular theory not only denies that Moses died, but it would have us believe that God took him to heaven in punishment for transgression. Was old Canaan so much more delightful than is heaven that it was a real punishment to Moses to keep him out of the one by taking him to the other? On the other hand, if the heaven to which latter-day theology sends soul-entities immediately at the death of what is called "the body" be far more glorious than any part of earth can be, why did Moses, if he believed in going there at death, pray so fervently to be permitted to cross over to and live in Canaan?

To suppose the chosen leader of Israel capable of such pleading for permission to remain longer out of a place of unalloyed happiness is to suspect him of the greatest folly. If the prophet and leader had plead Israel's need of his longer presence with them the case would be quite different, but he does not intimate any ground for his desire to enter the inheritance other than the pleasure it would afford him, and, of course, the longer life which the granting of his prayer would involve.

No Scripture truth can be better established than that Moses himself (not his body merely, as is so confidently asserted) died. What, then, follows as an inevitable conclusion? Why, that if he was present at the transfiguration he was first raised from the dead; and hence his appearance upon that occasion cannot be considered as affording the faintest indication that any part of man, much less the man himself, exists in a conscious state between death and the resurrection.

It is objected to the spirit-entity theory, that, "if only Moses' immaterial soul was there it could not be seen by mortal eyes." In reply to this it is urged that "separate spirits" can be invested with form, and thus "present themselves to material eyes." Since it would have required quite as great display of omnipotent power to furnish the immaterial Moses with a temporary form in precise likeness to the natural as it did to raise him from the dead, we cannot keenly appreciate the decided preference of our opponents for the supposition that the former miracle was wrought, and especially as the Moses who appeared was the Moses whom inspiration declares died; nor can we account for the existence of that preference in any other way than that they fully recognize the fact that the admission of the resurrection of Moses would be an acknowledgment that the text in no wise favors their theory. That they should first prove an existence of immaterial soul-entities which may be invested with form, and thus "present themselves to mortal eyes," is an obligation which they persistently ignore, obvious though it is. Why is this? Simply because such an existence is not susceptible of proof, it having nothing more substantial and reliable than bare assumption to support it. If a thing is revealed in the word of God it need not be assumed; if not thus revealed, it should not be assumed. To all, then, we would say, "be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you." How immeasurably would Christendom be advantaged if men were as energetic in search for truth as they are in defence of error.

Dr. Adam Clarke, speaking of the transfiguration, in connection with the resurrection of the dead and changing of those who are alive at the coming of Christ, says:

"He probably gave the full representation of this in the person of Moses, who died, and was thus raised to life, (or appeared as he shall appear when raised from the dead at the last day;) and in the person of Elijah, who never tasted death. Both their bodies exhibit the same appearance, to show, that the bodies of glorified saints are the same, whether the person had been translated, or whether he had died."

Prof. Mattison, a learned Methodist, once published a work entitled Spirit Rappings Unveiled, in which, in connection with a statement of what he "supposed" to have occasioned "the 'dispute' between Michael the archangel and satan 'about the body of Moses,'" spoken of by Jude, he remarks:

"If this explanation is correct, (and to say the least, it is highly probable,) it affords much ground for the belief that God has settled the 'dispute' by raising the body of Moses from the dead, and that he appeared on the Mount of transfiguration precisely as Elias appeared."

The command of Jesus, "Tell the vision to no man till the Son of man be risen from the dead," suggests the possibility, perhaps probability, that the prophet and the law-giver were not personally present at the transfiguration, but were represented. As Christ was declared to be "the first-born from the dead" (to an incorruptible life) "that in all things he might have the pre-eminence," Col. i. 18, "the first-fruit of them that slept," 1 Cor. xv. 20, we are forced to the conclusion that if Moses was raised from the dead it was only temporarily. That the transaction was a vision, an appearance, is regarded as quite probable by Dr. Clarke, who thinks that Moses was either raised to life "or appeared now as he shall appear when raised from the dead at the last day."

If Moses and Elijah were personally present, we may reasonably conclude that as the "Law and the Prophets" were connected, and as Christ was "the end of the Law," the Law in the person of Moses, the legislator; and the prophets, represented by Elijah, were brought together to formally render up their authority unto the Messiah. This seems to be rendered the more reasonable by Luke's account, chap. ix. 31, that the three talked of "his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem." The soul-entity theory derives no support whatever from the account of the transfiguration in any just exposition. On the contrary it may properly be held to oppose it.

"But they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed they had seen a spirit."—Luke xxiv. 37.

In Matt. xiv. 26, "they were troubled, saying, It is a spirit," the word is phantasma; and Griesbach, a very excellent authority, has given the same word in this passage. Phantasma, or a phantasm is described by Webster as, "an image formed by the mind, and supposed to be real; an imaginary existence which seems to be real; a shadowy or airy appearance; sometimes an optical illusion." All will at once see that the text cannot with reason or consistency be claimed as affording evidence of a separate conscious existence of any part of man when the other part is dead, and hence to multiply words in elucidation of what is already sufficiently clear would be a waste of time and effort.

It is said the soul or spirit is "immaterial, uncompounded, indivisible. To claim, therefore, that the apostles were affrighted because they thought they saw an existence the very nature of which, a fact they would not have been unaware of, precludes its being seen is to urge that they were to some extent subjects of dementation. Until popular theology gives to the world a new definition or description of its fancied spirit-entity it can lay no claim to this text, unless, indeed, they are willing to admit that their spirit-entity idea is a phantasm. THE CAMP-MEETING.

We again direct attention of friends to this subject, and invite a general expression of substantial interest in it. At the anniversary of 1870 the feeling was unanimous that we should have a camp-meeting, and now that the efficient committee then chosen have secured delightful grounds for that purpose, and are fitting up the same in a becoming manner, we trust all interested in the work of disseminating what we believe to be glorious truth will come forward now with open hand, doing our whole duty in furnishing pecuniary aid; and when the time arrives, go there with pure minds and loving hearts, prepared to both minister and be ministered unto of spiritual comfort and strength.

We are requested to give notice that the committee are called to meet in Springfield, on Wednesday, June 21, at the office of Br. R. E. Ladd, No. 1 Opera House, at 2 P. M., to complete arrangements for the meeting.

We again publish the list of pledges. Some new cash contributions have been made during the past few days, and some of the old pledges have been paid. We trust none will conclude that enough has already been done, or that if they withhold, the needed sum will be made up by others. If each will do his or her duty, the work will be accomplished without being felt to be a burden upon any. Let us all do what we can, and so direct our efforts that we shall not do it vainly.

THE HOLY SPIRIT'S HELP.

The influence of the Divine Spirit which our Lord promised, is not to be understood as confirmed to the apostles and other early disciples, or to such miraculous powers as were conferred on them. Would Jesus have said in that case, "I pray not for them alone, but for those also who shall believe on me through their word?" Or would Paul, when writing to the Romans, who had at that time received no miraculous gifts, have said, "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us:" . . . "as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God," . . . "if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you;" . . . "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his:" . . . "the Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit?" "Repent and be baptized," said Peter to the multitude, . . . "and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, as many as the Lord your God shall call." The gift of the Holy Spirit, therefore, is held out to all who have been thus called; i. e., have heard the Gospel preached to them, and is as effectual for their private individual wants, as the miraculous powers bestowed on the apostles, were for the wants of the infant church. To each of us is promised, no less the far more important benefit of the inward comfort—the guidance, the spiritual sanctification of heart, which every man needs, and of which every Christian is invited to partake. The necessity of miraculous evidences to establish our religion has ceased; since enough evidence has been left to satisfy a candid mind. The gift of tongues is no longer required, since ignorant fishermen are not (as then) called upon suddenly to proclaim the gospel in distant lands; but every individual Christian who comes into the world, being born of the frail and sinful race of Adam, has need of being "born again," as our Lord says, "of water and of the Spirit, in order to enter into the kingdom of heaven." And we have daily need throughout our lives of the renewing influence of the Holy Spirit, to enable us to know and love God, since "no one," says our Lord, "can come unto me, except my Father who hath sent me draw him." We all need his heavenly light to clear our eyes from spiritual blindness, and to enable us to see all things in their true colors, and shape, and magnitude. We all need his "Spirit which helpeth our infirmities," that we may "be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, and able to stand against the wiles of the devil." From all the delusions, in short, and from all the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil, the Christian can only be preserved by the Spirit of Christ dwelling in him; which he has, therefore, as much need to seek, and may have as full confidence of obtaining, as the apostles themselves.—Archbishop Whately.

STANFORD ON PLATO.

Charles S. Stanford, who has given to the world a translation of Plato's Phœdo, and himself a believer in the popular theory of man, writes: "Though Plato has composed an excellent dialogue on the immortality, yet he has fallen into gross errors on this subject, both in relation to the substance of the soul—which he believed to be composed of two parts, the one spiritual, the other corporeal—and in regard to its origin, considering souls as pre-existing, and derived from heaven, to animate different bodies in succession; and that, after having been purified, they shall return to heaven, from which, at the end of a certain number of years, they shall be again employed to animate, successively different bodies; so that there would be nothing but a continual round of defilement and purification, and returns to heaven and dismissions to earth, to animate bodies.

"As he thought that these souls did not forget, entirely, what they had experienced in the different bodies which they had animated, he pretended, that the knowledge which they acquire, is reminiscence of what they had formerly known, rather than new knowledge; and on this gratuitously assumed reminiscence, he founded his dogma of the pre-existence of souls.

"The reasoning here exhibited, on which Plato founded the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, comes under that species of sophism styled by logicians reasoning in a circle. Thus, the very light of the heathen was darkness; and the foundation of their confidence was nothing more stable than doubt. It was reserved for Jesus Christ 'to bring life and immortality to light by the Gospel.'

"Plato supposed the human soul to be an emanation of the divinity: 'Divinæ particulam auræ;' and that after purifications by various transmigrations, it was again re-absorbed into the divine essence. But this hypothesis, instead of proving, would disprove the immortality of the soul. The emanation of the divinity, for instance, that constituted the soul of Plato, was a distinct individual, whilst it animated the body or any other body which it might afterward enter; its enjoyments and sufferings were referable to the being called self, by an unavoidable impulse or spontaneity of of nature; or, to speak more philosophically, by a continuity of consciousness, linked together by memory, and producing an invincible conviction of personal identity: but when re-absorbed into the divine essence, its personal identity and appropriating consciousness must cease with its separate existence; and, to the individual, this is equal to annihilation.

"Again, on the supposition that the soul was created (the only rational or tenable doctrine), Plato and his disciples allowed that it must perish, 'Volt enim (Panætius scil), quod nemo negat, quincquid natum sit interire.'—Tusc. Disput. lib. i. 32. The natural tendency of Plato's doctrine, then, is to prove the soul to be mortal, and the Deity mutable and perishable, by an indefinite number of emanations. . . .

"For a specimen of beautiful confusion, in explaining Plato's doctrine of the immortality of the soul, see Cicero's Somnium Scipionis; and, for a proof of its incapability to convince his own mind, see his Tusculan Questions, lib. i. sub. int."—Selected by F. H. Burbank.

FROM WM. NICHOLS.

Br. Storrs: I write to inform you that old Dr. Welch, who formerly preached in North Pearl street Baptist church, in this city, has safely arrived in heaven. This truly gratifying intelligence was announced by Rev. Dr. Bridgeman to his congregation on the 28th of May. The old Dr. started on his journey last December, or then they said they buried him; but if the report is true, as declared by Dr. Bridgeman, there must be some mistake; for he tells us, "the saints and angels of God crowded the gates of pearl to hail him welcome home." "His mother has bowed to loose the dusty sandals from his feet. His child, Sarah, has waved the green palm for joy that he is more than conqueror, through Him that loved him; and, above all, the Lamb in the midst of the throne has fed him and led him forth to fountains of living waters, and God has wiped all tears from his eyes."

So you see the old fashioned notion of the coming of Christ and resurrection of the body of his people is "played out." You have been a great stickler for this and kindred doctrines, as we all know; but what will you do now, when news comes so direct, that there is no need of a resurrection? for, if the report be true, his body is there, for he wore sandals; for who ever heard of a soul wearing "dusty sandals?" and another thing, he must have taken some overland route, for how else can we account for the "dust on them?" Surely we live in an age of progress.

I send you the closing part of the sermon, so you can see I write nothing but by good authority. I have no doubt you will be glad to hear the old Dr. is "all right," although it may perhaps seem to conflict with some of your theological notions.

Albany, N. Y., June 5, 1871.

The following is the "closing part" of the sermon spoken of by Br. Nichols:

"With him the struggle and the strife of pain are over. His life's a tale that is told. The saints and angels of God have already crowded the gates of pearl to hail him wel come home! He has entered into the fellowship of those with whom he took sweet counsel here on earth and in those courts which now are vanished. Those who helped him in his ministry are there and rejoicing with him in the full completeness of our Lord's salvation. His mother has bowed to loose the dusty sandals from his feet. His child, Sarah, has waved the green palm for joy that he is more than conqueror through Him that hath loved him. Above all, 'the Lamb in the midst of the throne has fed him and led him forth to fountains of living waters, and God has wiped away all tears from his eyes.' Rest, rest, O conqueror rest. The Lord of the harvest has brought thee to the grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in its season."

So it seems the "orthodox" heaven and "the grave" are one and the same place, according to the statement of Dr. Bridgeman.

FROM LOVILLA FIDLER.

Br. Storrs: I am as firm as ever in the faith once delivered to the saints. Although a stranger to you, yet we are not strangers to Christ and the blessed promises of God through him. How glad I am that Jesus ever sought after me and made me one of his servants. Yet I am sorrowful when I think how poor and unfaithful my service has been. How sweet to me is the communion of saints. How cheering to read the warm words from the lonely ones who are suffering for Christ and his truth. The Herald seems better to me, and the great principle of Life shines brighter and brighter. By reading it I have been strengthened in my faith and revived in spirit, and feel like making renewed exertions through Christ for eternal life. Pray for me, so that I may with you be enabled to persevere unto the end; for the promise of eternal life is only to those who endure unto the end.

O may we be the truly wise,
Who seek with all our hearts this prize;
Contend no more for earth's renown,
But strive for an immortal crown.

I was sorry that you were deprived of the liberty of writing in the Herald on the promise and oath of God to Abraham. Please send me one of the tracts.

O how glad I would be to have one of those who preach the word of Life to come out here and preach for us. There are several here that do not belong to any church that would help pay the preacher. Some have spoken to me that are very anxious to have a preacher to come some time in September or October; that would be the best time for farmers to turn out.

My love be with you all that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

Good Health is one of the most valuable and useful monthlies that come under our notice. Two years ago introduced to the public, it has steadily worked its way into favor, although having no high-sounding names for an endorsement. Its object and aim is to teach its readers matters pertaining to bodily improvement, and preservation of health. We heartily recommend it to all. Published by Alexander Moore, 2 Hamilton Place, Boston, Mass. Terms $2 a year. H. W. S.

There is surely as much presumption in measuring everything by our own feelings, fancies, and prejudices, as by our own reasonings.—Archbishop Whately.

BETHLEHEM HOME SCHOOL.

This excellent and well-known institution has just passed into the charge of Rev. Ambrose Rondthaler, who for upwards of sixteen years has been a Professional Teacher and Principal of educational institutions in York, and at Bethlehem, Pa.

The course of study is thorough, and all students enter not only the school-room but also become part of the Principal's family. All sectarianism is banished from the school.

The Bible only is the standard of religious instruction.

For terms and particulars send for circular.

Rev. AMBROSE RONDTHALER,
Principal.

Note by the Editor.

It gives us pleasure to insert the above notice in the Herald of Life, that our friends may know where to send their children to a school of a right character. Br. Rondthaler is one of our firmest friends. For many years a minister in the Moravian church, but unsectarian, and a firm believer in the Life views.

Our Strength and Shield.

"Thou art near, O Lord."—Psa. cxix. 151.

Lord! to thy grace the glory be,
That not in guilty fear,
But with the love which yearns to see,
We know that Thou art near.

Yea, Lord, for God with us Thou art,
In Jesus Christ Thy Son,
And by the Spirit in our heart
With Thee Thy church is one.

And Thou art near us in our bliss,
And near in all our woes;
Our strength for toil and conflict this,
Our shield from every foe.

And Thou art near to come, O Lord:
Draws on the glorious day:
The scoffer's scoff confirms Thy word:
Thou wilt not long delay.

Lord Jesus! speed the promised hour;
The veil, which hides thee, rend;
And in the triumph of Thy power
With trump and shout descend!

Untrembling, then, O grant us grace
The archangel's voice to hear;
Undazzled to behold Thy face
In cloudless glory near.

The Abomination of Desolation.—Matt. xxiv.

BY ABEL LARKIN.

As Br. Ellsworth has given an article, recently published in the HERALD, on this subject, and as the investigation of it is truly important and far from being exhausted, I wish to give heed to the admonition of Christ by extending the investigation and inquiry of it.

"What I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." "For the terrible day shall come as a snare on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth."—Mark xiii. 37, Luke xxi. Now if this Abomination of Desolation as mentioned by Matthew, Mark and Daniel is yet future, we should by all means so understand it; hence a belief that puts it in the past must produce a cloud of darkness almost of the blackest die. The dreadful day being at the advent coming, and it being inseparably connected in time with this abomination, i. e., no space of time between them, proves them to be in the future if nothing else does, unless the latter is in process.

But in order to understand, we must give the subject a cautious study, and properly arrange and adjust the prophecies that point to this subject, and not confound any two or more transactions into one.

We admit that the first twelve verses of Matt. xxiv., and of Mark xiii., and also the first twenty-four of Luke xxi. are in the past. "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation is nigh. Then let them that are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them that are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto. For these be the days of vengeance and wrath upon this people."—Luke xxi. 20–22.

This caution was sufficient for all true Christians to leave the place of danger. And the wicked Jews remained to receive the chastening rod of God for their sins and wickedness; and Luke calls the time, the days of vengeance; by which I understand him to mean the vengeance of God on them, or condign punishment; and if so, how, I ask, can we call it an abomination? Upon this principle we might call it an abomination to send a thief to the penitentiary.

But, says one, Does not Luke call these days of vengeance, or the destruction of Jerusalem, an abomination of desolation? No. Noah's flood might as well be called such. Neither do Matthew, Mark, or Daniel, who speak of this abomination of desolation, intimate that it is any thing but an abominable persecution on the saints, and which calls forth the wrath of God, and almost, as in the flood, smites the entire family of man into oblivion; and which is called the terrible day of the Lord, such as never has been or will again be.

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place," etc., and which is Jerusalem (see Dan. ix. 16), "then let him which is on the house top not come down to take any thing out of the house. Neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes. But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day."—Matt. xxiv. 17–20.

Now why was this special warning given to make, as it were, an instantaneous flight, as if to flee from instant death? Where is the consistency of applying this advice to the Christians at the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in A. D. 70, when, in fact, it had been besieged some two or three years before, for nearly a week, by Cestius, when he and his army left the country? This gave the Christians ample time, and which they embraced to sell and dispose of all their property without pressure or want of time.

The two transactions, that is, the destruction of Jerusalem and this abomination of desolation, are so dissimilar as to have little or no resemblance; and of course it was requisite that the admonitions should be equally so; yet both of them at the same place but at different times.

This abomination is variously described in prophecy. Ezekiel says, "Thou shalt ascend and come like a storm (hence haste to get out of the way), thou shalt be like a cloud to cover the land, thou, and all thy lands, and many people with thee."—xxxviii. 1. "It shall also come to pass, that at the same time shall things come into thy mind, and thou shalt think an evil thought."—Ver. 10. Daniel calls him "a vile person."—xi. 21. "To take a spoil, and to take a prey; to turn thy hand upon the desolate places that are now inhabited, and upon the people that are gathered out of the nations, which have gotten cattle and goods, that dwell in the midst of the land."—Ver. 12. "Thou shalt come from thy place out of the North parts against my people of Israel in the latter days."—Ver. 16.

Now the question is, Has this prophecy been fulfilled? If it has, we are down the channel of time below the latter days. When did we pass those days? But ere long a reaction takes place, for the prophet says, "And I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood, and I will rain upon him, and upon his hands, and upon the many people that are with him, an overwhelming rain, and great hailstones, fire and brimstone."—Ver. 23. Now, I ask if it is possible that this notorious event could have passed, and the history of the civilized world not even mention it? And who can put it the other side of the advent coming? They who watch with the study of understanding, are "the wise," who "shall understand," for in this way only can we improve our talents by the trade of interchanging views, and their investigation.

If the abomination spoken of at the head of this article is in the future, and I am convinced it is, we should watch so as to understand the events, and the various transactions and causes from which it is to come. If we see stamped on the prophetic record the temple of God at a place it may not now be, shall we ignore the fact because it is not yet there re-built? Even if it is said, the Man of sin is in it, and polluting it. The first inquiry is, how is this temple to be built? And second, by whom, if not by the people for whom it is built? And third, Who is this Man of sin, 2 Thess. ii. 4? But as my space is small, I will give only a short answer to the last question.

This son of perdition is Ezekiel's king of the North; and the abomination of desolation he makes, is his war on the saints of Dan. vii. 21, 22, 25, when times and laws are in his hands for a time, times, and the dividing of time; that is, as Daniel has it, xii. 10, 1290 days; that is the length of the persecution, when a reaction takes place against him, and he comes to his end and none shall help him, when Michael stands up for the children of thy people. See the description from the second verse of the 11th chapter onward. Also read another rehearsal of the same act: 'And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week (seven years); and in the midst of the week (1290 days, almost the exact half of the covenant, or last week in which sin and transgression are to be finished), he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease; and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation." — ix. 27. "And power was given unto him to continue 42 months," 1260 days, Rev. xiii. 5, with but little interruption. See also chap. xii., referring to the same scene.

This great and wicked power, I understand to be the last and healed head of the beast of seven heads and ten horns, and is of the Greek kingdom, then standing at the head of the apostacy, and wielding the principal sword of dictation—the papal heads of the beast having fallen. Now let the reader recollect that from the commencement of this war, or persecution on the saints, there is no intermission or cessation until judgment is given the saints and they enter the kingdom. This proves the scene to be in the future.

Daniel speaking again on this event says, "They that understand among the people shall instruct many; and they shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." But we must remember that he says that at the time of this instruction, and at the same time this knowledge shall be increased, he also says, "Yet they shall fall by spoil, by captivity, by sword, and by flame, many days."—xi. 33. Could I put this oppression anywhere but in the future, glad would I be. But, says one, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven.'—Matt. xxiv. 29. Now this dark day was in A. D. 1780, and of course the abomination is in the past; and it was the papal persecution predicted by the prophets, and which continued for more than 1200 years, but it was before the dark day.

Let us examine this point a little. Joel ii. 30 says, "I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." Now, the Bible speaks of but one great and dreadful day, or time, of the Lord, such as has never been or will be again. And of course Joel and Matthew mean the same event. Consequently the sun is to be darkened not only before that time, but also immediately after it. But has the first prophetic event occurred? No: for the location is when "The Lord shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice out of Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake: so shall ye know that I am the Lord your God, dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain: then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall no strangers pass through her any more."—Verses 16, 17. Hence the dark day of 1780 is unworthy of prophetic notice.

MT. STERLING, ILL., May 28, 1871.

Don't Spare the Seed.

A YOUNG farmer had his field nicely ploughed and harrowed, and was about to put in the seed. He first measured the field, and found how many rods there were in it. He next measured a rod, and calculated how many plants it would take to fill it. He then calculated the seed in a half-gill, in a pint, a quart, and in a bushel. The result was that he was satisfied that people usually sow four times the seed necessary. A peck was just as good as a bushel. Now seed was very dear, and if he could save three-fourths of his seed, it would be worth the while.

So he sowed his peck of seed—"sowed sparingly," and at harvest time the crop was not worth gathering! He was greatly disappointed. Where was the mistake? He felt sure he had calculated and measured right. He then went to old Mr. Experience, a farmer of long standing and of great success, and told him his troubles.

"I am sure I calculated right."

"No you didn't calculate right."

"Why not?"

"Did you calculate for the poor seed that could not germinate at any rate? There is a great deal of such in every bushel we sow."

"Why, I never thought of that."

"Did you calculate for some that would be buried too deep, or get into holes and not sprout?"

"Certainly not."

"Did you calculate for a great deal that would lie on the top of the ground, and which the birds would pick up before the rains fell, when it could take root."

"I never thought of that either."

"Did you calculate for what the wind would blow off, or you would throw off from your lot?"

"No, sir."

"Very well. You see how it is it that you did not obtain a harvest. 'He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly.' It is a law of God's wise government that runs through everything. You may think it over the next time you measure out your seed, and it will be worth more to you than the crop you have lost."

"I don't understand you, Mr. Experience. Will you please to explain it to me a little?"

"Well now, what ails Mr. Easy's family that they don't turn out better?"

"Very plain, sir; they were sent to school very little during the week, went to the Sabbath school only now and then, were not taught and made to be industrious. They were not rightly educated."

"In other words, they were neglected—the seed of what makes valuable character was too sparingly sown. The seed of industry and frugality and of religion was not sown freely, and they reap sparingly. There's our minister, a dear, good man. But he gets discouraged. He preaches on the Sabbath and sees no results. He feels that to go out here and there in the neglected neighborhoods would do no good. He wonders why he must sow so much seed and gather in no more. How many of his best sermons have been apparently lost in the air! And yet he should not be discouraged. He must sow his seed in the morning and not withhold in the evening and sow beside all waters. Much will be lost. Even the seed of life thrown upon the ten lepers from the hand of our Saviour took root only in one heart. What if our labors and toils, to a good degree, be lost? We must sow the more. It is a great and general law of God that 'He that soweth bountifully shall reap bountifully.'"

"Thank you, thank you, Mr. Experience. I will think it over. I see just how I made a mistake—and more than one. I will go home and talk it over with my sister Mary. We have both been teachers in our Sabbath school for years, as you know. We were talking it over lately, how it is that we have seen so little fruit in our classes. I see how it is—we have been too sparing of the seed. We have not studied the lessons enough, been interested enough, and have not prayed enough over it and for them. We have thought that a peck of seed ought to produce as much as a bushel. We never calculated that we should sow much poor seed, that some of it would never get into the soil before the birds picked it up, and that some would be blown off. I see it now! I see that the farmer, the minister, the teacher—all must sow bountifully if they would reap bountifully.—Selected.

Gideon's Fleece.

GIDEON was the fifth of the judges of Israel spoken of in the Bible, and the greatest of them all. When we first hear of him, he was grown up and had sons; and no doubt he had already shown himself brave in war against the Midianite Arabs of the desert, who had oppressed Israel for seven years, and whose great numbers (compared to locusts) had every year destroyed all the produce of Canaan, except what could be hidden away in places hard to get at and easy to defend.

When the angel appeared to Gideon, he was threshing wheat with a flail in a wine-press, to hide it from the robbers. His call to be a deliverer, and his destruction of Baal's altar, are spoken of in the sixth chapter of Judges.

After this begins the second act of Gideon's life. Clothed by the Spirit of God, he blew a trumpet, and the tribes of Zebulon, Naphthali and Asher joined him. But Gideon's trust was not in himself or in a large army, but in Israel's God; and before going out to battle with the Midianites, he asked a double sign from God that he would deliver Israel by his hand. "Behold," said he, "I will put a fleece of wool on the ground; and if the dew be on the fleece only, and it be dry on all the earth beside, then shall I know that Thou wilt save Israel by mine hand, as Thou hast said." God graciously granted his desire; for when Gideon rose up early in the morning, and took up the fleece and wrung the dew out of it, a bowl was filled with water. Gideon then asked that it should be dry only on the fleece, and that upon all the ground there should be dew. And God did so that night: for it was dry upon the fleece only, and all the ground was wet with dew.

Thirty-two thousand men answered Gideon's call to come and fight the heathen host; but God said to Gideon, that the people that were with him were too many for Him to give the Midianites into their hands, lest Israel should vaunt themselves against Him, and say, Mine own hand hath saved me. He, therefore, caused Gideon to lessen his army until he had only three hundred men left.

To each of these three hundred men Gideon gave a trumpet, and also a lamp, placed inside of a pitcher to hide the light. He then divided them into three companies, and ordered them to place themselves on three sides of the sleeping Midianite army, and at midnight, when they heard him blow his trumpet, they were all to blow theirs, break the pitchers which hid their lights, and rush on the enemy, shouting, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon!"

The Midianites, hearing of a sudden the sound of so many trumpets, and seeing so many lights, thought they were attacked by a vast army, and were so seized with terror that they first began to slay one another, and afterward they took to flight, followed closely by Gideon and his men, who destroyed so many of them (including their Sheiks or Kings), that they never troubled Israel again as long as Gideon lived.

During the forty years peace that followed this splendid victory, the people thought so much of Gideon that they wished to make him king; but he refused, saying, that God was their King, and that to Him all honor and glory belonged.

From the life of this remarkable man we may learn the lessons of humility, and trust in God.—Selected.

Perpetual Presence of Christ.

A CHRISTIAN should make his Saviour a perpetual companion — everywhere, and on every day of the week. Christ offers to walk with him in every day's journey of life. What companionship so enlivening and so purifying as his; who else can so "make our hearts burn within us" by the way?

Christ's presence with believers is one of the best preventives from sin; one of the best stimulators to duty. Jesus is "made unto us sanctification" as well as redemption. That is—his is a spirit of holiness. And when we live in hourly communion with Jesus it has a tendency to make us holy.

The sense of Christ's immediate presence is a perpetual check upon our lusts—a perpetual spur to our self-indolence. Are we provoked to cutting words or irritating retorts? One look from the gentle, all forgiving Jesus should be enough to seal the lip and to smooth the ruffled brow. Are we ever tempted to keen bargains and overreaching in business? Selfishness says, "All is fair—others do it—it is the custom of our trade." But what will the pure and holy Jesus say?

How will our account books look to him when he "audits" them? And so on all through the calendar of duties and the circle of daily temptations. With my Saviour beside me how will I dare to play the coward, or the cheat, or the trifler, or the sensualist, or the trickster?

Nowhere will Christ's presence be more cheering and sustaining than in the weariness of a sick room, or under the silent shadows of a great bereavement. "Christ comes to me in the watches of the night," said the bed-ridden saint, Halyburton: "he draws aside the curtains and says, It is I; be of good cheer; be not afraid. Here I lie pained with pain; without strength and yet strong." And when the last farewells have been spoken through the sobs of the dying hour, this never-failing Friend will sweetly whisper, "Fear not, I am with thee. Where I am ye shall be also. Having loved my own, I will love thee unto the end."—Selected.

FAITH is, as some have justly expressed it, "the hand with which the believer lays hold on the free offers of Divine mercy." "By grace are ye saved through faith" is the language of the Apostle. "Through faith," not by faith; for it is plain that if the believer were saved, strictly speaking, by his faith, he would be himself as much his own saviour as if he were saved by his works. And faith must be both rightly directed toward the object which we have good grounds for relying on; and also must be a lively (i. e., living) faith, bringing forth good works and necessary fruit.—Archbishop Whately.

As there is no inconsistency in that training of a child by a human parent, so there is none in that training, during our present state of childhood on earth, by our "Father in heaven," which at once encourages profitable inquiry and represses impertinent curiosity; and which, while checking indiscriminate credulity, yet requires, in subjects beyond the reach of the learner's faculties, implicit faith on sufficient authority.—Archbishop Whately.

The Boy who Would Not.

THERE were prizes to be given in Willie's school, and he was very anxious to merit one of them. As Willie was very young, and had never had much chance to learn, he was behind the others in all his studies except writing, so as he had no hope to excel in any thing but writing, he made up his mind to try for the special prize, for that with all his might. And he did try so that his copy-book would have done honor to a boy twice his age. When the prizes were awarded, the chairman of the committee held up two copy-books, and said: "It would be difficult to say which of these two books is better than the other, but for one copy in Willie's which is not only superior to Charlie's, but to every other copy in the same book. This copy, therefore, gains the prize."

Willie's heart beat high with hope, which was not unmixed with fear. Blushing to his temples he said: "Please, sir, may I see that copy?"

"Certainly," replied the chairman, looking somewhat surprised.

Willie glanced at the copy, and then handing the book back, said: "Please, sir, that is not my writing. It was written by an upper-class boy, who took my book by mistake one day instead of his own."

"O, O," said the chairman, "that may alter the case." The two books went back to the committee, who, after comparing them carefully, awarded the prize to Charlie. The boys laughed at Willie. One said he was silly to say any thing about the mistake.

"I wouldn't have told," said another.

"Nor I," added a third boy, laughing. "The copy was in your book, and you had a right to enjoy the benefit of it."

But in spite of all their quizzing, Willie felt that he was right. "It would not have been the truth," he replied, "if I had not told who wrote the copy. I would rather hold fast the truth than have a prize, for truth is better than gold."

"Hurrah for Willie!" "Three cheers for Willie!" "Well done, Willie!" shouted the boys, and Willie went home to his work happier than he could have done if, by means of a silent lie, he had won the prize.—Selected.

A True Story of a Blackbird.

A GOOD little bird, who never did any thing wrong, and lived for one out of the two years of his life a captive in a cage, had not so many ways of distinguishing himself except by becoming the tamest and most loving of birdies. And he was all that, and very beautiful besides.

But my blackbird had neither golden bill nor black coat when he came to me. He was all spots and speckles, just like a thrush. The blackbirds are thrushes, only their branch of the family wear black turned up with yellow as soon as they are of age; but the first few weeks of their lives they wear the thrush livery of spots and speckles, and nobody at times could tell whether they were young thrushes or young blackbirds.

Our bird grew tame directly. All day his wicker-cage swung in the trees, and at night it was put in a kitchen or hall. But our tabby-cat used to lay such deep stratagems for his murder, that at last no place was thought safe at night but the corner of a bed-room, where it would have been as much as pussy's life was worth to come and look after him. Then whose-ever room the birdie was in was awakened in the summer dawn by sweet singing; and if the door of the cage had been left open, a soft flight would come, and the black wings, fluttering on the pillow and drooping with the delight of his own music, he would sit and sing his morning hymn, till the room seemed filled with the jubilant gladness of his singing. If any pretended to sleep through his singing—which must have been a very extreme piece of make-believe indeed, with that song in their ears—and resolutely kept their eyes shut, the birdie would stop his singing, and give two or three gentle pecks with his golden bill on the closed eyelids; and when, as he thought, he had opened them, and the sleeper looked at him, he sang on, louder than ever, with quivering and drooping wings, pouring out all his delight in song. But this was the second spring of his little life.

For the first year he used to pipe away at a few notes, over and over again, like a child learning its notes. He practiced a good deal and very steadily, and the tones were sweet and low, but it was nothing to the song of his last summer. It is so very wrong and cruel to keep any of God's free-born creatures poor prisoners for one's own pleasure, that I never could bear to keep any pets, if they liked to run wild again, any longer than was necessary to save them from being starved if they got loose before they knew how to take care of themselves. They were welcome to stay as guests, but not as slaves. Birdie would never have known how to feed himself through the winter if he had been let loose then, but he got the full use of his wings by flights about the rooms.

When the spring came his cage was hung in the wood, with the little door open. At first he was timid of coming out into the wide, wide world; but very soon he flitted in and out, and sat singing on the trees, and flew in at the open window of the house. Whenever we went to the hall-door, and called him, he came flying from the trees, and would alight on our fingers, and sit there singing. There never was so tame a birdie, but his career was nearly over. That cruel tabby-cat—what had she not to answer for?—Selected.

A Bible View of Hell:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE OBJECT of this paper is to promulgate the truth of "Life only in Christ;" or, a future life and a resurrection from the dead are both conditional, and only bestowed at the Second Advent of Christ, "at the last day."—See our Motto.

TERMS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE

Two Dollars a Year, or, 48 numbers; One Dollar for six months, or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York City, 20 cents additional.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2.20 a year, or $1.10 for six months.

We cannot undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers except where the law obliges us to do so; that is anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658,
NEW YORK.

All names of persons sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the Post Office, County and State must be given, and written plainly, and if a change is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

THEORIES OF PUNISHMENT AND CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

THE question of future punishment cannot be considered at all adequately without giving marked attention to its influence on the question of missions to the heathen,—the duty and the privilege of the Christian church. The religious world is much indebted for having its attention drawn to this feature of the question by the Rev. Edward White in a very able paper on "Missionary Theology."* We will endeavor to follow out the line of reflection which he has initiated.

II. It strikes us almost immediately that the natural influence of the general acceptance of the theory of Origen would be to put a total stop to missionary effort as needless and positively injurious to those whom it was meant to benefit. The guilt of the heathen for sins here committed, we are taught in Scripture to be small, and their punishment to be proportionably light. There appears, therefore, to be little occasion to send the gospel to them for the purpose of saving them from suffering hereafter. That, at the worst, will be light, while their rejection of the gospel offers would expose them to many stripes.

III. Nor can it be said by the Universalist that the future and eternal bliss of a single one of the heathen depends, in the remotest degree, on his here hearing and accepting the gospel of Christ. His immortality is, with the Universalist as with the Augustinian, already secure. He is one of a deathless race. His spirit is immortal as God's Spirit: his body will be raised incorruptible at the resurrection. If he has not in this life heard the gospel of Christ, he will hear it in the world to come. He will hear it then, apparently, under far more favorable circumstances than he could possibly hear it here. It will not be preached to him by men, themselves stained by sin and full of imperfection; but by men from whom all the stains of sin shall have been purged away. There will not then be the thousand difficulties of one kind or another, which here so effectually hinder the progress and the force of truth. In that coming age, of which the Universalist dreams, it is difficult to see how a single being could hesitate for a moment to embrace that gospel which is to bring him from the realms of pain to the realms of joy. We see not any imaginable motive with the Universalist to send Christ's gospel to the heathen save only his Master's command, which to him comes enforced by no apparent reasons which make it urgent and pressing. We inquire whether Universalism has ever afforded a zealous missionary to heathen lands. If it has, we think he must be a man of different passions from those of other men. If Universalism had been the creed of Christ and his apostles, we do not believe that the command, "Go, teach all nations," would either have been uttered or obeyed. The deadening, dispiriting influence of this theory on Christian missions is in itself enough to overthrow it.

IV. The objection which lies in this respect against the theory of Origen, does not, we fully concede, lie against that of Augustine. The advocates of the latter have, no doubt, a great, powerful, overwhelming motive to obey their Master's command, and send the gospel to the heathen. But their theory contains within itself an element fatal to its success. They offer the gospel of salvation mixed up with a theory that necessitates and almost justifies its rejection. They present the God of Justice, Love and Mercy, in a light which makes him appear devoid of every one of these qualities. And they themselves by their line of argument upon this question virtually confess that they do so.

V. For it will be remarked by those conversant with this controversy that whenever Augustinian advocates come forward with the smallest show of argument in defense of the justice of their theory of eternal agony they sedulously confine their argument to the case of those who have sinned against light and grace. One would imagine from their writings that there were no men in the world who had not had the offers of mercy made to them over and over again, pressed upon them with all the earnestness of love, as Christ himself, with his heart of love and his words of earnestness, pressed it upon the men of his generation.

VI. Bunyan in his "Visions of Hell," pictures the lamentations of a lost soul. "I know I cannot, must not die; but live a dying life, worse than ten thousand deaths; and yet I might once have helped all this, and would not. O, that is the gnawing worm that never dies! I might have once been happy; salvation once was offered me, and I refused it: had it been but once, yet to refuse it had been a folly not to be forgiven; but it was offered me a thousand times, and yet (wretch that I was) I still as oft refused it." And such is the general tone of Augustinian theorists. They speak, as the cause of endless misery, of sinners, amid God's wondrous long suffering and pleading with them, still persisting obstinately in rebellion. *

VII. These men ignore the vast majority of mankind. They forget that in the times before Christ, revelation was confined to a petty race in a corner of Syria. They forget that in the times since Christ, salvation has not been offered to, or heard of by, one in one hundred of mankind. Now, there can be no doubt that the end of the ungodly, be they heathen, Jew or Christian, is the very same. It is death, destruction, perishing. In the circumstances attendant on this, there will be a marked distinction; but the end of all will be the same. If death, then, be, as many tell us, eternal misery, they represent eternal misery as inflicted upon countless myriads who never heard the gospel of Christ, who never heard the very name of that God against whom they ignorantly sinned. With such a creed, how are they to present the God and Father of Jesus Christ to the heathen mind?

A Christian missionary proceeds to India to preach there the gospel of Christ. It is the old story of Paul at Athens, disputing with Jews and devout persons and all comers, be they philosophers or illiterate men. At Lucknow, or Delhi, or Benares, our modern missionary meets the Brahmin. He addresses him as Paul addressed the Epicureans and Stoics of Athens, "Whom ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you."

Brahmin. "What is your message to us?"

Missionary. "Life from the dead to all who believe in and obey Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father."

B. "That sounds well. What is this life you offer in Christ? what is this death from which you promise deliverance?"

M. "The life I offer you in my Master's name is spiritual life, a new heart loving God and all that is good, and consequent happiness forever. The death from which Christ will deliver you is spiritual death, i. e., moral pollution, its consequent misery, and the eternal anguish and suffering which God will inflict on all who believe not the gospel of his Son, Jesus Christ."

B. "When and where will your God inflict this death upon unbelievers?"

M. "It is already begun through the sinner's own sin; but God has prepared a place where he will complete what is here only begun. That fearful place is hell, where all unbelievers shall suffer throughout an eternal existence pain inflicted for their sin and unbelief."

B. "You say for their unbelief. Then this hell of yours can be only for those who reject the gospel of Christ?"

M. "No; hell is for your fathers of the past time; at least for all of them who sinned against such light and knowledge as they were possessed of."

B. "That would include, I fear, the vast majority of my fathers. If this is true, it is a terrible message that you bring us. You say that all the past generations of India will suffer pain as a punishment from your God for all eternity! Tell me plainly for what they must suffer a punishment infinitely beyond all the punishment that has ever been inflicted by the cruelest tyrants of earth?"

M. "They will certainly thus suffer for eternity, but their sufferings will be much lighter than are inflicted upon those who refuse God's offers of salvation."

B. "Greater or less, you speak of a punishment which, if inflicted on but one person for all eternity, would exceed in amount all the punishments which have ever been inflicted in this temporal life upon all the criminals against human laws."

M. "Yes; if we consider what eternity is, I must confess that it is so."

B. "I ask, then, for what will your God inflict this most appalling punishment?"

M. "We are all sprung from one father, the first man, Adam. God made with him a covenant which included his posterity. Adam violated this covenant, and thereby involved all his posterity in the death he brought upon himself."

B. "You say, then, that because Adam sinned, his children, who had nothing to say personally to his sin, will suffer pain for all eternity, and this by your God's arrangement?"

M. "Yes."

B. "Then, those who have died before they could know the difference of good or evil are all to go to this fearful hell? You include the infant as well as the adult! Is this the God whom you tell me to love and adore?"

M. "I do not think that infants will be included. At least, I cannot affirm positively of them. It may be that God will exempt them, and save them through Christ, though they never heard of his name."

B. "Then you must allow that you do not think the mere fact of being descended from Adam sufficient to justify the awful punishment of which you speak?"

M. "I should rather omit this matter, as one on which sufficient light has not been shed to justify me in speaking positively. I would rather speak of such heathen as have come to years of understanding, and in those years have sinned against their knowledge of what was right. You cannot deny that there have been multitudes of such."

B. "I deny it not; nor do I deny that punishment is due to crime; nor do I deny that if crime has gone unpunished in this world, it would be but just to punish it in another."

M. "You are coming over to my view. That is what my God will do. No sin has met with sufficient punishment here; therefore he will punish it, if forgiven, hereafter."

B. "I quarrel not with punishment. I only speak of its amount. I do not see that any faults of my fathers could merit the amount of punishment you speak of, and therefore I ask you to tell me particularly, for what it is that they are thus to suffer? You do not surely say that your God will inflict more punishment on the sinner than he deserves?"

M. "No; my God is the Judge of all the earth, and he can do no injustice or wrong."

B. "It is well. Then for what is he to condemn my ancestors to unending pain?"

M. "For those sins of which you allow them to be guilty."

B. "Yes; but I affirm the punishment to be too great."

M. "They sinned against my God, who is infinite, and no punishment for sin against such a God can be too great."

B. "But they never heard of his name; they never knew his laws; their offence, as against him, was purely one of ignorance."

M. "Yes; but he placed within them a conscience which should condemn them when they did what they knew to be wrong, and their going against conscience was, in fact, going against his voice within them."

B. "But they did not know it was his voice."

M. "That I allow."

B. "And you affirm that your God will punish men with pain for all eternity for an offence against his voice, when they did not, and could not, know it to be his voice?"

M. "I do. This is the arrangement of his world, with which no creature of his hand may dare to quarrel."

B. "I was not taught from infancy to believe in your God, and what you now tell me of him makes me resolve never to believe in him. You come to reason with me about your God, and you thereby allow that I am capable of forming a just opinion of him. Indeed, if I were not capable, there would be no use in your disputing with me. I have formed my opinion of him from what you, his servant, have told me of him. I reject him as a monster of injustice and cruelty. You tell me of the cruelties of what you call this heathen land. There are, it may be, and have been with us, many cruel men, but none so cruel as your God. You speak to me of the cruelty of Juggernaut's worship! I regard it not from your point of view; but, say the worst you could of it, it compares not with the cruelty of your God. What! To inflict endless agony on myriads of men who never heard of him or of his laws! With us the worst of crimes is thought sufficiently punished with the loss of life. But your God thinks that the smallest crimes against his laws—for surely sins of ignorance are small—can be punished with no less a punishment than endless existence in misery! Justice! No: but the foulest injustice, with which no injustice of any of the old rulers of our land, whom you Christians have displaced, can compare. Your God has no excuse. Could he not remove out of life those who have ignorantly sinned? That were easy for omnipotence to do. Then he does not choose to do so. He prefers to sustain them in an endless life of pain! You tell me of his love! But his love I cannot see while this black stain rests upon his character. You tell me he has doomed all the past millions of India to eternal agony, either for Adam's wilful sin or for their own sins of ignorance, or for both together! Then I will have nought to do with such a God. I prefer mine to yours."

IX. Conversations such as this do not rank among imaginary "Dialogues of the Dead:" they are dialogues of living men. In Siam, a priest came to an American missionary and asked, "How long has God tormented bad men in a future state?" When answered, "For ever;" he replied, "Our God torments the worst of men only one thousand years, so we will not have your American God in Siam."

X. Have not the Brahmin and the Siamese priest the best in such an argument? How can minds like theirs judge in any other way? Yet the theology which they reject is the current theology of Christendom! This is part of the gospel we send to heathen lands. Can we wonder at its rejection? Is it not the wonder that our missions should have met even with the small success they have? Is their success not proof of the divine power of that religion which, weighed with the Augustinian hell, can make any progress at all? No other religion but Christianity could stand a generation of thinking men with such a load upon its back.

XI. Give to the millions of India and of China the gospel which was preached by Christ, and Paul, and John—Life from the dead. Give to life and death the only senses which these poor heathen have ever attached to them. Life is to them precious—the most precious of all things: even for a year of this poor life they would give all they have. Put before them eternal life in Christ. Tell these poor perishing creatures, who have no hope, that God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have this eternal life. Tell them that, in a world over which God rules, the unholy can have no abiding place, but that the very vilest are invited, just as they are, to come to Jesus Christ, and to his and their loving Father, and, through the Spirit of grace, to receive a new heart and a new spirit to qualify them to enjoy the endless life which Christ bestows. Tell them this, and you tell them of what shocks no sense of justice, and of what appeals to the innermost chord even of their degraded being. Life! Life for ever! No more to die! No more to dread the approach of that death from which human nature shrinks with dread and aversion, because it was not made for death. Here is a prize for a poor heathen offered him in Jesus Christ! Here is a message of love from the God of heaven! here is a token of affection that shows that the Judge of all the earth is its Father too, and has a Father's heart even for the poor outcasts of India and China. The heathen of the day may sigh, may be even perplexed at the thought why God did not send to his fathers the message of peace he sent to him. But, in his not having sent it, he can see no injustice; for no terrible future, such as the Augustinian missionary summons up from the depths of his hell, looms before his forefathers, rude or civilized, of the ages that have gone before. The Creator withdraws the life he gave. No man can say that is unjust. Man takes life from the creature he gave no life to: much more may God take what he bestows. But to him and to his age has come the message of life from God, and he can hail it as to him a message of pure love and mercy, which may well touch his heart, fire his intellect, nerve his purpose, make him feel, what he never did before, the heir of immortality through the Saviour of the world.

XII. Here is something, we think, for us to lay to heart. Here is a solemn question for our missionaries and our missionary societies. The Brahmin of India has condemned the theology of Augustine. Let us condemn it too, and take and send to the dark places of the world the theology of apostolic times. We may then speak boldly to the heathen ear. The Christian missionary need no more stand rebuked by the sophist of India.

THE ARMOR OF SAUL.

BY ALFRED H. CLEAVES.

"And Saul armed David with his armour, and he put an helmet of brass upon his head; also he armed him with a coat of mail."

THE whole thing however was a novelty to David, and he put them away from him; but he was not to meet the champion of the Philistines without a probability of success; his precedents in the way of conquest were found in his previous contests with the bear and the lion: he felt that whatever advantage the coat of mail secured to others, in his case it would prove an incumbrance: whatever the champion, with his helmet and target of brass, appeared to the Jews and Philistines, he seemed to David as an opponent to be classed with the lion and the bear.

There was nothing conventional in his mode of warfare; he felt however that he had given it a practical trial; so the fears of Saul and the contempt of Goliath were alike to him; he had an experience of his own, of which they were ignorant, and he approached the Giant of Gath as a footman of the living God; he felt as though the meanest peer in the army of the God of hosts could humble the uncircumcised Philistine, and he put the name of the Lord of Sabaoth, the God of the armies of Israel, against the sword and shield, and spear of the Philistine Warrior; and hastening towards the army of the enemy he smote him in the forehead, and slew him; but there was no sword in the hand of David.

God has furnished his people with a weapon as available to the weak as to the strong; they have heard it said, "that He upholds all things by the word of his power;" they have heard it said of their enemies, "that they are, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God;" and taking his truth for their shield and buckler, they can stand fast in the faith, and quit themselves like men.

The man who proves all things, and holds fast that which is good, will, among other things, retain the form of sound words, meet the adversary, standing steadfast in the faith by which he overcomes the world; and as David smote the giant of Gath, and proved his boasting vain, so the weakest shepherd of the flock of God may take the sling of faith, and the stone of truth, and discomfit the theologians of the present day.

The truth in and of itself finds its own basis, and furnishes the same for those who stand upon it. It is self-sufficient and sufficient for all who embrace it, and is well calculated to puzzle the lords of religious convention, and put to confusion the champions of systematic theology.

Organized error is disorganized and put to flight, and the owls and bats of darkness retire farther into the gloom, when once the ray of truth begins its steady searching course.

The language of Locke is so appropriate here that we can hardly forbear quoting those passages in which he says—"There is no such way to gain admittance, or give defence to strange and absurd doctrines, as to guard them round about with legions of obscure, doubtful and undefined words: for untruth being unacceptable to the mind of man, there is no other defence left for absurdity but obscurity."

"The Platonists have their soul of the world, and the Epicureans their endeavor towards motion in their atoms, when at rest. There is scarce any sect in philosophy has not a distinct set of terms, that others understand not; but yet this gibberish, which, in the weakness of human understanding, serves so well to palliate men's ignorance, and cover their errors, comes, by familiar use among those of the same tribe, to seem the most important part of language, and of all other terms the most significant;" and "he that uses words without any clear and steady meaning, what does he but lead himself and others into errors? And he that designedly does it, ought to be looked upon as an enemy to truth and knowledge."

Among the last mentioned class, at the present day, might be included not only those narrow-minded bigots who would take the Bible from the common people, and gratify their unsatiable appetites at the public treasury; (and of whose progenitors that devout man—William Tyndale—said: "They will not let the layman have the word of God in his mother tongue, yet let the priests have it; which for a great part of them do understand no Latin at all, but sing, and say, and patter all day, with the lips only, that which the heart understandeth not," but those wonderful grammarians who put all their effort into the staging, to the neglect of the house in which God told them to build, and teach young converts to talk of the Unity in Trinity, the Incarnate God, and such like expressions; while they take upon themselves the duty of correcting the faith, and separating the false from the evangelical.

This class of people inquire of your denomination; if you believe in the divinity of Christ; and if this or that minister is not smart in your estimation; while to call a preacher, a good man, is to give him a homely compliment in their opinion.

The man who is so crude in his polemics as to approach them with the simple habit of truth, or the unadorned Scripture turnout, is looked upon with about the same degree of contempt that Goliath displayed in looking upon David: they feign to be treated like a dog; and if they are drawn into the struggle of open investigation they usually retire at an early hour, less garrulous, if not wiser.

What Tyndale said of doctrine in his day may be well repeated at the present time and serve the additional purpose of showing the contrast between Protestants then and now, which is, "that as we know by natural wit what followeth of a true principle of natural reason; even so, by principles of the faith, and by plain scriptures, and by the circumstances of the text, should we judge all men's exposition, and all men's doctrine, and should receive the best, and refuse the worst."

Of the papists in his day he said, "Ye will let no man come unto God's word until he have been two years master of art. First, they nosel them in sophistry, and in benefundatim. [That which is grounded on sure premises.] Moreover, one holdeth this, another that; one is a Real, another a Nominal. What wonderful dreams have they of their predicaments, universals, second intentions and relatives.

"Of what text thou provest hell, will another prove purgatory; another limbo patrum; and another the assumption of our lady: and another shall prove of the same text that an ape hath a tail.

"And of what text the gray friar proveth that our lady was without original sin, of the same shall the black friar prove that she was conceived in original sin."

If he were alive at the present day he would probably have some Saul of Protestant-Israel offer him the armor of Ecce dei character, with which to meet the giant in the Ecce homo uniform; and he might exclaim with the truthfulness of David, that he had not proved it.

We are invited to have charity—for whom?—for those who say, "our Lord delayeth his coming?"—for those who smite their brethren; and make merchandise of the truth and its followers, turning them into a source of profit?—does charity require us to be silent when the poor and needy seek water and there is none?

A member of a so-called evangelical church in Gloucester, invited a poor fisherman of the place to a fair, held to carry out some religious enterprise, and was to d by him, in reply, that he could not contribute while the widows and orphans of Gloucester mourned their husbands and fathers on the fishing grounds, and sisters wept for brothers asleep on George's banks.

"O how I long to see that day!
When the redeemed shall come
To Zion, clad in bright array,
Their blissful, happy home."

And, while we anxiously await the event, let us rejoice that it was ever said, "Behold my servant, whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my Spirit upon him: he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles. A bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench: he shall bring forth judgment unto truth."

BOSTON, MASS., June, 1871.

[The following article was written by the late Prof. C. F. HUDSON, some time before his death, and addressed to the editors of the "Independent."]

IS DEATH OF NATURE?

To the Editors of the Independent:—We often hear of death as a "debt of nature." A doctrine, this, of Christless men, a pagan notion, the theology of which is Naturalism. Death, we are told, is not strictly the penalty of sin; it is not an evil, save as all evil is incipient and imperfect good. In Theodore Parker's doctrine of a "perfect Providence," and in most Universalist schemes of human destiny, we find the same notion, that bodily dissolution is not the result of a Fall, but the natural way to an after life. Unhappily, the Scriptural doctrine of death is now so unsettled, that the pagan idea is allowed to pass, like coins worn smooth, current by force of custom.

In your reply to an inquirer, under the title of "Perplexity," (May 8th,) you seem to me to have hardly replaced th s doctrine with coin from the King's mint. You say:

"Are there any 'texts which seem to imply' that if there had been no sin, there would have been no dissolution of this bodily organization? . . . that without sin the 'living organism' would have undergone no change analogous to that which we now call death? . . . [that it] is not in its very nature temporary, to be dropped when it has served its purpose as leaves fall from the trees in autumn, or as a 'shock of corn cometh in its season.' Is there any text which teaches more than that it is by sin that the dissolution of the body, at the departure of the spirit to its future life, become the terror and the agony which men call death?"

According to this view, the sentence, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return" might have been literally fulfilled, though man had not sinned: and that sentence became penal, simply because death became painful and terrible. The expulsion from Eden, and from the tree of life, had nothing to do with the dissolution of the body. The Patriarch David might have been "gathered to his fathers," and have seen "corruption," if the race were unfallen; for the body, having served its temporary purpose, must needs decay, and be buried. And when Christ followed man into the grave to gain a victory over the last "enemy," He stooped no lower than our bodies, which like autumn leaves, would have dropped, by the law of our original nature. He has not changed the appointed course of our physical nature—he has only smoothed our path, or dispelled the darkness that rested upon it. He has saved us from the grasp of Death, but from being roughly handled by him; that is, from his enmity. By the Redemption, we are released from his dominion, more happily, perhaps more speedily; whereas without sin, we should still have entered his domain; and without a Redemption, we should have been—we know not what.

I will not say that this view of death is akin to that taken by Emanuel Swedenborg, to which Calvin has given undesigned occasion in his definition of the "first resurrection."* (See his "Psychopannychy.") My difficulty is simply this—we are not told, in the above statement, what would have been man's physical destiny, if he had not sinned. What change would have accomplished that which now depends upon the Resurrection? What was the relation of the unfallen "natural body" to the "spiritual body?" Was the translation of Enoch an example of man's proper destiny, or an exception from it? Will the bodies of those who are "changed" at Christ's second coming, be transformed, or will they perish? These questions are important as they relate to that primary doctrine of the gospel—the Resurrection, which the pagan mind could neither mock at or defy, but which is, more than any other religious tenet, peculiar to Christianity. When the Scripture doctrine of death is illustrated by it, your inquirer will, perhaps, be still less "perplexed."

*The definition given by Calvin to which I allude is in this wise, that the "first resurrection" is that of the regenerate soul, immediately after the death of the body, to be succeeded by the "second resurrection," that of the body at the judgment.

I shall not offer, instead of your solution, any of the vagaries of ancient or modern Chiliasm. And I am no Psychopannychist or Psycotomist. I know some of the difficulties of a true doctrine of the relation of matter and spirit, in the nature and destiny of man. I am indifferent to many points of detail; e. g., whether the "tree of life" had medicinal ambrosial virtue, as Whately holds, or was symbolic and sacramental. But I am confident that modern philosophy has obscured the Scripture doctrine of man's original destiny, to the advantage of skepticism and error.

To show how the early Christians thought on this subject, I offer the following from Athanasius, the so-called Father of Orthodoxy, which might be supported by varied citations:

"God desired man to continue in incorruption. But men, neglecting and departing from the knowledge of God, and devising and regarding that which was evil, incurred the threatened condemnation of death. They remained no longer such as they were created, but contracted corruption according to their own devices, and came under the power and dominion of death. For by transgression they reverted to their native condition; so that as from non-existence they had begun to be, they must now in due time suffer the loss and destruction of their being. And that justly; for if, having once the nature of non-being, they were called into being by the presence and goodness of the Word, when they divested themselves of the knowledge of God and turned aside to non-entities, (for evil things are not entities, but good things are entities, seeing they are from God, who truly is,) it followed that they must be also divested of the nature of existing forever. That is, they must perish, and remain in death and corruption. For man is by nature mortal, in that he was created from non-being. Yet, as made in the likeness of the true Being, to be preserved by the knowledge of Him, he might have escaped the force of corruption, and remained immortal."—De Incarnat. Verbi; Opp, Ed. Commel, p. 40.

OBITUARY.

DIED, at Braintree, Vt., Monday, May 28, ISAAC ALLEN, aged 82 years and 10 months. For forty-three years he was a member of the Christian church; during that time his life was one that may well be said to be that of a Christian. He never failed in his intercourse with his fellow-men, when opportunity offered, to present before them the name of his Redeemer. Faithful in his family devotions, never allowing business to interfere with these duties. He was a constant reader of the HERALD OF LIFE from the commencement of its publication until he became blind, which happened about two years ago.

Father Allen embraced the Life views, and expressed a great desire to hear Br. Storrs preach; which desire was gratified in Albany, N. Y., while on a visit to his son, J. L. Allen. He often expressed a wish that some of the brethren, who held the Life views, should preach his funeral sermon. It was found impossible to obtain the services in time.

He retired to bed as usual Sunday evening. About twelve o'clock his companion was awaked by an unusual breathing. She spoke to him and receiving no answer, immediately procured a light and saw him breathe only two or three times; and without a struggle fell asleep in Jesus, to awake in that glorious morning when none shall awake to weep, clothed with immortality and eternal life.

He was taken to Morristown, some sixty miles north, and buried in the family burying ground. The funeral services were attended by a Baptist clergyman, who had been acquainted with the deceased for thirty years; who, among other things, said that he had gone to sing the song of the redeemed around the throne; that his rejoicing was now the fulness of joy; and many other sayings which are in harmony with the traditions of the so-called "orthodox" church, but have no foundation in the word of God. Our hearts were pained while we listened to that part of his remarks. We could not help feeling sad that preachers who professed to be watchmen upon the walls of Zion, and for thirty years studying the word of inspiration, had not yet learned that the righteous, who fall asleep in Christ, rest from all their labors until the morning of the resurrection, when, at the sound of the trumpet, the dead (not the disembodied spirits) in Christ shall rise first, and we which are living shall be changed in a moment, in a twinkling of an eye, and be caught up to meet the Lord, and be forever with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with THESE WORDS.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, JUNE 21, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

A volume of this paper consists of 48 numbers. That makes at least four vacant weeks in a year. These have been distributed between Christmas, May day, Fourth of July, and the week following the anniversary of the Union. This year there was no vacation the first week in May, and it is thought best to have two weeks together in July; therefore, no paper will be issued on the 5th and 12th of July. The next issue will be on the 19th of that month. Let this be remembered.

In the meantime, our mail book will be examined, and such subscribers as are three months, or twelve numbers, in debt for the paper will be discontinued, unless we hear from them immediately.

"A PRIEST UPON HIS THRONE."

In the "World's Crisis" of May 31, the "Corresponding Editor" says:

"One of my correspondents desires to know if there is not positive proof in Zech. vi. 13 that Christ will be a Priest upon his throne . . . ? We answer, No; it does not even hint such a thing, but refers to the then officiating high priest, as the context shows."

He then quotes Zech. vi. 9–15, which our readers can turn to and examine, if they choose. After this, he speaks as follows:

"1. This refers to Joshua, the 'high priest,' here called the 'branch.' Some have incorrectly applied it to Christ, simply because Christ is sometimes called a 'branch.' On the same principle Ezekiel is called 'son of man;' so is Christ; but that neither makes Ezekiel Christ nor his type.

"2. The building of the temple, here ascribed to Joshua, is a past event, having commenced under the joint control of Zerubbabel the governor, and Joshua the high priest, in the second year of Darius (Hag. i. 14, 15); and God said, 'The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house; his hands shall also finish it.'—Zech. iv. 9. This was accomplished jointly by Zerubbabel and Joshua, and was finished in the past, and does not belong to the future."

"1." The first step in the above remarks is an assumption that Joshua is "here called the 'branch.'" That the expression "The BRANCH" is ever applied to the high priest, under the law, remains to be proved. The text, Zech. vi. 12, saith, "Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts saying, Behold the man whose name is The BRANCH," etc. It was the man who had this name, who was to "sit and rule upon his throne; and He shall be a priest upon his throne."—Verse 13.

Two questions arise here. 1. Did Joshua ever have a throne? 2. Had he ever been called The BRANCH? We hardly need spend time to prove that Joshua is never spoken of as a king, or as sitting to "rule upon his throne." Israel had no king or throne in the days of Zechariah's prophecy, nor at any period since: hence the prophecy before us cannot be applied to Joshua the high priest.

The second question admits of but one rational answer, viz., Joshua had never been called "The BRANCH;" hence is not "the man" spoken of here. This is a peculiar name, and belongs to the promised King that shall sit on his father David's throne, which is His own throne.

Isaiah says, "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots: and the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him," etc., "He shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears: but with righteousness shall he judge the poor," etc.—Isa. xi. 1–4.

Jeremiah says, "Behold the days come, saith the LORD, that I will raise unto David a righteous BRANCH, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is the name whereby he shall be called, THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS;" or, "The Lord of Righteousness."

Thus far there seems no ground of doubt as to who "the man" is who is called the "BRANCH"—none other than the Lord Jesus Christ. But Zechariah is tolerably explicit: he says, or rather, "Thus saith the LORD of hosts . . . Hear now, O Joshua the high priest, thou, and thy fellows that sit before thee: for they are men wondered at: [Hebrew—mouphaith—a sign, or type]: for, behold, I will bring forth my servant the BRANCH."—Zech. iii. 8. Does not "The BRANCH" here spoken of refer to the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah, who preceded Zechariah, and point out the King which God promised to "raise up unto David;" and who was to be "a righteous BRANCH?" In our mind there can be no question but what it is the same. Then why attempt to make "The man whose name is The BRANCH," Zech. vi. 12, mean Joshua, and not Christ; and to put the high priest of Zechariah's time on a throne which he never had?

But says our friend of the "Crisis," "Ezekiel is called 'son of man,' so is Christ; but that neither makes Ezekiel Christ, nor his type." Indeed! Is Ezekiel ever called "The son of man?" Though he is called "son of man" nearly a hundred times, in his prophecy, he never is once called "The Son of man." This is a phrase designating the Messiah, and is peculiar to Him alone. So of the expression "The BRANCH," it is peculiar to the Heir of David's throne, and cannot be applied to any other man; hence in Zech. vi. 12, "The Branch" spoken of is that Heir, and none other: it belongs exclusively to the Messiah, the Christ; and we think our good brother of the "Crisis" will yet see it so.

"2." As to "the building of the temple here ascribed to Joshua," if our brother's view is correct, that the temple spoken of is the one built under Zerubbabel and Joshua, "the glory" which the builder was to "bear" was not very great, nor did it last long; for this temple had no glory compared with the temple built by Solomon. The only thing which gave it its real glory was that Christ came to it; but that did not make the two joint builders—Zerubbabel and Joshua—into a "He shall bear the glory."

There are two temples yet to be built, according to the Bible: one literal, described by Ezekiel, last chapters of his prophecy; the other a spiritual one, which no Christian will doubt but Christ is the builder, and "He shall bear the glory," and He will not be likely to give that glory to another; and when He has completed it, "He shall sit and rule upon his throne; and He shall be a priest upon his throne;" for, "The LORD hath sworn, and will not repent," [will not change his mind], "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedeck"—who had "neither beginning of days nor end of life, but made like unto the Son of God."—Psa. cx. 4, Heb. vii. 3. If the Son of God dies, his Priesthood will cease; not without, so far as any revelation informs us.

PROPHECY: LUKE XX.

"AND upon the earth, [epi tees gees—in the land—same words as used in verse 23—signifying same territory ruled by sun, moon, and stars], distress of nations, with perplexity." This has been and is fulfilling in the history of the nations occupying the old Roman Empire. The cause and effect of those things is next spoken of. "The sea and the waves roaring." We doubt if this language has any reference, as a sign, to any literal commotion of the ocean; but, like the sun, moon, and stars, is a symbol, which we will try to search out and apply. By turning to Isaiah xvii. 12, we read thus: "Wo to the multitude of many people, which make a noise like the noise of the sea; and to the rushing of nations that make a rushing like the rushing of mighty waters!" [That is, "the waters" of the sea.] "The nations shall rush like the rushing of many waters." So the destruction of Babylon is represented by the figure of the sea coming up upon her; see Jer. li. 42. So also of Tyrus, Ezek. xxvi. 3, see Psa. xciii. 3, 4; and particularly Rev. xvii. 15, where "many waters" are expressly declared to signify "peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues."

Thus, then, "the sea and the waves roaring," is a symbol of an uprising of the people, who have long been the victims of lordly, kingly, and imperial misrule and oppression. When they rise up like the waves of the sea, lashed to fury by winds, their despotic rulers will find themselves like a time-worn and dilapidated ship, unable to stand the storm; yet there may be, for a short time, a calm, but the storm will gather strength. If we cast our eyes over Europe and mark the events of the past twenty-five years, have we not beheld a rising up of the people—the multitudes? And what has been the cry of this rising mass? Has it not been republicanism? Self-government? No more despots? Down with the thrones! And what is the effect of this uprising of the masses? "Men's hearts failing them for fear," etc. What men's hearts are these? Not all men's, but a special class, viz., the great men—kings, nobles, lords, despots of every class. This is evident from what follows, which is the reason assigned for the fear, viz.: "For [gar—a causative conjunction—because], the powers of heaven [the sun, moon, and stars], are shaken." The sea and wave-like convulsions of the people shake down these symbolic powers, and overturn them, carrying consternation and horrible fear among the tyranical dynasties of Europe, who revolved in their political heavens so long as to think the people only lived for them, and not they for the people. And while they found the political heavens so convulsed that their power seemed ready to come to an end, their hearts failed them for fear. At this moment they are far from feeling assurance of quiet; they "are like the troubled sea."

We now ask our readers whether the signs in the sun, moon, and stars, the sea and waves roaring, are not being manifested before our eyes? And may we not know with certainty that the times of the Gentiles are ending? Ought we not to inquire what is to come next? Or, what is before us?

We wish to call attention to a fact which we think has been generally overlooked, viz., that our Lord states distinctly two classes of events and two classes of signs that shall indicate the different events indicated. The first events are Jerusalem's desolation and subjection to the Gentiles. The second are Jerusalem's emancipation, and the establishment of "the kingdom of God."

The sign of the first class of events is thus stated, verse 20, "When ye see Jerusalem compassed about with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh." The signs of the second class of events are in the 25th and 26th verses; and our Lord adds, verse 31, "When ye see these things come to pass, know the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." Here are two different events, viz., first, Jerusalem's desolation, with days of vengeance, and subjugation to the Gentiles. Second, Jerusalem's emancipation, the redemption of the followers of Christ, and the establishment of the kingdom of God; and each class of events has appropriate signs for the guide of sincere inquirers after truth. Let these things be kept in mind that we may be saved from that confusion which is so often introduced into the exposition of this prophecy.

The expression, verse 24, "Until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," cannot be made to mean that the treading under foot was never to cease, but the reverse, viz., that a time would come when that desolation should terminate, and Jerusalem be no longer trodden under foot. To say otherwise is to contradict some of the plainest prophecies of the Bible. For example:

Jer. xxxi. 38–40.—"Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that the city shall be built to the Lord from the tower of Hananeel unto the gate of the corner. And the measuring line shall yet go forth over against it upon the hill of Gareb, and shall compass about to Goath. And the whole valley of the dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields unto the brook of Kidron, unto the corner of the horse gate toward the east, shall be holy unto the Lord: it shall not be plucked up nor thrown down any more forever."

It cannot be pretended that this prophecy has had its fulfilment since the Babylonish captivity; for "the city" then rebuilt has been both "plucked up" and "thrown down;" and our Lord said it would be. This prophecy, then, of Jeremiah, is future, and will be accomplished in the deliverance of Jerusalem from the Gentiles, and the rebuilding of the city.

If our previous remarks are well founded, we are now living in a time of a series of convulsions that will not terminate before the great and glorious event takes place spoken in the following words: "And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory."

"Then"—when? While these convulsions are going on, or, immediately after; for so the word signifies. "Shall they see;" "they," who? Is it not the same "they," or people, spoken of in verse 24, who were to be led away captive into all nations? and who, with their city, were to be subjected to the Gentile governments until their times were fulfilled or accomplished? Till that time our Lord had said of "Jerusalem" and her "children," [see Matt. xxiii. 37–39] "ye shall not see me," etc.; evidently implying that the time would come when he would manifest himself once more to that people at the termination of the times of the Gentiles, being at the time of, or in connection with his second advent. We do not affirm that this is the true interpretation of this verse; but we think when viewed with the 24th verse and many other prophecies, that we are probably not far from correct in our view of it.

The next verse is an address to his followers living at the period when these signs shall appear. "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." From the commencement of the signs, the living saints were to be encouraged and comforted with the expectation of a speedy deliverance; and were to look up for the return of their long absent Lord. Though we would not pretend to decide positively as to the order of events still future, yet we incline to the opinion that the gathering of the saints, or those who are to constitute the "kings and priests" of the coming dispensation, will take place prior to the manifestation spoken of in verse 27; and that while the convulsions among the nations are in progress; thus escaping some of the heaviest calamities that are coming on them that dwell on the earth near the time of the establishment of the kingdom of God.

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

"Now that the dead are raised, even Moses shewed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. For God is not the God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto him."—Luke xx. 37, 38.

WERE we not well aware of the extent to which many expositors and others indulge the habit of severing passages of Scripture from their connections, and arraying them in seeming support of certain dogmas, we would never cease to wonder how it is that not a few men of intelligence and thought conceive that the above words of Jesus afford evidence of man's immortality. Quoting, with entire approval, from Mr. Landis, it is said, p. 137 of the work under review:

"The Sadducees believed that man ceased utterly to exist at death, and, consequently, they denied his resurrection."

This statement is, of course, framed to strengthen an exposition, but, as all must see, it is put wrong end foremost. Had it been said, the Sadducees denied a resurrection, and, consequently, they consistently believed that man ceased utterly to exist at death, the assertion would have possessed the very attractive and exalted merit of truthfulness, and would have commended itself to the judgment of every thoughtful person. Again:

"But he" (Jesus) "aimed at something more: for, had he simply proved a future resurrection, the Sadducees would still have objected that there was no such thing as a spirit; while, if the existence of the spirit after death is proved, the resurrection, as they viewed the matter, followed of course. Our Saviour, therefore, in order to disprove their views on both of these points, refers to Exod. iii. 6, 16, which affirms that God was still the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, though they had been long dead; and upon which he also remarks, that 'God is not the God of the dead' . . . 'but of the living;' and then, directly in the face of their theory, he adds, 'for all live unto him'; that is, so far is man from ceasing to exist at death, as ye Sadducees pretend, that, even though they have ceased to be seen on earth, all that are dead still live to him."

We think the reader will agree with us in the opinion that should a man set to work to do his utmost in that direction, he could scarcely hope to succeed in crowding into a few sentences so much of sophistry, and so many mistatements and contradictions, mingled with some truth apparently unmeaningly uttered, as is contained in the foregoing extract. Mr. George distinctly affirms, and he repeatedly reasons upon the assumption, that man does not die, only something connected with him, which, when the man leaves it, is "only the remains" of a man. He urges, moreover, that Jesus so taught. In accordance with this position, it is insisted that our Saviour, by way of proving a resurrection, a reliving again of dead persons, substantially said to the Sadducees, "Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are not dead, as ye suppose, but are still living, therefore they will be raised from the dead." Profound logic! a kind, however, for which Messrs. Landis and George will not, we venture to say, receive the thanks of the more consistent members of their school. He must be firmly wedded indeed to a theory, and determined to sustain it at all hazards, who will deliberately attribute to our blessed Saviour such a style of reasoning.

Suppose Jesus had told the Sadducees that man possesses an undying spirit-entity: they would, most likely, still have replied, "well, that can be no proof of a resurrection, for if those spirit-entities exist now in a separate state why, may they not always so exist? Their existence cannot prove that there will be a resurrection of the dead. If what thou sayest, that 'God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him,' proves that some part of man is alive when the other part is dead, then our doctrine, that the dead will not live again, is established, for God, not being the God of the dead, will not raise them up again." A child can easily see that the argument imputed to Jesus would be altogether likely to confirm the Sadducees in their belief rather than convince them of their error, for to affirm, as is done, that the language, "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living," proves that some part of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob did not die, is 'to deny that so much of those patriarchs as did die' will ever live again. Thus the resurrection, the very doctrine which Jesus undertook to prove, and did prove, is denied.

Look at this:

"If the existence of the spirit after death is proved, the resurrection, as they viewed the matter, followed of course."

Followed of course! Let Mr. George go to some of the hundreds of thousands of professing Christians of to-day, who believe in the immortality of the soul, but who deny a resurrection of the dead simply because they believe man possesses an immortal entity, and he will quickly learn whether or not it is seen that "the resurrection follows as a matter "of course." If it follows as a matter of course, pray tell us why the inevitable tendency of belief in it to denial of a resurrection? The Gnostics were the only Christians in the early days of the church, we believe, who, as a body, held to the immortality of the soul, and they, like many in the present day, not seeing any necessity for a resurrection, the real man being better off in the fancied disembodied state, denied the resurrection of dead persons.

Does it, then, follow "of course?" Not so thought Justyn Martyr, who said: "If, therefore, you fall in with certain men that are called Christians, who confess not this truth" (the resurrection) "but dare to blaspheme the God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob; in that they say there is no resurrection of the dead, but that immediately when they die their souls are received up into heaven—avoid them and esteem them not Christians." Nor did so think Wm. Tyndale, the martyr, who, replying to a Platonist, who attacked the doctrines of Luther, said: "In putting departed souls in heaven, hell, and purgatory, you destroy the argument wherewith Christ and Paul prove the resurrection." Darby, a so-called, orthodox writer, says: "It was just when the coming of Christ was denied in the church, or at least began to be lost sight of, that the doctrine of the immortality of the soul came in to REPLACE that of the resurrection."

We assert that the tendency of belief in the conscious existence of a spirit-entity between death and resurrection is not only to weaken faith in the resurrection, but to destroy it altogether, a result it has accomplished in myriads of cases. Notwithstanding the doctrine of the resurrection was constantly insisted upon by the apostles and early fathers, comparatively few Christians of the present time attach any importance to it.

Why the change? Simply because men have learned to believe, in opposition to the plain testimony of inspiration, that a part of man (the real man) lives on at death, and, if holy, is unspeakably happy; and hence little or no necessity for a resurrection exists. He who holds that a belief in the idea of consciousness in death leads, as a matter "of course," to belief in a resurrection of the dead, has a theory which is opposed to palpable facts. But he may possibly say with another, "so much the worse for the facts." The doctrine of the immortality of the soul had its origin in the fact that men were seen to die, and turn to dust, and it not being seen how they could ever live again, and their identity be restored, it was concluded that a part of man lived on.

The truth is unwittingly uttered in the remarks that call attention to the reference of Jesus to certain Scripture "which affirms that God was still the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jaco[illegible], though they had been long dead," but the c[illegible]ation completely overthrows our author's own argument. He insists that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are not dead. Yes, the truth is plainly spoken when it is said that Jesus refers to Scripture "which affirms that God was still the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, though they had been long dead."

The language, therefore, "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him," must of necessity have reference to something else than life in present actual possession. What is that something else? In what peculiar sense is God the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, though they have been long dead? And how does the fact that he is their God prove that they will be raised from the dead? We shall see.

Unto Abraham God made certain promises of a specific character (see Gen. xxii). These promises were substantially repeated to Isaac, to whom it was said: "I will perform the oath which I swore unto Abraham thy father" (see Gen. xxvi. 2, 5). Jehovah afterward renewed the promises to Jacob, prefacing them with this assurance: "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac. . . . And, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest" (see Gen. xxviii. 13–15). Thus we see that in order that these ancient worthies might know that the promises would be fulfilled, even though they might not be able to see how that fulfilment would or could be accomplished, the Lord announced himself their God.

This assurance was given to Moses also, as follows: "I am the God of thy fathers, and the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Why did God make this declaration to Moses? Doubtless to assure the prophet that the promises to his fathers were not forgotten, and though the patriarchs had died without seeing a fulfilment of them, they nevertheless would yet be fulfilled. Abraham, when as yet he and Sarah had no children, believed God would perform the promise of giving him a multitudinous seed: and when he went to offer up his only son, the child of promise, it was in the full confidence that "God was able to raise him up, even from the dead."

Well, were the promises made, for instance, to Abraham personally, fulfilled during his life-time? Let us see. Stephen, in his last address, declared: "Men, brethren and fathers, hearken; the God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall show thee. Then came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran: and from thence, when his father was dead, he removed him into this land, wherein ye now dwell. And he gave him none inheritance in it, no not so much as to set his foot on: yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession."—Acts vii. 2–5.

Now, what have we here? We have the undeniable fact that God promised Abraham a certain country for an inheritance, but never gave him, during his life-time, "so much as to set his foot on." What follows? Why, God being still his God, Abraham is, unto God, reckoned as alive, because he is to be raised from the dead to receive the promised inheritance. Thus it is that Moses showed the resurrection of the dead when he called God "the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob."

Paul declared concerning certain worthies, of whom were Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they that say such things, declare plainly that they seek a country . . . Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; for he hath prepared for them a city." Because of their faith and works of faith, "God is not ashamed to be called their God," and "he hath prepared for them a city." Have they received that which God hath prepared for them? No, in no wise, for if there was any thing about them which did not die it was not a subject of promise, because they to whom the promises were made "all died in faith:' and beside it is the "promised land" that they are to have for an inheritance. As, therefore, they died without having received what was promised them, and as God's promises are sure unto all whose God he remains to be, it follows, inevitably, that they will be raised from the dead.

The Sadducees were not ignorant concerning the promises of God to their fathers, and so when Jesus called their attention to the fact that those promises had not been fulfiled, they saw at once that in order to a fulfilment there must be resurrection. They recognized the fact as an unanswerable argument, for "certain of the scribes, answering, said, Master, thou hast well said. And after that they durst not ask him any question at all." A more convincing and conclusive argument for the resurrection could not be produced, for to deny it when thus presented was to deny the stability of God's word.

We think no earnest seeker after truth will fail to see how it is that God is the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, though they have been long dead, or in what sense all, whose God he is, "live unto him."

One thought more. The expression "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living," is incontrovertible evidence that they whose God he is not, are dead in that sense in which the patriarchs, whose God he is, are said to be alive. The reader will please note this point. If, therefore, the language proves that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are living and conscious at the present time, it must also prove that they whose God he is "ashamed to be called" are dead—and unconscious at the present time. Thus the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, so far as it is thought to be favored by the texts under consideration, is demolished by the inexorable logic of the very argument adduced to sustain it. Let it go: it is a doctrine which will not bear the test of Scripture investigation.

To all who name the name of Christ we would say, strive to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, for thus you will be ever owned as God's children; and though you "go down into the valley of the shadow of death," you need "fear no evil," for God will continue to be your God, and hence will bring you forth, in fulfillment of his promise, to sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the everlasting kingdom of Christ.

Rest assured that God is still the God of all his people, "though they have been long dead," and because he is so he will, in his appointed time, give unto them an eternal triumph over death. Until the dawn of that glad day, let us all both diligently strive and patiently wait.

It is written, "He shall keep the feet of his saints:" He will be with them in all the places whithersoever they go, and will preserve them, so that none shall be lost. He will not be "ashamed to be called their God, for he hath prepared for them a city." But what of those whose God he is "ashamed to be called?" "The wicked shall be silent in darkness." Then they will not be forever cursing and blaspheming against God and the whole host of heaven. No, no, they shall be "silent" in the "darkness" of the tomb. Wickedness shall cease, and evil shall be no more. O, that all who profess to serve God might earnestly and prayerfully consider these things, that so they might the more heartily and intelligently "sing praises to the Lord, and declare unto the people his doings."

We trust that all who feel an interest in the establishment of truth will aid in carrying forward the work which the Union, at our last anniversary, unanimously decided to undertake. Let us faithfully scatter the seeds of truth, and when the Lord of the harvest returns we will reap a bountiful harvest.

The Camp-Meeting.

Preparations for this meeting are going forward briskly. Br. Day, who superintends the fitting up of the grove has been hard at work for weeks, and from present appearance I judge that everything connected with the arrangements of the grove will be of the most inviting character. Seats with backs have been made, sufficient to accommodate comfortably 1,200 persons. A building for culinary purposes, 20 by 30 feet, has been erected, also a boarding tabernacle, 30 by 70 feet. There will be several wells of water on the premises, so that an abundant supply of cool spring water will be insured. An exceedingly neat and commodious stand for the ministry has been completed, and from it the word of the Lord will sound forth to, we hope, the conversion of sinners and the edification of saints. Our ground has an area of six acres, thickly covered with fine trees, which will afford abundant shade. It is located about a quarter of a mile from the grove of our "Crisis" brethren. Its location is excellent, being off of the main road, thus securing us in a great measure from the great clouds of dust that rise from the main road during dry weather. All things considered I do not know that a better site could have been selected, and we now desire that the North, East, South, and West will be fully represented. This will be our first general camp-meeting, and I trust that it will be characterized by love, joy, peace, faith, gentleness, meekness, temperance and holiness on the part of all professed followers of Christ who attend.

Brethren and sisters, come up to this feast with praying hearts. Come as peace-makers. Let those who claim to have grown in knowledge show that their growth in grace has increased proportionately. With heads full of theory and hearts full of grace we are strong. Let sour-godliness not be tolerated by any one in themselves. If we have more truth than others, we should be more thoroughly sanctified than others. Do not use truth club-fashion. Draw, but do not drive. Entreat, but avoid threatening. Bear with each other's infirmities. "Let not harsh words mar the good we might do here." Take Christ for your pattern. He has left us an example that we should foltow in his steps.

Let the coming feast show that we do love as brethren. Let brotherly love continue and abound. Keep controverted points out of our meetings, on the stand and elsewhere. We are agreed as to the signs of the speedy coming of Christ, life and immortality through Christ alone, the location of the saints' inheritance, practical godliness, and the work of converting sinners to Christ. Here we are one. Let us work here, and God will bless; but if we otherwise, distraction will prevail and God's cause will be dishonored, and Christ will be wounded in the house of his friends. Give no real occasion to the enemy to speak evil of us.

Let the business meetings be conducted in a wise, temperate, courteous, and heavenly spirit, that the name of God be not blasphemed. The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, yet they are mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds. A soft answer turneth away wrath, but grievous word stir up strife. Let us have peace so long as we profess to be subjects of the Prince of Peace. Follow peace with all men.

Yours, in Christ,

F. H. Burbank.

The Royal Test.

It was just before his death, and within view of that solemn event and all its associations, that the Lord spoke of himself as coming in glory to sit upon his throne and judge the nations. How significant is this fact? He was to be betrayed, judged and unrighteously condemned; but he would judge the world in righteousness notwithstanding all that should occur; nay, the bitter sorrow and the ignominy were waymarks in the path to a throne of peerless splendor and absolute supremacy. The world's representatives, in the persons of Jewish and Roman officials, were about to reject and crucify the Prince of Life; but as a prince of unequalled rank he would summon all nations to his presence, and pass upon them a sentence from which there shall be no appeal. The vilest of the people were to clamor for his blood, whilst thieves were his appointed associates in death; but he would come in glory, and holy angels with him, to welcome the righteous unto life everlasting, and to send the unholy to their doom. And the most tragic event in the world's history was about to take place; but the victim of that tragedy would yet be the acknowledged Ruler and Judge of universal humanity, and found an empire that should last as long as the sun.

All this, with much more, is suggested in this region of wonderful contrasts by the fact that on the eve of Gethsemane and Calvary our Lord enunciated his throne and kingdom and rule of judgment. The calm dignity of the speaker is worthy of the lofty theme; and though he knew that a long time would elapse before the actual fulfillment of his prediction, yet is there no thought of contingency, no hint of possible disappointment to his friends, or of the final triumph to his foes. It is all positive, real, certain. The chronology of prophecy is one thing, with which those may deal who have the requisite qualifications for that difficult branch of study; but the reality of its accomplishment, in the season which God has put in his own power, is quite another, which the most unlettered believer may press to his heart with the joy of absolute certainty. Jesus shall sit upon the throne of his glory, before him shall be gathered all nations, and his decision respecting the classes of character that are to stand at his bar will be final and irrevocable—Judas, Caiaphas, Herod and Pilate notwithstanding.

Let us, therefore, for practical purposes, attend to the test of loyalty which the King will employ on the awfully imposing occasion when He shall judge the living for the purpose of setting up his kingdom—"Ye did it unto me."

This is the central principle of Christian loyalty. We are not writing a commentary on the sublime prophecy. We simply select the Sovereign's test for the purpose of self-application. Will our religion bear this test? What is the principle that animates and moves our every-day Christianity? Are we benevolent, devout, self-denying to Christ? No; there is no mistake in the form of this question; we mean it to stand just thus, because it brings to light the very heart of the principle. It is assumed that we are benevolent, devout, self-denying; but why? It is right to be generous, it is respectable to be religious, it is prudent and healthful to practice self-denial—are these your motives? They cannot bear the royal test. The rightness, respectability, and prudence of certain lines of conduct may be granted at once, but what have they to do with personal loyalty to the living, personal Christ? There is quite a crowd of lower motives habitually influencing human conduct, many of them excellent in themselves; nay, men have often done very good things from very bad motives, as building a church or founding a charity to gratify self-righteous pride; but the absence of the purest and noblest of all motives is a clear proof that their actions could not bear the royal test. But how sublime and ennobling it is when every thing is done for the Saviour's glory! How truly then does a man come out of himself, his sect, and his circle, when he gives his heart, his service, his money, his life to the Lord! Prompted by gratitude, admiration, love, he lays himself and all he has at the Lord's feet; and the offering which is graciously accepted, will be splendidly rewarded when the King comes in his glory. "Ye did it unto me."

This is the secret of Christian fruitfulness. "Abide in me and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit, for apart from me ye can do nothing." Apart from him there is no pure sap to nourish the branch, and consequently no clusters of beautiful fruit to the glory of the Father. You may be a devout Catholic; or a firm churchman, high, broad, or low; or a determined dissenter, Arminian or Calvinistic; without bearing any Christian fruit, or fruit to Christ. If your conduct be not the result of vital union with the Lord himself, union with any body of professing Christians goes for nothing as a proof of discipleship. It is obvious that the royal test identifies the head and the members of the Church; they are one and indivisible in the counsels of God; and this union is recognized through all revelation. What is done to them consequently, as Christians, is done to him, whether it be in the form of consolation or persecution. In proof of the latter position take the memorable words which arrested the persecutor near Damascus: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" "Who art thou, Lord?" asked the terrified zealot. "And the Lord said, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest." It is clear, then, that work done to serve the interests of a religious society, or ecclesiastical system, does not for that reason prove itself a work of Christian fruitfulness. Nay, a thousand things have been done to serve "the Church," through a thousand years of ecclesiastical corruption, which not only Christian morality but the common sense of mankind must abhor as extremely iniquitous.

This is the strength of Christian faith. To live and labor, and patiently suffer for Christ himself; to bear whatever burden is laid upon us uncomplainingly for his sake; to endure as seeing him who is invisible; and to realize the fact that his eye is constantly upon us, as our Friend, and Brother, and Lord:—these things minister holy nourishment to faith, and make it strong for the day of conflict and sorrow. We then see Christ, not through the medium of any Church, but by the inner eye of the mind which he himself has anointed, and we become brave and bold to do or to suffer, to profess or protest as opportunity is presented or duty demands. The absent one then seems present—and he of whom cold criticism speaks as the historical Christ, is vividly realized in the life and love which are so pre-eminently his. O! in the day of his advent, may the character of our practical religion enable him to say of us, "Ye did it unto me." And then the writer and the reader will be unspeakably thankful for the privilege now granted us of serving such a Prince.—Editor of The Rainbow.

"Defects of the Reformation."

The following is an extract from an examination of this subject by the late Carl Augustus Auberlen, Ph. D., D. D. Pages 214–216. Translated by A. B. Paton. He points out the defects of the Reformation with great force, and says:

"This eschatology is limited in the main to the idea of a state of blessedness or misery after death: the justified, who have received the grace of God, go to God in heaven; others go to hell. Even in this it hardly goes beyond the individual stand-point. At the end of time stands the last day, to decide once more the everlasting fate of all men; though one does not see why this is necessary, as a definite judgment is passed upon all immediately after death. A new condition of the world, in which the creature in its diverse spheres attains to the existence for which it is destined, was so little thought of, that the actual destruction of the world was taught by the old theologians. 'Fulfilment,' says Quenstedt, 'does not consist in simple change or renewal of qualities, but in total destruction and annihilation of the very substance of the world itself.' In this way, not only is more made of the dualism of the blessed and the lost than Scripture warrants; for the Scriptures teach that the whole universe, heaven and earth, is to be renewed, and that a gloomy abode of death exists only 'without' this glorious and only world of life; but one entire half of the world, viz., nature, has been overlooked, and Christ is not perceived to be, as he is—the Restorer of All Things. And as their view of the end of all things is thus defective, so is their view of the development of things. In fact, proper reference to this is not to be found either in the eschatology or in the history (universal and individual) of redemption. In the doctrines concerning the final end, the defectiveness is shown in the fact that, the two middle members, which, according to the Scripture, lie between the present state and final perfect one, are thrown out: the region of death, (hades, sheol) as distinct from hell (gehenna); and the future reign of Christ and his people over all kingdoms and lands of this world—as distinct from the final end and fulfilment of all things. The one doctrine was sacrificed to oppose the Catholic doctrine of purgatory; the other, to oppose the Anabaptist chiliasm. They had not ethical and metaphysical breadth or freedom for the first; for the second, they had not historical completeness of view. The subjective stand-point has hindered a fuller development of the Protestant church; but it has hindered still more a knowledge of the kingdom of God: as the King was little thought of, compared with the high priest, so, naturally, was the kingdom. Hope and love were neglected as compared with faith; and so was the future appearing of Christ, compared with the past, and the idea of the kingdom compared with personal salvation. Protestantism, like Christ himself, preached in all sincerity, 'Repent, and believe the gospel,' but that other part of the preaching of Christ, 'The kingdom of God is come nigh,' it kept back; just as from the same causes it kept back the apostolic view of the resurrection of Christ, and gave too exclusive heed to his death.

"This neglect of these doctrines of the new creation, and everything miraculous that is involved in them, revenged itself at a later period. The supernatural character of divine revelation was not considered sufficiently, or rather, the supernatural in it was not studied fully and on all sides: the great universal miracles of the end, as of the beginning, were neglected. Gen. i.–xi. Hence the miracles of the middle period, which the Old and the New Testaments record, seemed like arbitrary interruptions of the steadfast course of things. If the Scriptural idea of a grand development of the world, through the human acts of the fall and the divine acts of the restoration, had been vividly realized, then the miracles of the Old and New Testament would have fallen naturally into their place as parts of one whole, and would not have seemed like unwarranted exceptions."

Socrates.

"Though Socrates had more just ideas concerning the nature and character of Deity, and also of the nature and obligations of virtue, than the generality of his countrymen, and even of the philosophers, he does not appear to have had any more knowledge than others concerning the great sanction of virtue, in the doctrine of a future state. In none of his conversations recorded by Xenophon, on the subject of virtue, with young men and others, is there the least mention of it, or allusion to it; which was certainly unavoidable, if he had really been acquainted with it and believed it.

"Speaking of the happiness of his virtuous pupils, he mentions the pleasure they would have in this life, and the respect that would be paid to them, and says that, 'when they died they would not be without honor consigned to oblivion, but would be forever celebrated.' Having said this, could he have forborne to add their happier condition after death, if he had had any belief in it?

"It is particularly remarkable that nothing that Xenophon says as coming from Socrates, not only in his conversations with his pupils, but even at his trial, and the scenes before his death, implies a belief of a future state. All that we have of this kind is from Plato; and though he was present at the trial, and therefore what he says is, no doubt, entitled to a considerable degree of credit, it wants the attestation of another witness; and the want of that of Xenophon is something more than negative; especially as it is well known that Plato did not scruple to put into the mouth of Socrates, language and sentiments that never fell from him, as it is said Socrates himself observed when he was shown the dialogue entitled Lysis, in which he is the principal speaker, as he is in many others.

"In Plato's celebrated dialogue entitled Phœdon, in which he makes Socrates advance arguments in proof of a future state, we want the evidence of some person who was present; for Plato himself was at that time confined by sickness, so that it is very possible, as nothing is said of it by Xenophon, that he might not have held any discourse on the subject at all.

"Besides, all that Socrates is represented by Plato to have said on this subject is far from amounting to any thing like certain knowledge and real belief with respect to it, such as appears in the discourses of Jesus, and the writings of the apostles. Socrates, according to Plato, generally speaks of a future state, and the condition of men in it, as the popular belief, which might be true or false. 'If,' says he, 'what is said be true, we shall in another state die no more.' 'In death,' he says, to his judges, 'we either lose all sense of things, or, as it is said, go into some other place; and if so, it will be much better; as we shall be out of the power of partial judges, and come before those that are impartial; Minos, Rhadamanthus, Alacus, Triptolemus, and others, who were demigods.' Taking his leave of them, he says, 'I must now depart to die, while you continue in life; but which of these is better, the gods only can tell; for in my opinion no man can know this.'

"His first argument is, that as everything else in nature has its contrary, death must have it also, and if so, it must be followed by life, as day follows night, and a state of vigilance always follows sleep. But might it not be said, that, for the same reason, everything that is bitter must, some time or other, become sweet, and everything that is sweet become bitter?

"His second argument is, that all our present acquired knowledge is only the recollection of what we knew in a former state. But what evidence is there of this?

"His third argument is, that only compound substances are liable to corruption, by a separation of the parts of which they consist; but the mind is a simple substance, and therefore cannot be affected by the dissolution of the body in death.

"This is certainly the most plausible argument of the three, but it is of too subtle a nature to give much satisfaction. If the mind have several powers and affections, and be furnished with a multiplicity of ideas, there is the same evidence of its being a compound as there is with respect to the body; and if the power of thinking, or mental action, bear any resemblance to corporeal motion, it may cease, and be suspended, though the substance remain."

Meeting in Illinois.

Notice is hereby given that there will be a meeting of Life Believers at the Cross roads in the grove, close by the White School-house No. 1, Holland Township, to commence on the 30th of June and hold over the Sabbath. Preaching brethren of different orders are invited to come and take part. Come one and all. Elders J. Lewis, S. L. Walter, and Clinkinbeard are invited.

From Geo. P. Hill.

Editor of Herald: I am pleased with much that I see in the Herald, and wish that others could be interested to learn the truth concerning man's nature and destiny. But the truth, as revealed in the gospel, is so strongly opposed to their idol creeds, that they will not listen to its alluring appeals, nor heed its generous requests. It is to them a "strange doctrine," therefore they cry, As our fathers were, so are we.

An evil eye;
Darkness;
Death.

Happy the man who hath God for his guide
In whose word and wisdom his heart doth abide;
A servant of his fellow—his heart it is free,
Happy, O happy, truly happy is he.

BETHLEHEM HOME SCHOOL.

This excellent and well-known institution has just passed into the charge of Rev. Ambrose Rondthaler, who for upwards of sixteen years has been a Professional Teacher and Principal of educational institutions in York, and at Bethlehem, Pa.

The course of study is thorough, and all students enter not only the school-room but also become part of the Principal's family. All sectarianism is banished from the school.

The Bible only is the standard of religious instruction.

For terms and particulars send for circular.

Rev. AMBROSE RONDTHALER,
Principal.

Note by the Editor.

It gives us pleasure to insert the above notice in the Herald of Life, that our friends may know where to send their children to a school of a right character. Br. Rondthaler is one of our firmest friends. For many years a minister in the Moravian church, but unsectarian, and a firm believer in the Life views.

The Lesson of the Spring.

BY E. K. S.

Long had the winter-winds blown chill,
O'er snow-capped height, and frozen strand;
Long voiceless was the murmuring rill,
And mighty rivers of the land.

Smothered within the frozen earth,
The Violet and Arbutus lay
Still yearning for the spring's sweet birth,
To burst their walls of clay.

When lo! a gentle voice was heard;
A balmy sweetness filled the air;
It woke the tender song of bird,
And fairy music, everywhere.

The ploughman turned the springing grass,
And piped his song of rustic cheer,
And as he heard the black-bird pass,
He whispered, "Spring is surely here."

The tiny flowers in lone retreat,
Hearing the joyous anthem ring,
Half wondered if they dared to peep,
To hail the coming of the Spring.

First timidly, then boldly one
Looked out upon the face of day,
Turned its chill brow unto the sun,
And laughed to greet the sunny ray.

Then one by one, till all the wood
Lay robed with cheeks of white and blue;
And Nature in her dreamy mood,
Woke from the old life to the new.

As children rashly haste to greet
Some joy they would not long delay,
And perish, ere their tender feet
Have found the calm and quiet way.

So Nature, in her kindliest hour,
Was met by bitter winds and storm;
And springing grass and bud and flower,
All perished in Spring's sunset morn.

And this the moral we would teach,
To young and old with eager heart;
Grasp only joys within your reach;
And make them of your life, a part.

Learn Patience in the walk of life;
A humble trust in God alway;
And know in life's severest strife,
A Blessing born for every day.

"The Wicked Must be Raised."

BY H. M. BRYANT.

An article with the above caption appeared in the "World's Crisis" of May 17. We wish through the Herald to notice some of the points presented by the writer to substantiate the assertion.

He first quotes a sentence from the "Child's Primer," "In Adam's fall we sinned all," and immediately proceeds to annihilate the Primer by the emphatic declaration,

"No such thing. Adam's fall brought death upon all. Adam died for his own sins, but not one of his posterity have ever died for their sins. Yet death is the penalty for sin." "Therefore justice demands that the sinner be raised from death and die for their own sins."

Now we do not give the writer this notice for the purpose of defending primer theology, notwithstanding we consider his attack on the time-honored juvenile volume uncalled for, and the distinction made, to be without a difference. By Adam's fall he doubtless meant his sin or transgression, as sin is the transgression of the law. And if we refer to Rom. v. 12, we read, "Wherefore as by one man sin entered the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men," (because Adam sinned? No), "for that all have sinned." James also agrees with Paul. He says, "Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin when it is finished, bringeth forth death."—James i. 15. "For the wages of sin is death."—Rom. vi. 23.

In sin, therefore, we discover the cause, or one of the causes that produces the effect—death. And if, in consequence of the relationship that exists between us and the first transgressor, we inherit the effect, do not we also by the same relationship inherit the cause or the first instalment of death, namely, sin? Most assuredly. Therefore, we still prefer the Primer Version, that by our relationship to an earthy, animal parent we inherit such a nature as by the immutable laws of generation, like begets like. Consequently, we find ourselves involved in sin by the natural law of generation, and without regeneration death eternal will be the result, as the "wages of sin." It is the "Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing."—John vi. 63.

As the result of sin is death, the query may arise, What causes sin? James has already informed us. "Lust, when it is conceived, bringeth forth sin, or transgression: hence sin is not the first cause; and the remedy that effects a cure must be applied to the foundation or seat of the disease. Therefore the law of God demands the nature that is productive of sin; as actual transgression is the development of the law that controls the animal man. The apostle informs us (Gal. v. 19), that "the works of the flesh are manifest." As much as to say, the law controlling the natural man produces legitimate fruit, agreeing in character with such nature, transmitted to us through the first representative, natural man. "For the first man was natural, and not spiritual."—1 Cor. xv. 46.

Thus, however far our first parent fell, he could not have fallen from a spiritual to a natural man, as he did not possess a spiritual nature; and he could not have fallen from an elevation to which he had never attained; and nowhere, in all the book of God, are we taught that Adam's nature was changed by the trial in the Garden of Eden. The animal man was placed on trial as an animal man; and the strength only of the animal was developed, not to demonstrate to the Creator the power of the creature, but to demonstrate to the creature his own impotency and the superiority of his Maker.

The man, not God, is taught the lesson, and made to understand his own inferiority and incapability of controlling, unaided, his natural propensities, or the law of his nature. Like the apostle, the "law of sin, that was in his members, brought him into captivity," (Rom. vii. 23), thus demonstrating to him his unfitness in his present animal condition to have the dominion. The law that condemned Adam was a law present that condemned the man of the future, as all men will do the same things and commit the same acts under the same circumstances; and never has there a child of Adam lived but that would have done precisely as he did, had they been surrounded by the same force of circumstances with which he was surrounded. And the apostle, in referring to him says, "As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy."—1 Cor. xv. 48. All bear his image and sustain his nature. Hence the condemnation was by one that represented all. The stream cannot rise higher than the fountain; consequently the law that condemns the fountain must condemn the stream. The question may recur, Was not Adam condemned for an actual act of transgression? We will suppose the forbidden fruit to have been an apple. The temptation is before him, and when he had fully determined I will eat of it, and reached forth his hand to grasp the forbidden fruit, is he not a transgressor before the actual act is committed? Most certainly. Hence by the act of transgression he was true to his nature as an animal man. True, the actual act was condemned. Murder cannot be condemned without condemning the murderer. Sin cannot be condemned without condemning the nature that produces sin. The law of God was as spiritual six thousand years ago as now. It condemned Adam; it condemns us; it condemned Paul. He says, "For we know the law is spiritual; but I am carnal, (or animal), sold under sin."—Rom. vii. 14. An outward, physical act is not necessary in order to condemnation. A man may be a murderer and never take life. "He that hateth his brother is a murderer."—1 John iii. 15. And "whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery already in his heart."—Matt. v. 28.

This animal nature, or law controlling the man of flesh, is condemned by the law of God, from the fact it produces acts agreeing in character with itself, and is the soil from which spontaneously grows the following fruits: "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like."—Gal. v. 19–21.

This is the savory dish for which the writer in the article referred to puts in a special plea, and prates loudly of justice. Was not the spiritual law of God that condemned the tree, productive of such fruit, the perfect embodiment of justice? Let the apostle answer. "Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good."—Rom. vii. 12. The "Crisis" writer says, "Justice demands that these characters live again." If justice demands the resurrection of the animal man, or that the sinner have life restored to him, the condemnation could not be just; and an act of injustice has been committed, which act must recoil upon the originator, and no future act of justice could possibly obliterate the injustice already committed. Thus he charges the God of justice, love and mercy, with an act of rank injustice, and demands of him a reparation of the injury.

Again, if justice demands that the sinner live, it follows that when he lives justice is satisfied; and the justice, that gives him life, cannot take it from him again. The theological problem that has ever exercised the mind of the Bible student has been, "How can God be just and the justifier of the ungodly? but this writer emphatically affirms, God cannot be just without justifying the ungodly. Blasphemy. Our God has never involved himself in debt to the animal man. "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Rom. vi. 23. "For by grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God."—Eph. ii. 8. Who then will be justified to life? The faithful. "Therefore being justified by faith we have peace with God."—Rom. v. 1. Hence there is no justification without faith; and no resurrection without justification; and no salvation without a resurrection. Consequently the natural must give place to the spiritual, by faith, before we can be justified or hope for future life. The first Adam must be driven out and the second Adam installed in his place: "For, if ye live after the flesh, (or natural man) ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit (or spiritual man) do mortify the deeds of the body ye shall live."—Rom. viii. 13. Thus the animal nature must be changed and we be made partakers of the divine nature, by faith, through the great and precious promises. See 2 Pet. i. 4. Being therefore in possession of a new nature, another law must of necessity control the new creature. "Which, after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness."—Eph. iv. 24. And we shall find fruit resulting from and agreeing in character with such nature; "which are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, meekness, faith, temperance: against such there is no law."

"This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life; and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son hath not life." O when will men cease their endeavors to extricate the God of heaven and earth from seeming difficulties? And when will they cease to strengthen the hands of the wicked, and to cause the hearts of the righteous to be sad by promising the wicked life? See Ezek. xiii. 22.

Dogs in a Siege.

The thought must have occurred to all reflective and observant persons, that some animals may possibly know more about the affairs of this world than they are supposed to. If animals do not understand human language, neither can we understand their language. If a dog cannot read and write, neither can a man bark. If a horse cannot peruse a morning paper, neither can the accomplished editor of the morning paper trot a mile in two minutes and a half, or neigh like a steed of the prairies.

It is probable that, so far as a mutual understanding is concerned, animals have the advantage of us; for dogs, horses and some other beasts do have a partial understanding of their actions. All of us have observed how the sympathies of human beings and of animals blend together on the occasion of some great calamity. The house dog will share the household grief at the death of a member of the family, and dogs have even been known to lament themselves to death on the grave of a beloved master. The cavalry horse shares the battle spirit to the full extent with his rider, and it is said that during the war in France a troop of horse, whose riders had been slain galloped into line and rallied ready for action, on hearing the sound of a trumpet.

This brings us to an interesting report of the conduct of the dogs and cats in Paris during the recent siege of that city. It might be supposed that the siege was no concern of theirs, but the facts show that it did concern and interest them, for they exhibited all the unhappiness of the Parisians themselves at the distressed condition of the beleagured capital. The dogs took notice of the abnormal condition of things from the first day. They seemed to know there was something wrong—that some calamity was hanging over the city. The beating of drums, the parades, the rapid movements of bodies of armed men, and the fierce preparations for defence, excited them, and rendered them uneasy—"set them to reflecting," is the expression used by M. Gautier, a French journalist, who described the situation, and its effects on the dogs. The suburban dogs, that were driven in with their masters, seemed like strangers in an unknown land. They were uncertain in their movements, they hesitated in their choice of streets, scented their paths, and, according to M. Gautier, at every corner took counsel of some other dog, supposed to be more familiar with the neighborhood.

At last matters grew so bad that a common sense of danger impelled them to a co-operative movement. In true human style, they resorted to public meetings. "Every morning," says M. Gautier, "there assembled before our door what appeared to be a council of dogs, presided over by a broad-backed, bandy-legged, brown and yellow terrier. The other dogs paid him great deference and listened to him attentively. It was evident that he spoke to them; not after the manner of men, in an articulate harangue, but by short barks, varied mutterings, pursing of the lips, movements of the tail, and excessive play of the physiognomy. Every now and then a new comer seemed to bring news, and the council commented on it, and after a while dispersed."

As the siege progressed, and provisions grew scarce, the poor animals seemed to wonder why they were not fed. They grew unusually gentle, and would put their noses into the hands of strangers, as if begging for food. Then, as the famine advanced they grew suspicious and wild. They appeared to apprehend that after the horses, and the pigeons, and the parrots and canary birds had been slain and eaten, their time would come next.

The cats perceived this sooner than the dogs did, and became exceedingly cautious as to whom they allowed to touch them; on the least quick movement they fled to the roof or the cellar; but at length the dogs, too, "smelt a rat," and ran away when any one called or whistled to them. Birds, but especially the sparrows, for some time visited the city, as usual, to pick up crumbs and worms, but after finding themselves already made targets of, they disappeared and returned no more.

M. Gautier regards this conduct as proof that animals think, and have a more intelligent conception of things than we give them credit for; and it is not improbable that if we could communicate directly with them, in a mutual language, we might find them possessed of something higher than the instinct we attribute to them.

Pythagoreans.

"According to the Pythagoreans, the human soul is not of a nature so distinct from the body that it has both some connection with it, and some properties in common with it. 'The source of vice,' says Timæus, 'is in pleasure and grief, desire and fear, which, being excited in the body, get mixed with the soul, and have obtained various names from their various effects, as love, desire,' etc., so that the passions are common to the soul and the body, though they are first excited in the latter.

"They maintained, however, the superiority of the mind to the body, as when Archytas says, 'In all human things wisdom is most excellent, as the sight is more so than the other senses, the mind than the soul, and the sun than the stars.' Here we have two parts of the soul, or of the man, distinguished by their respective names, the former signifying the seat of intelligence, and the other that of mere animal life.

"Timæus explains this division of the soul farther, when he says, 'One part of the human soul is endued with reason and intelligence, but the other is without reason, and stupid. The former is more excellent, but both have their seat about the head, that the other parts of the soul, and the body too, might be subservient to it, as being under the same tabernacle of the body. But that part of the soul which is without reason, and which is prone to anger, has its seat above the heart; and that which has concupiscence has its seat about the liver. But the brain is the principle and root of the spinal marrow; and in it the soul has the seat of its government.'

"Theages divides the soul in the same manner. 'One of the parts,' he says, 'has reason, another anger, and the third desire. The virtue of prudence belongs to the first part, fortitude to the second, and temperance to the third, and justice is the virtue of the whole soul.'

"The account given by the Pythagoreans of the state of the soul after death, is still more unsatisfactory and inconsistent. According to the golden verses, the soul is immortal. 'Science, and ancient and venerable philosophy, free the mind from false and vain opinions and great ignorance, and raise it to the contemplation of divine things; to the knowledge of which, if a man so attain as to be content with his lot, and to rise above the accidents of life, and thus aspire after the moderate and temperate life, he is in the way to true felicity. And certainly, he to whom God has given this lot is led by the truest opinions to the most happy life. But if, on the other hand, any be refractory, and will not obey these sacred precepts, he will be amenable to those laws which denounce both celestial and infernal punishments. Unrelenting punishments await the unhappy manes, and other things mentioned by the Ionic poet, as derived from ancient tradition, by the hearing of which he wished to draw the minds of men to religion and purity. On this account I approve of his conduct. As we cure diseased bodies by unwholesome medicines, if they will not yield to those that are wholesome, so we restrain minds with deceitful discourses, if they will not yield to true ones. On this account, too, foreign punishments are denounced,' that is, such as were believed by foreign nations, 'as the transmigration of souls into various bodies, viz., those of the idle into the bodies of women; murderers, into those of wild beasts; of the libidinous, into those of hogs or bears; of the light and rash into fowls; of the idle and foolish, into aquatic animals.' Certainly the man who could write this, could have no belief in the future punishment of the wicked, whatever he might think of the state of the virtuous after death.

"But when the question, 'What is death?' was put to Secundus, his answer is decisively against any future state at all. 'It is,' he says, 'an eternal sleep, the dread of the rich, the desire of the poor, the inevitable event, the robber of man, the flight of life, and the dissolution of all things.' Such were the comfortless prospects of this philosophy in its most advanced state. What a wretched choice would a Christian make by exchanging his religion for this!" J. Priestly.

Chist Born to be King.

At the birth of Jesus, wise men came from the East to Jerusalem, inquiring, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" Being convinced that the Messiah was born, these wise men felt confident that he was destined to be the King. And this impression was in harmony with prophecy, for the angel Gabriel, in predicting the first advent of the Messiah, styles him, "Messiah the Prince"—an heir to a throne; and about four hundred and eighty-three years later, the same angel affirmed, "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David." In harmony with this, Jesus himself "witnessed a good confession" "before Pontius Pilate," in reply to Pilate's question, "Art thou a King?" Jesus confessed, "To this end was I born;" but in the same conversation, he affirmed, "My kingdom is not from hence"—not from this time onward. At some time, and in some locality, he must reign as King.

If he is simply to be King in heaven, over disembodied men, why need he ever have been born to be King? Would it not be more appropriate to have a bodiless King over bodiless subjects? A kingdom with a physical King, and immaterial subjects, would be a strange kingdom. But when we learn that our vile bodies are to be "changed" at his return from heaven, and "fashioned like unto his glorious body," and that "we shall reign on the earth," the plan looks harmonious and beautiful. With physical subjects to reign over, it was appropriate that Jesus should be "born to be a King." Soon may he "reign in Mount Zion," and be "King over all the earth." W. S.

The Loss of Self-Respect.

Real self-respect is that high, noble, manly feeling which comes only from doing right and from having a good heart. The moment you do wrong or do a mean act (and meanness is the worst form of wrong-doing), that moment you lose your self-respect. Last fall I saw some boys in my orchard stealing apples. I went up to the fence, intending to call out to them to take all they wanted and welcome, only next time to ask before they took. I had no hostile intention, but as soon as they saw me they ran as if for dear life. A boy who respects himself holds up his head, and runs away from no man. Self-reproach always accompanies the loss of self-respect. When you have done any thing wrong, although the world may not know it, you know it yourself, and you cannot get away from the thought.

Some years ago, when I was a boy, a party of us boys went one afternoon and made a sort of camp on the edge of a pond known as Pitman's Pond, because it was on the farm of a man named Pitman. We built a house of bark and branches, and a large fire-place and chimney of flat stones, and in it we made a roaring fire. It was great fun. We played that we were sailors cast ashore, wrecked, and that we would live there till some ship passed by. Of course we must live, so we went into neighbor Pitman's melon patch and helped ourselves to the best melons; then we tried his corn-field, and returned to our fire with great stores of green corn, which we roasted by the fire, and ate of our plunder with great relish. I felt all the time that it was wrong, but were we not playing wrecked sailors, and were we not entitled to food wherever we could find it? But this flimsy excuse would not do. In plain English, I had been stealing melons and corn, and I could not deceive myself by any talk of "wrecked sailors." A few days after, I was walking down the road, when "Old Pitman" came along in his wagon. I tried to avoid him, but he hailed me (I guess he suspected that I was one of the melon thieves) and asked me to get in and ride with him. I tried to excuse myself, but he was all of a sudden, as I thought, very kind, and insisted on my riding with him. I at last consented, and took my seat by his side. He began then to tell about the raid on his melon patch. How "a lot of boys from over where they were building the railroad—Irish boys, who had not been taught better, boys whose bringing up had been bad, boys whom we should pity and try to reform," and all that kind of thing—had been robbing his melon patch, etc. I tell you, boys, he was awful hard on me; every word cut like a knife; till finally, when he said, "Of course, Chris, you, with your good bringing up, never would do such a thing!" When he said this I melted quite down, and I burst into tears, and sobbed out, "Mr. Pitman, I did it. I took those melons, and I am very sorry for it." I was utterly humiliated; my self-respect was gone, and I did what was the best thing for me to do—I confessed and asked forgiveness. After my confession he gave me a few kind words of admonition, excused me on the ground that I was probably led away thoughtlessly in my play, and then he forgave me; and when I parted from him he shook hands kindly, and in his cheery way said, "Now, Chris, don't err again by doing a mean act, by which you lose your self-respect."

Before I saw Mr. Pitman I thought nobody knew that I took those melons. At home everybody treated me as kindly as ever. People bowed to me as pleasantly, and my Sunday-school teacher was as candid; but all the time I had the inward consciousness that I had done wrong, and I was not happy. I had lost my self-respect, and when that is gone a sad load takes its place on the heart. Self-respect makes a boy light-hearted and jolly, but the loss of it weighs him down most fearfully.—Churchman.

The Mischievous Hand.

See the roguish little eyes peeping out from under the dark lashes, and the little hand stretched out to pull down the pretty ink-stand, which is on the table. Take care, little Mattie, very pretty it looks on mamma's scarlet table-cloth, but oh! the ugly black stain it will make if mischievous hands disturb it.

So it is in each little life, naughty deeds sometimes look very plain at a distance, but once meddled with, are sure to leave dark, ugly stains. Mattie's mamma tried hard to keep the little hands from mischief, but in vain, and many a merry time did Mattie miss, in consequence of being punished for some piece of mischief. My dear wee ones, have you mischievous hands? If you are tempted to grieve your mamma by letting the little hands stray where they ought not, do some little kindness instead, and remember that little verse which says:

"Satan finds some mischief still For idle hands to do."

—Children's Friend.

"My father taught me," said a certain once poor but now very rich man, "never to play till my work was finished, and never to spend my money till I had earned it. If I had but an hour's work in the day, I must do that the first thing, and in an hour. And after this I was allowed to play; and then I could play with much more pleasure than if I had the thought of an unfinished task before my mind."

A Bible View of Hell:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

PREACHERS AND PREACHING.

AN unknown friend in England has sent us "The Christian World" of May 12, which gives an account of the meeting of "The Congregational Union of England and Wales." The "Rev. THOMAS JONES, of Swansea, delivered the opening address. His subject was "The Work of the Christian Preacher." "Preaching," said Mr. Jones, "will be ever necessary, because there are in me and in every thoughtful and godly man, emotions, loves, faiths, experiences, that can never be written, but must be looked, spoken and gesticulated." We commend the following remarks in his address:

"There is nothing superfluous in "the gospel of our salvation. Whatever has been revealed is needed; and the wise preacher will take the broadest possible view of the grand theme, will endeavor to see it as it is, and to assimilate it, and make it the life of his own spirit; and, having done so, he will reject every theolog cal system, every religious creed, and all the narrow-minded traditions of the pulpit, and the ignorant prejudices of the churches, that require him to set aside or withhold any doctrine, suggestion, precept, duty or promise contained in the Word of God."

The following on "sectari n fences," also, is good, and shows how absurd it is to attempt to fence in the mind and shut out an increase of knowledge:

SECTARIAN FENCES.

"I have seen in the inland counties of England flocks of sheep in the midst of a large field, fenced in by hurdles. The poor captive flock looked with longing eyes to the green pastures beyond the fence, but these were not for them. (Laughter.) There, within the narrow limits assigned, must they graze. Thus do men enclose within their creeds particular portions of the truth, and they expect you to rest and be satisfied within the narrow circle they have formed. But you are not satisfied; and now and again you cast a longing glance upon the pasture lands beyond—you see the waving fields that stretch away to the horizon, and you would remove the obstacles, and have the liberty of these vast outlaying domains of Truth. But this is not to be; and when you think or speak thus, you are, if not a heretic, bordering upon it. (Loud applause.) It is delightful to escape from this narrowness into the open regions of the Bible. Entering here you may sing with David: 'The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want.' Here you lie down in green pastures, rest by the still waters, drink of the living fountains, muse by the flowing streams, climb the fruitful hills, inhale the fragrance of vineyards and orchards and gardens, and satisfy your soul with the fatness of this land which flows with milk and honey."

The following affords food for reflection, and preachers everywhere and of all persuasions will do well to lay it to heart:

METHODS OF PREACHING.

"Having spoken of the preacher's subject, let us now consider what manner of speech he should use. His aim should be to make the people understand the gospel, as far as that is possible; to believe that the gospel is truth; to feel that it is 'the power of God;' and to embody it in a holy Christian life. And the question here is, What kind of speech is best adapted to accomplish this four-fold purpose? There should be perfect harmony between the words we use and the convictions and feelings of our hearts. We read of the inspired teachers that their minds were 'moved,' that they felt 'the burden of the word of the Lord,' and that His word was in their 'heart as a burning fire.' Hence speaking became a necessity, for thereby they lightened the burden, and gave out the fire that consumed them. When they had tidings of mercy to deliver, their 'doctrine dropped as the dew, and as the small rain upon the tender herb;' but when the judgments of heaven were their theme, they 'cried aloud,' and their speech was terrible as a midnight alarm. Sometimes there is a wail of sorrow in their words—a sorrow so deep and great that they fail to express it—they speak in broken sentences, and their words resemble the mutterings of a storm which fails to break into loud reverberating thunder. Now, before a man is justified in using their language, he must have the same depth of feeling. To use their terrible words without their emotion is false. (Hear, hear.) Our words must correspond with the clearness of our mental insight and the intensity of our spiritual emotion. We live in the most real of ages, the most intense of ages, and, I think, an age of great, earnest faith. We must be earnest, true, sincere and honest; and the day must come in England when the pulpit shall not be regarded as a place where the speaking is hollow. (Applause.) If 'the burden of the word of the Lord' weighs heavily upon you—if your spirit is in anguish for the sins of your people, and if your heart is breaking with a divine concern for the souls of men, then speak as prophets spoke. Blow the trumpet in Israel, sound the lamentation in Judah; cry aloud, 'Woe, woe unto thee, saith the Lord God.' But if not, then you should speak calmly, and reason with men, and suggest the truth, and persuade and attract as a friend; nothing more.

BE TRUE AND REAL.

"Loud-sounding words which are out of all harmony with the state of our mind are of no value. Falling on the speaker's own ears, they sound hollow, and in his deepest heart he knows that they have no meaning. The hearers also, in time, will discover the truth of the matter, and see plainly enough that what he says is said because speaking is his profession. And then will follow this most natural result—the alienation of thoughtful men from the institutions of religion. Brethren, the first thing for us all is to be real, for no good can come of unreality. Mimic thunder causes no alarm, artificial flowers have no fragrance, painted fire does not burn. (Applause.) The language of the Bible is poetic and figurative, and such should the language of the preacher be. The reasons of this should be stated, for it did not come to pass by accident. First, there is a pre-ordained harmony between things spiritual and things material. Material objects represent spiritual truths, and are intended to do so. The whole universe is an embodiment of Divine thoughts, and every thing in nature is more than it seems. The inspired writers beheld this harmony, and cho e from the visible creation the proper symbols to represent the thoughts they had to utter. Again, it is impossible to press the great spiritual truths into mere word-definitions. I envy not that man who can satisfy himself on Sunday morning by the mere use of words. It is a proof to me that he has not gone far into the mysteries of the kingdom of God. Let him go there, and he may become a little poetic, to say the least of it. Use the best words within your reach. Borrow from nature symbols or emblems of vastness, tenderness, beauty, splendor, grandeur, duration; rob the sun of his light, the thunder of its terror, the stars of their trembling beauty, the young glow of the dawn—bring all that is grand, sublime and wonderful in nature; exhaust the English tongue, exhaust nature if you can, and you will still find that 'the glorious gospel of the blessed God' has not been fully expressed. The widest channels of human speech are too narrow for the flood of Divine truth; it overflows the banks, and carries away the works we have constructed."

BE BOLD.

"An arrogant declaimer the preacher should never be; but the timidity that hesitates, the doubt that stammers in the presence of the people, and the caution that can do little more than apologize for the gospel, should be far from him. The prophets cried, 'Thus saith the Lord;' and the apostles said, 'What we have seen and heard declare we unto you.' They gazed, and saw the Divine visions; they listened and heard the Divine voice; and therefore spoke with confidence and authority. May we not do the same? Have we never heard a voice, or seen a vision of truth, in the Bible, in nature, or in our own consciousness, of which we can speak with unwavering confidence, and even dare to dogmatize? If not, then preaching is not our vocation; but if we have, we are bound to use 'great plainness' and 'boldness of speech.' A mincing, affected style of speaking, accompanied, as it generally is, with commonplace thinking, educated vanity, and dignified dulness, will neither convert the world, nor edify the Church; but the clear, thoughtful, bold, ringing words of an earnest man God will bless. In the ancient times, 'holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost,' and there is a power corresponding to this manifested in the history of the Christian preacher. There are seasons when all the faculties of his mind are enlarged; his spirit is bathed in a heavenly light; his heart yearns for the salvation of men; his faith is changed into vision; his love is kindled into a bright consuming flame; and his whole being seems permeated by a mysterious force which belongs not to him at other times. The promise of the Bible is fulfilled in him—he is 'baptized with the Holy Ghost and with power.' 'The hand of the Lord' is upon him, and he quivers under the awful touch. At such a season as this, he should not permit the conventionalisms of public worship, or any supposed dignity of the pulpit, to restrain the Divine afflatus. God has chosen him, for the time, to be a medium between himself and his Church. On one side of his nature he is in contact with heaven, on the other he touches the congregation; and he should yield himself to the power that is working in him, and allow the life-giving current to flow freely to the people. You may trust yourselves in these bright hours; for every word is living, every sentence burns, and every utterance is melodious when you are 'moved by the Holy Ghost.' You have then reached the nethermost springs of music, therefore play on; and minds shall be enlightened, hearts shall be subdued, souls shall be saved, and evil spirits shall be chased away by the lofty strains of your inspired song. Will you let me make this remark? It is a common mistake with English preachers, if there be a great movement in the depth of their heart, to keep it back. Why, sir, God put it there; He put it there that you may let it flow forth. Do not quench the Holy Spirit; do not restrain the Divine afflatus. If He answers your prayers, and a movement passes through your spirit like the cooling breeze on a hot day, then let it pass on. Speak as you are moved. Believe in the Holy Ghost. He is still living; He is not a mere report; He is not a mere history. Let us believe in our own prayers and in the spirit of God; and when He comes down upon us, let us use the liberty He intended us to use."

We trust the foregoing extracts may be read with profit to others besides preachers. God does not give us light on his word to be put under a bushel, or to be hid because some are fearful of its effects, or because it is beyond or even opposed to some of our own or others previous positions. Israel might have remained forever at Horeb if the Lord had not said, "Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount: turn you and take your journey," etc.—Deut. i. 67. There is a proneness in all to love rest; and having become settled, as they suppose, in some important truth, they dwell upon it with self-complacency, and say the same things over and over till they weary others with their one idea, and forget that God has bid them, "Go forward." The land of still more glorious truths is before us; and let us beware that we do not fall before we reach it, as some of ancient Israel did.

GRACE AND GRATITUDE.

ARE we doing what we can to make known to others the precious and glorious truths which the LORD, in his great grace, has made known to us? Grace prompts gratitude; living faith works; light and responsibility are twins. "I have not concealed the words of the Holy One."—Job vi. 10. "I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart; I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation: I have not concealed thy loving kindness and thy truth."—Psa. xl. 10. "And they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child."—Luke ii. 17. "I kept back nothing that was profitable to you."—Acts xx. 20. These are fine precedents, noble examples. Let us copy and follow them. The time in which we live, the importance of the truths we have accepted, and the honor of our glorious MASTER, require this at our hands.

The time in which we live. Every age has its peculiarities; every generation its special duties modified by these peculiarities. The present age is marked by wonderful mental activity; every region of thought is occupied by inquisitive students; and, in this country at least, freedom of speech is allowed to all men who will honestly express their convictions within the limits of social order and religious reverence. Nothing escapes the keen inquisition of the day: and the result in our department of earnest labor has been the vindication of some great truths which tradition had long obscured, or false glosses perverted. We—the expression of course includes our esteemed fellow-workers—feel that the time is auspicious. Men are inquiring whether the doctrines we teach will stand the test of Scripture. This is just what we wished above all things. By that blessed test we desire to be tried. Let true criticism and competent learning come to the task. The Bible is open; we believe it is inspired; we reverence the holy oracles; and we want to accept and teach only what they utter. To have clear apprehensions, as far as may be, concerning the church and the kingdom of Christ, the nature and destiny of man, and the character and government of God, is supremely desirable; and to place before others at such a time as this the conclusions we have reached on these and kindred subjects, is a duty we may not neglect—a privilege we would not willingly forego. Let us courteously ask our readers if they are doing what they can to diffuse these truths. We hold ourselves responsible for the appearance of the magazine at the proper time; but that is the limit of our power. It is at this point that the work of our friends begins; at this point all is left with them, and upon their co-operation we rely. Of David it is said that "he served his generation." True, but he has been serving all generations since. Let us serve ours; and, by the blessing of God, the light we are privileged to diffuse, may stream across generations yet unborn, and fill with joy and gratitude many a heart as it turns in worship and love to the glorious Head of the church.

The importance of the truth we have received suggests that we should make them known to others. To state this proposition is to prove it. No intelligent man will ask argument in support of the self-evident. Assuming, therefore, as granted, that these truths are important, let us say a word or two on that pleasant motive-power, Christian benevolence. Christian benevolence! What a sublime privilege and honor it is for any human being to do good to his fellow-man from regard to Christ the blessed Son of God! To do good!—O, yes, we believe in "good works," Sir Antinomian!—to do good, physical, mental, or spiritual, because we love our Lord Jesus who went about doing good, is a luxury indeed. Already many are giving fervent thanks to Him from whom every good cometh, for the light and liberty, the joy and peace they have obtained through the medium of this publication; already, east, west, north, and south, at home and in the colonies, petty persecution is laying its hands on those who deny the "ferocious superstition"* of everlasting torments, and believe the glorious revelation, that eternal life is the gift of God in Christ Jesus; and already the "Rainbow" is denounced by the persecutors as the advocate of pestilent heresy, whilst the editor and his friends fulfil the prophecy of Paul, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith! All this is proof positive that the precious truths we defend are making their way under the direction of Him whom we desire to serve. Truth is a revolutionist, for its mission is to attack and overthrow error—a mission which it will not cease to carry on until complete and everlasting victory be declared on our side. The pride of human nature will contend for the doctrine of natural immortality;† it cannot brook the idea of being robbed of the "god-like attribute," with which heathen speculation has endowed it; but it will have to descend from its giddy altitude, for mere theories of human nature cannot live when the broad light of divine revelation falls upon them. Earnestly, therefore, would we beseech our readers, on the ground of Christian kindness to their friends and neighbors, to co-operate in the diffusion of that pure and holy light.

The honor of our glorious MASTER requires this at our hands. What live we for? Why have we been made alive in Christ Jesus? What is the meaning of existence as new creatures in him? Are we not called and qualified for the highest service by the Spirit of the living God? No doubt each of us has sung the following lines and felt their truth:

"My gracious Lord, I own Thy right
To every service I can pay;
And call it my supreme delight
To hear Thy dictates, and obey.

What is my being for but Thee,
Its sure support, its noblest end?
Thy ever-smiling face to see,
And serve the cause of such a Friend?"

Consecration has no nobler object, service no higher end, than the glory of Him who gave himself for us, and who is coming again that our joy may be full. If regret can find entrance into the minds of any who shall be glorified when the MASTER returns, let it not be, in the case of any one of us, that we neglected precious opportunities of speaking of him as "the Eternal Life," and the FATHER'S anointed KING of the universal empire.—EDITOR of the Rainbow.

* Charles Buxton, Esq., M. P., in the House of Commons.

† NATURAL IMMORTALITY.—Belgravia seems to have exceptionally good opportunities of hearing both sides of this great question. Not long since, on Sunday morning, at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, Mr. Liddell denounced the "fashionable doctrine" of immortality only in Christ, which he said was "pervading all classes of the community," as an abominable and damnable heresy, much worse than the belief in purgatory, and to be met by the stern rebuke, "Get thee behind me, Satan." At the same time, in Eaton Chapel, not half a mile distant, Mr. Minton was pronouncing the idea of an immortality inherent in man to be a pure figment of heathen philosophy, invented to relieve the awful gloom that always surrounds the grave where life and immortality have not been brought to light by the Gospel. He said it was part of that philosophy against which Paul warned the Christians of his own day; though now, strange to say, it was held to be so essential to Christianity, that those who denied it were accused of preaching "another Gospel," and asked "if the irony of events could produce any thing to exceed this avenging of the Greek philosophers upon their greatest antagonist by the hands of his own professed disciples." One thing appears quite certain, that the subject is attracting universal attention, and will not be easily laid to rest.—Christian World.

THE MYSTERY OF CREATION.

IT was, from the beginning, in anticipation that God was, in a most marvellous way, to show forth his glory in creation and make a full unfolding on its platform of all the attributes of his inexhaustible being. To this end creation, proceeding from him, was to be brought into marvellous accord with him through the creation of a new order of being, differing from angels, linked to the world of matter, subject to its limitations and liabilities, and yet made in the image of himself and so linked to God. The mystery of evil was to be allowed to do its work in this new realm and upon this new creature of His hand that, in the discipline of conflict with it, he might gain a wider experience and be prepared for his high destiny. Evil was suffered to impose its yoke of bondage to corruption upon the neck of the creation which God had made, and upon man placed upon its summit. But the promise was, that the mystery of evil should be rebuked and disclosed by the revelation of a greater mystery of godliness, by which the fallen sons of men, redeemed from sin and death, should be made the appropriate and efficient instruments of showing forth the glory and the grace of God in the ages to come, and over the field of creation to be disenthralled at their manifestation. This plan, therefore, required that some sheltered nook in the universe should be made ready for the introduction and abode of this new creature, man. A planet in this solar system out of innumerable systems was designated. The earth was chosen on which the mighty Powers before referred to, which men call the powers of nature, have wrought to produce a settled order, such as we do not see elsewhere. No other planet of this system, and certainly no one of those furnaces of blazing fire we call fixed stars, presents such an aspect of chemical equilibrium and cosmical order as we find here, where sun and moon and stars of light, fire and hail, snow and vapors, stormy wind, mountains and all hills, fruitful trees and all cedars, unite not only in praising God, but in sustaining and blessing man. Man then was placed here, the crowning work in the whole series of the works of God, the monarch of creation; the earth the most perfect work yet cast up from the depths of this seething sea of fire, and man upon it, the pearl of great price, which even the Lord of glory came to seek and find.

And how did He come? He was made flesh, and dwelt among us. He took upon him our nature, and entered wholly into the sphere of this human life of suffering and conflict. He carried our nature triumphantly through all; paid down the wages of its sin, which is death, that, through death, He might destroy him that hath the power of it; and carried it through resurrection on to the pinnacle of power and of glory. God, in the person of his Son, has thus taken man into perpetual union with himself, and crowned him king of this dominion. And, in lifting up man to his throne, He is lifting up the whole system, of which man was made the head, out of its transient eclipse, into the eternal order and beauty of that new creation, in which the glory of our Father God, which we now see through the veil of things temporal and through a glass darkly, shall be revealed to us face to face and heart to heart. His Son, who made all things, as Jesus the Incarnate Word, once dead, but now alive forevermore, is the appointed Heir of all things. The First-Begotten of the Father from eternity, in the new relation and order of being, He is now the First Begotten from the dead, whom, when the Father raised, He declared to be his Son, and commanded all the angels of God to worship, giving Him lordship over all kindreds of the earth, and all the hosts and realms of heaven. And this, His passage through humiliation and death to this glory, was that He might become the First-Born among many brethren. It was to bring many sons unto glory. So that we are brought face to face with the amazing, the unspeakable wonder, that this mighty work of creation was begun, and has been carried on, and this earth was selected and fitted up, that, through conflict and triumph over evil, there might be born and trained here that anointed race who should be let into the deepest secrets of the mind and heart of God, who should be in the highest and most sacred and endearing sense, His sons, the heirs of His estate, and the prime ministers in the coming administrations of His kingdom, that shall flood the wide fields of space with a brighter effulgence of His glory than that which sparkles from suns and stars. Man, in resurrection glory, linked by embodied being to the material world, and yet in origin and by new creation made one with God, shall be the golden bond in that heavenly marriage of the future when the whole creation, like a beauteous bride, shall stand suffused with the light and radiant with the loveliness of God.

We have no sympathy, then, with those dwarfed conceptions of the ways of God in creation and redemption which make man to be a miserable, solitary rebel in a remote and insignificant corner of one of His provinces, whom it were a pity to let perish without a great effort to rescue. That he is a sinner is, alas! too plain. That he has passed under the power of death is sorrowfully true. That he is, in the sight of God, insignificant, is also true in one aspect; in another, he is the pivot around which turns the whole plan of creation, as it has been unfolding in the ages past, and sweeps away into the ages to come. He is nothing in himself; but the good pleasure of God has made much of him. He will never achieve his destined greatness, except, as in union with the risen Jesus, he shall rise into the rank of excellent being which he has attained. Many will not enter in through unbelief; but a royal seed shall not fail to come to the same joy and honor, who shall inherit all things, and be kings and priests unto God forever.

The discoveries of science then, in these last days, instead of disproving to the devout believer the gospel on which all his hopes are based, have only disclosed to him sublimer views of the wisdom and grace that stooped to his low estate. They have uncovered depths before hidden, and lifted him on to splendid heights in the knowledge of the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord—the theme which he shall explore with delight forever, but never exhaust; for it filleth to all the fulness of God. They have immeasurably enlarged our conception of the works of Him who has taught us to call him Father, and given us views of his eternal Being and wisdom and power of appalling magnificence. But they all tend to magnify the riches of that grace which has let itself down to us, that it might lift us up forever.

Welcome, then, the most advanced teachings of all true science. They let us more into the mystery of the love of God in our salvation. The doctrine of the Word made flesh gives us who believe the key that unlocks the arena of the universe. We see the plan by which the worlds were framed. This sublime masonry of suns and stars is crowned on its summit with a cross; and on that cross a Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. The structure is not too grand and costly for such an altar. And on the platform, where stands that cross, and around its base, there is being gathered that royal company who are to be kings and priests in this temple of the skies, which the glory of God and of the Lamb shall lighten. A few short graphic strokes of St. John's inspired pen sketch out this plan of ages, which the wisdom of this world could never find out, which its princes did not know, else they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. "In the beginning was the Word. . . . All things were made by Him. . . . The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. . . . To as many as received him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God." This is His manner of love to us, he writes in another place, that we are now the sons of God; although it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but when this mantling veil of things visible is rent, and his glory is revealed, we shall be like him and appear with him in glory.

In the light of these reflections, the importance of that cardinal doctrine of our faith, the resurrection of the dead, is apparent. There are many fascinating speculations nowadays that etherealize into emptiness the grand verities of revelation, making embodied life to be the lowest form of life, and affirming virtually that there is no resurrection of the dead. But the doctrine of God our Saviour affirms that the highest form of life and being has been embodied. The whole drift and energetic action of creation has been toward the production of a creature that should be fashioned out of its materials into an image of God. The first Adam, of the earth earthy, was made such an image. Sin and evil were suffered to pollute and deface the image for a while; but only in order to its reconstruction after a perfect model in him who, as the Risen Man, is now the Image of the Invisible God, the First-Born of every creature. The Second Adam is the Lord from heaven. It would seem as if the Son of God would take on a form, not indeed to enhance his own happiness, but that He might communicate of his ineffable fulness to the children of men. The Word was made flesh, died for our sins, and was raised again in the power of an endless life, the Type and Fount of pure and undestructible manhood, set in the highest heavens, the model and the goal to which He would bring us. The being clothed upon, then, with this glorified humanity at the resurrection, is as essential to this plan of ages as is the keystone to an arch. The stock of this human family is the noblest tree that has blossomed out on the field of the universe, the grains in whose soil are stars; and that stock has yet ripened but one fruit, one Risen Man, the corn of wheat that fell into the ground and died and rose again, the germ of springing harvests that shall make this wide field glad with golden sheaves, and vocal before God with perpetual joy. It is this embodied immortality, this incorruptible manhood that bears the stamp of God's own image, to the production of which He has been working through all the ages, for whose manifestation the whole creation now waits as an expectant travailing to bring to light the kingly race whose birth shall be her rest and joy. And through this race, not of disembodied spirits, but of men, who come to their immortal manhood at the redemption of their bodies, shall the designs of God in creation be unrolled in the ages to come.—Selected.

The Comforting Voice.

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

Dear travel-worn pilgrims, listen to the comforting voice of God, which is ever speaking to you in these latter days, to warn you, to cheer you, and to lead you safely through these perilous times. The pathway that leads through this wilderness, is beset with thorns and dangerous snares, and darked by sorrow and death. Then how needful that we heed that "sure word of prophecy" as a "light that shineth in a dark place until the day dawn."

If you are tempted by the temptations and sufferings of this life to give up the journey that leads unto eternal life, I admonish you to remember that Jesus passed through the same path. He was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." He was despised and rejected of men; even judged and put to death by his enemies. Are you deserving of less persecution of the world than he received? He bore all the sufferings of Calvary without a murmur or a word of complaint. He took the load of our sins upon himself; "he was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth." He is the great example. He suffered patiently to obtain glory; you must do the same.

Do you fear the reproach of men, and the revilings of the wicked? Jesus bore them; so must you. They smote him and reviled him, yet he endured it all without a murmur. Listening to the voice of comfort we find worthy words of counsel. "Harken unto me, ye that know righteousness, the people in whose heart is my law; fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be afraid of their revilings. For the moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool."

Are you laying up treasures on earth and glorying in your wealth? I entreat you to read the words of Jesus. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal; for where your treasure is there will your heart be also." And in the great day of the Lord, about to break forth upon this groaning world, you will discover that "your gold and your silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasures together for the last days."

Is your patience, in waiting for the Master's return, beginning to fail, and do you begin to say in your heart, "My Lord delayeth his coming?" Again listen to the voice of promise: "Behold, the Lord hath proclaimed unto the ends of the world, Say to the daughters of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh," and "My righteousness is near." "Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath, for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke; . . . but my salvation shall be forever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished." "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts; for the coming of your Lord draweth nigh."

Perhaps, dear reader, you are languishing upon a bed of sickness, and are exhausted from long confinement. I would point you in faith to that blessed promise which will never fail. "The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him. Confess your sins one to another, that ye may be healed." "The effectual prayer of a righteous man availeth much."

And to all who profess the name of Jesus, and are looking forward, I would unfold to their vision the conclusion of this world's history as written by the inspired penman. "The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; but is long-suffering to us ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, and the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up. Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. Nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Thus we see that the precious words of inspiration are ever coming to our vision, to cheer our hearts and encourage us to wait patiently for the coming of our Lord. Truly the time of his coming is at hand.

Rochester, N. Y., June, 1871.

Meeting in Illinois.

Notice is hereby given that there will be a meeting of Life Believers at the Cross roads in the grove, close by the White School-house No. 1, Holland Township, to commence on the 30th of June and hold over the Sabbath. Preaching brethren of different orders are invited to come and take part. Come one and all. Elders J. Lewis, S. L. Walter, and Clinkinbeard are invited.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, JUNE 28, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Herald of Life.

A volume of this paper consists of 48 numbers. That makes at least four vacant weeks in a year. These have been distributed between Christmas, May day, Fourth of July, and the week following the anniversary of the Union. This year there was no vacation the first week in May, and it is thought best to have two weeks together in July; therefore, no paper will be issued on the 5th and 12th of July. The next issue will be on the 19th of that month. Let this be remembered.

In the meantime, our mail book will be examined, and such subscribers as are three months, or twelve numbers, in debt for the paper will be discontinued, unless we hear from them immediately.

Prophecy: Luke xxi.

"And he spake to them a parable; Behold the fig tree, and all the trees; when they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."—Verses 29–31.

This illustration is exceedingly forcible. It shows that the near approach of the kingdom of God—of the dominion and reign of Christ—can be as surely known as the approach of summer by the budding of trees. Hence Christian men are inexcusable if they remain in ignorance of a matter of such startling interest and importance.

We suggest whether our Lord in his reference to the fig tree may not have had the nation of Judah, or the Jews, especially in mind. In Luke xiii. 6, he compares that nation to an unfruitful "fig tree." In Matt. xxi. 19, our Lord cursed a barren fig tree, and said, "Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward forever"—aiona—for the age. This transaction has been by many considered emblematic of the curse that afterwards fell upon the Jewish nation, to be continued to the close of the then coming age, or gospel age. That curse fell at the compassing about of Jerusalem with armies, and remained till the present time. But just as the times of the Gentiles give evidence of closing, we see the iron oppression which has trodden down the Jews, giving way, and the Jews everywhere rising up to a position among nations which indicates returning life to them as a people. The present century has witnessed privileges and advantages, civil and ecclesiastical, to them, to which they have been strangers for eighteen centuries previous. The United States were the first to set the example of abolishing all those distinctions which had so long oppressed and crushed the sons of Jacob. Since then other nations have changed their policy towards them, till those oppressive acts under which they groaned are everywhere giving way to a policy which opens to them, equally with other men, posts of honor and profit. It were easy to enlarge here, but to those who have access to the general news of the times in which we live, it is unnecessary at this time. That the Jews give signs of returning life, as a fig tree putting forth leaves, none can doubt, except they are inexcusably in the dark. If these things are so, then we have an unmistakable sign that summer approaches; or, "that the kingdom of God," the fifth universal monarchy upon earth, "is nigh at hand." Yes, that the Lord God is about to give Jesus Christ "the throne of his father David," as he promised by the mouth of Gabriel, Luke i. 31–33, and in many other prophecies. How eventful—solemnly interesting, is the time in which we live! How does it become us all to keep awake to the word of the Lord, and the events of his providence, in a day like this!

"Verily, I say unto you, this generation [who are witnesses of the foregoing signs] shall not pass away until all be fulfilled,"—take place, come to pass, or occur. The last thing in the prophetic chain is the establishment of the kingdom of God. If then our interpretation be the true one, many now living will see the establishment of Jesus Christ, in his glory, on David's throne, with his dominion over all the earth, or "under the whole heaven." The decree has gone forth, and it is unalterable; kings and great men of earth, whether republicans or monarchists, will rage against this universal and personal reign of Christ with his "joint heirs," the saints of the Most High, but their rage will be vain, for he will break them in pieces who oppose, as a potter's vessel is broken. Let them haste then to do him homage, and submit themselves to him, "lest they perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him." Psa. ii. 1–3, 10–12. We are now brought down to the admonitions and cautions connected with this important prophecy: these are found in the following language:

"And take heed to yourselves lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things which shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man."—Verses 34–36.

Every word here is emphatic, and of solemn importance. "Take heed," mind, observe: give attention—"to yourselves;" remember it is a personal matter, and every one should now look well to himself—"lest," for fear that "at any time"—as you know not the exact time—"your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness"—excessive eating and drinking; or, be overloaded by food or drink, either of which unfits us for sober thinking, and that circumspection of life which the solemn scenes before us and at hand, demand.

"And cares of this life." However important these cares may be, we are to beware lest we are overloaded by them; "and so that day may come upon us unawares"—unexpectedly, or without due preparation to meet it; "for as a snare" [or net] "shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." It "will come in an hour" even the saints "think not." But though they too are taken in the snare or net, they shall be safely gathered, according to the parable of our Lord, in which he compares the kingdom of heaven to a net cast into the sea, which, when it was full, they draw to shore and gather the good into vessels, but cast the bad away. To share the part of the good, our Saviour enjoins upon us to "watch and pray always." Always to be vigilant, wakeful to the solemn events before us, and in prayer to God for that aid without which we shall ail for "lack of wisdom" and strength to overcome the innumerable besetments by which the things of this life entice us away from God and his service. But if we heed the warning, caution, and admonition here given us, we have the gracious assurance that we shall be accounted worthy to escape harm and to stand before the Son of man; which language imports his acceptance and approval at his coming; a reward truly sufficient, if duly considered, to lead us to constant effort and obedience.

Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

"Immortal" — "Immortality" — "Eternal Life."

In our interpretations of Scripture, words and phrases should be accorded their literal and obvious meaning unless there is a manifest necessity for doing otherwise in order to sound sense and harmony with the general tenor of Scripture teaching on any given subject. Richard Watson writes:

"The terms of the record are to be taken in their plain and commonly received sense; figures of speech are to be interpreted with reference to the local peculiarities of the country in which the agents who wrote the record resided; idioms are to be understood according to the genius of the language employed; if any allegorical or mystical discourses occur, the key to them must be sought in the book itself, and not in our own fancies."

Jeremy Taylor remarks:

"In all interpretations of Scripture, the literal sense is to be presumed and chosen unless there is evident cause to the contrary."

Hooker says:

"I hold it for a most infallible rule in expositions of sacred Scripture, that when a literal construction will stand, the farthest from the letter is commonly the worst. There is nothing more dangerous and delusive than that act which changes the meaning of words, as alchemy doth or would the substance of metals; making of any thing what it listeth, and bringing in the end all truth to nothing."

Supporters of the theory of inherent immortality were long since compelled to the necessity of violating these reasonable and obvious principles of exegesis in their interpretation of terms which express the penalty of transgression, insisting upon attaching to certain words a meaning differing very widely from what is clearly imported, a meaning almost if not directly the opposite of what is held to attach to the same terms whenever they are met with in any other book than the Bible, and that, too, when the circumstances attendant upon the Scripture use of them necessitate, in order to justice, the plainest and most direct forms of expression.

So-called, orthodox theologists have, we say, long since taken the liberty of affirming that death, the divinely announced penalty of sin, means life in a state of torment, while the life promised as a reward to the obedient, means happiness. That this is most bold and unjustifiable assumption, at war with both reason and the simplest principle of justice, every unprejudiced reader of the Bible must see. Dr. John Locke but expresses what ought to be a universal sentiment, when he says: "It seems a strange way of understanding a law which requires the plainest and most direct words, that by 'death' should be meant eternal life in misery." Most of that class of interpreters stop here; but a few, more daring and reckless, go farther.

Having written profusely, and earnestly, and oftimes bitterly in his efforts to prove that all men are immortal, undying, Mr. George comes to the text which declares that God "only hath immortality;" and finding no less unreasonable a way to "dispose of" so plain a "thus saith the Lord," he makes the term "immortality" mean eternal happiness. Lest it should be said that he does not claim that all souls are immortal, we quote the following written, seemingly, before he had found it necessary to attempt to strip the term immortality of its true meaning. He says: "But did ever any one contend that immortality was the only attribute of the soul?" Thus we see he has been claiming that soul-entities have certain attributes, one of which is immortality.

If immortality is an "attribute of the soul," every soul must be immortal. "But," says he, in another part of his work, "we have found no Scriptures which teach that all men are immortal." True enough: he surely has not; nor will he ever find any. The Bible does not teach that men are immortal, but just the reverse, and hence all are urged to "seek for" immortality. Although he uses soul and spirit interchangeably to express the supposed undying part of man, he says "man has a spirit within him which is unending in its nature, so that it cannot wear out and die." And he adds:

"But that poetry is not fact, which, by some unaccountable means, has found its way into the revised edition of the Methodist Hymn Book, which says, 'Our souls are his immortal breath.'"

As we cannot do him the injustice to even suppose he is so ignorant of the facts in the case as not to know that the author of the hymn used the term "immortal" in the sense of undying, and not in the sense of "happy," we must understand him as, in this one instance, affirming mortality of man. Then, too, he can now lay no claim to Gen. ii. 7, as favoring the immortal-soul idea. Dr. Adam Clarke says of the words, God formed man of the dust:

"In the most distinct manner God shows us that man is a compound being, having a body and a soul, distinctly and separately created; the body out of the dust of the earth, the soul immediately breathed from God himself. . . . Of the soul it is said, God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life."

How could the Dr. have more plainly expressed the sentiment, "Our souls are his immortal breath?" Judging from the exceeding great importance attributed to the fact that those who hold what we believe to be the Bible view of man's nature and destiny differ in some particulars, a reader of "Annihilation not of the Bible," might suppose that its author never held an opinion differing from any leading Methodist mind; but we have elsewhere shown him widely at variance with prominent Methodists, and we now find him characterizing a sentiment expressed by Dr. Clarke and the author of the hymn referred to, as well as by all who sing the hymn believingly, as "poetry" but "not fact." He states what is true, but in doing it he inflicts a terrible blow upon his own theory. He yields the very text which some learned and thinking men of the popular faith have been compelled to conclude is about the only one which teaches their doctrine. It is said of the terms "immortal" and "immortality:"

"They are generally considered, in the theological world, to mean, eternal conscious being; whereas the Scriptural import of the term is, eternal happiness, being synonymous with the phrase 'eternal life.'"

Yes, the terms "immortal" and "immortality" are "generally considered," theologically, to mean, primarily, "eternal conscious being;" not subject to death, eternal life; and "mortal" and "mortality" are, in consequence, held to mean, temporary conscious being, subject to loss of life. If, therefore, immortality means "eternal happiness," then, by parity of reasoning, mortal, and mortality must mean temporary happiness. Apply such a principle of interpretation to the following, relating to God: "Now unto the King eternal, eternally happy (immortal) invisible, the only wise God," etc.—1 Tim. i. 17. How absurd is the supposition that immortal, applied to God, means, eternally happy. And again: "Which in his times he shall show, who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords; who only hath eternal happiness (immortality)."—1 Tim. vi. 15, 16. Comment is needless.

Read, too, in the light of such an interpretation, the language of Paul, where he proves the resurrection of the dead, and an analogous change in the living, and see what worse than absurdity is produced. The apostle thus writes:

"The dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruption shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."—1 Cor. xv. 32–34.

The expressions, "dead shall be raised incorruptible," and "this corruption must put on incorruption," refer to the change which is to take place in the dead who will be raised to life; and the expressions, "we shall be changed," and, "this mortal must put on immortality," refer to the change in the condition of believers who shall be then living. Incorruption and immortality, therefore, represent one and the same condition, while their opposites also represent like condition. So if "immortality," in verse 53, means eternal happiness, "incorruption," in the same verse, must also mean eternal happiness; while "mortal" and "incorruptible" must mean, temporary happiness. Thus we not only have Paul representing the sorrowing, and struggling, and suffering pilgrims of the last day as being changed from a condition which they could not be said to be in, but we have him also representing the dead in their graves as coming out of a condition of temporary happiness to one of eternal happiness. None will contend that there is happiness, or even consciousness in the grave. "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave," is the language of inspiration.

But let us see whether the Scriptural meaning of the term life is happiness; and whether the phrase "eternal life" means, "eternal happiness." Substitute "happiness" for "life," in the following passages: "That he would grant unto us, that we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our happiness (life)."—Luke i. 75. "In him was happiness (life); and the happiness (life) was the light of men."—John i. 4. When Christ was tempted, hungered, spit upon, buffeted and scourged, and finally suffered death on the cross, was his happiness the light of men? "I am the bread of happiness (life)."—John vi. 35.

How transcendently absurd is it to suppose that "life" in the foregoing, and many other texts means happiness. It will be objected that life does not mean happiness in that class of texts. A convenient style of explaining, truly! Life always means happiness when it suits a darling theory to have it so, no matter how much it conflicts with or contradicts other portions of Scripture.

If Jesus had meant to convey the idea of "happy" or "happiness," in any of the texts where "life" and "eternal life" occur, he could just as well have used makarios, or makarismos, as to have used zoee, which does not mean happy, or happiness at all, but life. He used the former term, makarios, more than a score of times to express "happy," or "blessed." We may rest assured Jesus did not use terms which do not express the idea which he wished to convey.

"Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal happiness (life). . . . And ye will not come to me, that ye might have happiness (life)."—John v. 39, 40. "But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought happiness and eternal happiness (life and immortality) to light through the Gospel."—1 Tim. i. 10. To make "life," in this text, mean "happiness," is, beside making nonsense of it, to affirm Universalism; for if "life" means happiness, the antithetic term, "death," must mean misery; and how can misery be abolished, except by conferring universal happiness?

We need not quote more texts, enough having been done in that direction to satisfy any reasonable mind that the Scripture import of "life" is not "happiness," nor that of "immortality," "eternal happiness." While Christ promised eternal life more than forty times, he not once promised eternal happiness, a fact in view of which it is worse, far worse than folly to assert that he meant to promise happiness. Of course, life and death are both sometimes used figuratively, but in all such cases the context renders it easy to determine the fact.

The expressions, "life," having reference to future life, "eternal life," etc., are many times used in the New Testament, but we meet with nothing which may be construed into a caution that they are to be understood in any sense other than that of living existence, a conscious being which will not be subject to death. The terms, therefore, mean just what they naturally import. Happiness is inseparably connected with the life which Christ bestows, but it is life that is "the gift of God;" the unspeakable joy, glory, and "pleasures forevermore" are consequent upon the bestowal of life. Christ came to give men life, so that they may have the joy and the glory. Literal life, a conscious existence that will not be subject to interruption by death is the promise of the Gospel; it is the Gospel hope. It is said, assuming that 1 Tim. vi. 15, 16, refers to Christ:

"The man Christ Jesus is the only man who has not been affected by the fall, and who, consequently, did not suffer the loss of immortality by it."

We had supposed that we were, by what we had already seen, prepared for any thing in the way of absurdity, but we had evidently miscalculated the ability of some in that direction. In the first place the language cannot refer to Christ, for, there being a God and Father over all, Christ cannot be said to only have immortality (eternal happiness, as is claimed). Beside, it is said, "whom no man hath seen;" and we know that Christ was seen even in his incorruptible state. Paul would hardly write thus of one whom, he affirms, he had himself seen.

Then, too, eternal happiness is not and cannot be subject to any sorrow, much less such agony as "the man Christ Jesus" suffered at various times, and hence it is pitiable to talk about "the man Christ Jesus" possessing "eternal happiness" before his death, and resurrection from the dead; quite as pitiable is it as to talk of his being immortal, in the true sense of the term, while he was yet subject to death. We are led to think that the depths of folly into which men may sink in their efforts to sustain a false theory are immeasurable.

"None of the ungodly will inherit immortality in the sense of the term as employed in the Scriptures . . . None but the saints are heirs to Bible immortality."

Thus we see our author plainly admits that the ungodly will not inherit immortality; that no man is immortal now, the "saints" being only "heirs" to immortality. We have dwelt thus at length on this subject because he has staked all upon the assumption that the Scripture-meaning of eternal life and immortality in "eternal happiness," and we have, as the reader has seen, shown that the interpretation is far more than untrue; it robs certain Scripture language of its force and renders it senseless and ridiculous. So far from being true, it cannot even lay a reasonable claim to truth. "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life," literal life that will endure forever. Life is the gift, but the gift, when bestowed, will be accompanied by glory and delights far too great to enter "into the heart of man to conceive."

We have now, in the progress of our review, examined the texts that are by many relied on with some degree of confidence to sustain the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and while we have found some things which, superficially considered, are somewhat calculated to confirm the prejudices of those who go to the Bible with not only a strong conviction that inherent or natural immortality is true, but with a determination also to make some part of the word of God teach it, we have found nothing which, interpreted in the light of all well-understood Scripture language, could possibly create such a belief. It should not be forgotten that not a few theologists and Bible students who hold to the doctrine frankly admit that it is not found in the Bible.

Watson, the great Methodist, says:

"Some suppose consciousness is an essential attribute of spirit; and the soul is naturally immortal; the former of which cannot be proved, while the latter is contradicted by the Bible, which makes our immortality a gift dependent on the will of the giver."

Watson is strictly correct in saying that inherent immortality is "contradicted by the Bible, which makes our immortality a gift dependent on the will of the giver." God has nowhere said he would give immortality to any but the saints; but it is said, "all the wicked will he destroy." Again, in attempting to prove that the presence of an immaterial soul with the body is the source of animal life, Mr. Watson says:

"It is granted that, on the premises laid down, not only must an immaterial principle be allowed to man, but to all animals possessed of volition; and few, perhaps none, are found without this property . . . It does not however, follow that they are immortal because they are immaterial. The truth is, that God only hath independent immortality, because he only is self-existent, and neither human nor brute souls are of necessity immortal."

Darby, in his Hopes of the Church, says:

"We would express our conviction that the idea of the immortality of the soul has no source in the gospel; that it comes, on the contrary, from the Platonists."

These are testimonies of learned men, and as they believed the doctrine, we may be sure they would have found it in the Bible were it there. A simple acknowledgment of the fact that the Bible does not teach it, would have been very significant; but they go farther, one of them affirming that it is "contradicted by the Bible," the other that it "has no source in the gospel," but "comes, on the contrary, from the Platonists." The reader can easily see why such strenuous efforts are made to show that "immortality" does not mean immortality at all, but something else. The attempt, however, itself lamentable, has resulted, as must always be the case, in most miserable failure, rendering its authors, whoever they may be, objects of commiseration.

Hereafter, when so-called orthodoxists desire to shield their pet theory from the overwhelming force of the truth that it is not a child of inspiration, it will become them well to attempt to show that the above named and many other learned men and leaders among them were all wrong on the question. Until they do this, it were better that their severe and unchristian denunciations should not be suffered to "see light." L. C. T.

Camp-Meeting.

At a meeting of the Committee held on their new Camp-ground, June 21, it was voted that our annual meeting this year commence on Monday, August 14, and continue over the 20th. There will be dedication service and, probably, other meetings on Sunday, the 13th. Arrangements will be made for the accommodation of all who arrive as early as Saturday the 12th. The Committee will have for rent as many tents, (size 12 by 15 feet), as are wanted if notified soon; price, during the meeting, $5. Any brethren or sisters desiring tents are requested to inform Br. J. C. Day, or T. R. Weaver, Springfield, Mass. Br. Day is on the ground and will build tents of any size that may be wanted at reasonable prices. Brethren should write him at once if they desire a good tent and a pleasant location.

Arrangements will be made with railroad companies for a reduction of fare from 10th of August to the 30th. The price of board per day will be 80 cents. Particulars hereafter.

T. R. Weaver, Sec'y.

Now that the principal features of the Camp-meeting arrangements are known and published, we trust all friends of the Union will endeavor to so arrange their business that they can be present. All are needed there. Every one who goes, carrying with him or her a heart filled with love and a mind illuminated with the Spirit will find there a work to do, one that, being done, will cause them to rejoice in the Lord. All such will, we doubt not, carry with them throughout the following year the conviction that it was good to be there. In the meantime, let us remember that, like all other means of doing good, it involves expense. If that expense is met by as many as can afford to contribute, and in proportion to their ability, it will be comparatively light. L. C. T.

What Bigotry can Do.

Some years since an English paper was sent us containing an article headed "The London Inquisition." It is well enough to keep such transactions in mind, lest we with all our professions of hatred to sectarianism should fall into the like spirit. The article reads as follows:

"The Principal and Council of King's College, London, have just been making a sad spectacle of themselves. It seems that one of the Professors of the institution, a Rev. Mr. Maurice, had some critical notions about the Greek word aionion, which our translators of the Bible render "eternal;" and he took occasion to speak out his views respecting said word, in a lecture he recently delivered. This gave the alarm to the Principal, Dr. Jelf, who immediately wrote to the Professor, to explain whether he intended to question the orthodox doctrine of eternal punishment. The Professor replied that he believed in the eternal punishment of the wicked, in the New Testament sense of the phrase; but that he did not believe in it as some did; he thought that thousands of British youths under their instruction ought to have right conceptions of the matter; and hence he spoke out in the lecture. This was still more alarming to the pragmatical old Doctor, at the head of the heap, and so he convened the inquisition, alias the Collegiate Council, and they, by the aid of old Pope Jelf, excommunicated Professor Maurice from the College and delivered him over to Satan—the fate of all heretics. The Professor has appealed from his decision, alleging that his assumed judges had no jurisdiction in the case, inasmuch as he is accountable only to God and his ecclesiastical diocesan for his religious opinions, and not to his officers in the College.

"Whether this appeal be right or wrong, we know not, having no access to the charter and constitution of the Seminary. But this we say, it is a bold and unwarranted step to take in these enlightened and tolerant times. Let us see, the Church of England, that it may hold all the fish coming to its net, opens its bosom wide enough to receive Calvinists, Arminians, Socinians, and the idolators and image-worshippers of the corrupt Church of Rome. Ay, old Pusey himself may still fill the Hebrew chair in the highest University of the realm, even though his heresy is rank, and smells to heaven, if not to hell. But Professor Maurice must be cut off, and sent a beggar upon the streets, because he doubts the unphilosophical fact, that brimstone and fire coming in contact will not at last burn out! It seems the Professor thinks with Bailey, the author of Festus, that the eternal punishment of the wicked will be their total destruction, wherein sin shall be destroyed; and by the power of Christ a new creation shall succeed, wherein shall "dwell righteousness;" and those who have once lived and been destroyed, shall be raised up in the new creation, and there shall be no more sin, or death, but "sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Whether the Professor's notions are right or wrong, is nothing to the point. If he is in error, he is in company with many others in the church, whose speculative opinions are much more objectionable than this. We have known many very worthy and good men, who doubted that a benevolent Deity would make erring mortals eternally wretched, for a finite offence; and we do not think this sentiment an unworthy view of the attributes of a God of love.

"But say it is an error; yet we protest against an old dogmatical bigot having the power to crucify unto death for such an error. This shows us what we have often seen and deplored, the sad condition of our seats of learning in this country, while under the thumb of narrow-minded bigoted priests. Tell of having escaped from the intolerance and persecution of Rome!—it is all an empty boast, so long as such creatures as Dr. Jelf can ruin his professors, and send them to Coventry, for believing a little more or a little less than he does."

Take the Safe Side.

There are certain classes of persons who seem to be unable to satisfy themselves entirely of the truth of the Scriptures and the Christian religion. They respect Christianity, possess a degree of conscious religious sensibility, and are inquiring with some moral earnestness into religious duties and obligations. They cannot be said to be indifferent, but they have their doubts upon the Christian evidences. They cannot feel assured that the whole thing, much as they are persuaded in its favor, may not, after all, turn out to be a delusion. They do not wish to be skeptics, and yet they are not fully satisfied that Christianity is what it professes to be, and what they would fain consider it if they could just be made sure.

Now, we have a word to say to such persons. Our own conviction is clear and positive that Jesus is the Son of God, incarnated for our redemption; that He was a true teacher of eternal truth; that the records we have of him are thoroughly reliable; and that all He said, commanded and ordained, is verily Divine and certain. But even upon the supposition that the case is not perfectly made out, and that there really is room for honest doubt, there is still a just reason and prudence in the case sufficient to determine the question in favor of an earnest and faithful obedience.

It certainly is very unwise to risk great interests unnecessarily, particularly if nothing is to be gained by it. It is altogether best to keep on the safest side of a perilous question. And even upon the assumption that the claims of the gospel are not conclusively established, and that room for honest doubt may exist, we still claim that in fair and correct reason the decision ought to be given in favor of obedience and faith. The justice of this claim is manifest from the following considerations.

First, a man risks nothing by becoming a Christian. Christianity, heartily embraced, does in no way disable or harm him, either for this world or the next. It does not make him a worse citizen, or any less a useful member of society. The best men that have ever lived were Christians. The purest models of morality, orderliness and correct living, are to be found among the most conscientious believers in the Scriptures and in Christ. Genuine faith in no way subtracts from a man's usefulness and just right to respect. It takes nothing from his happiness. An infidel or despiser of the gospel has no advantage over him in any of these particulars. The infidel is no better father, husband, brother, friend or citizen than a true Christian. He cannot meet the inevitable trials and sorrows of life with any better temper, or to any better advantage, than a believer. He cannot contemplate death with any greater composure, nor resign himself to it with any greater peace or comforting hope, than a Christian. And even upon the supposition that the Christian religion may turn out to be false, the devout adherent of it is not a whit worse off than the skeptic. He loses nothing by his faith. He has made a mistake, and that is all.

Second, the infidel's creed, or non-creed, has no greater guarantee of certainty than our creed. To say the very least, it is quite as liable ultimately to turn out false as our system. It would be nonsense for any one to dispute this. Suppose, then, that it should finally turn out that the gospel is true, and all skepticism false, (which is surely as possible as the reverse), what will be the situation of the unbeliever? Will he lose nothing by his persistent unbelief? Will not his mistake have been an awfully fatal one? The gospel being true, there is no possible hope for him. Its plain word is: "He that believeth not shall be damned." He must, therefore, encounter a destiny than which it would have been better for him had he never been born. Thus, then, he risks everything, with no possible advantage from it; whilst the believer risks nothing, and is yet in a position to be infinitely the gainer, in case Christianity be true.

Admitting, then, that the case is doubtful, wisdom and common prudence ought to restrain an honest man from standing aloof on the strength of that doubt. It is a risking of too much without possibility of any advantage from it. It puts one on the dangerous side of the question, and bootlessly exposes to the most dreadful calamities that can befall a man. No reasonable being ought to place himself in such a position. It is unwise. It is a sin against his own existence. It is an exposure which can be justified on no sound principles. And whether the evidences of Christianity have been made out to demonstration, or not, it is hence the bounden duty of every honest thinker, in such a state of the case, to embrace it with all his heart, as the only way to put himself in a position of safety until the question is conclusively solved.—Selected.

From James F. Lee, M. D.

Br. Storrs: A much admired commentator gives us the following description of man: "He is a mean, frail creature, little as dust, light as dust, weak as dust; his doom is therefore read, 'to dust thou shalt return.' Man is indeed the chief part of the dust of the world: he is a mortal, dying creature, and hastening to the grave: . . . a great man is but a great mass of dust and must return to his earth. God intrusted Adam with a spark of immortality, which he, by a patient continuance in well-doing, might have blown up into an everlasting flame: but he foolishly blew it out by wilful sin; and now death is the wages of sin. The soul, like the body, returns to the dust of this world; its tendency is that way; it has an earthy taint."

Adam, if Matthew Henry is to be credited for truth, blew out a spark of immortality, by sin; but might have blown it up into an everlasting flame by patient continuance in well-doing. God intrusted him with an immortal spark. Adam blew it out! It is astonishing indeed to contemplate the various and surprising attributes attributed to Adam by the fertility of man's distempered and unbridled fancy. He is made, says one, immortal; he blew out a spark of immortality; his knowledge was comprehensive, perfect! Understood astronomy, geology, botany, zoology, husbandry, theology: the only perfect being that ever did exist. And what is still astounding, I have heard it said, that Christ is Adam, the very Adam himself. It is hard to say something new, or something that was never before fancied, imagined or uttered. Where and when I obtained ideas, how I received them, or through what sources, it is utterly impossible for me accurately and truthfully to declare. I am inclined, however, to believe they did not exist or come according to the fancy of Aristocles, commonly known as Plato, so called, "from the largeness of his shoulders." If there is such a thing as the unwieldy burden of human fancies; if those fancies are weighty and burdensome in consequence of the superabundance of absurdity and nonsense they contain, it is well that Aristocles had shoulders large enough to bear up under a burden so oppressive, vexatious and mischievous. What a medly of absurdity, nonsense, interspersed with some sparks of truth, glimmering, but almost extinguished, are found in the notions of mankind. It was so among the Jews at the first advent of Christ. Will it be a whit better at his second advent among Christians? Human nature is always the same, prone to trouble, to vagaries, as the sparks are to fly upward. Nothing can regulate, control and guide the mind of man but the Spirit of God, or keep it within the bounds of revealed truth.

How much revealed truth is, apparently, ignored in our day! and how much folly manifested by men who profess to be governed by inspiration! Alas! many inspire falsehood as freely as they do the vital air! and expire it too before they hear a matter. Solomon would call such men, "fools," though they might have D. D., and L. L. D., or A. M., and M. D., added to their names. And, in truth, it should be no offense to say, "He that answereth a matter before he heareth it, it is folly and shame unto him."

At the end of this age, the second advent of Christ, there will be but one King supreme to rule, govern and reign. He will have appointed kings, priests, judges, etc., under him, like unto him, in his image, and that image, is the image of God, peculiar to the Sons of God. What a glorious revelation—a glorious inheritance.

The Old and the New Testament afford the only light that enables us to behold the New Earth as it will be,—together with many things sufficiently clear to lead us to the conclusion, that there will be ample employment and work allotted for such as are worthy to inherit that land forever. Negatively and positively, thus is much revealed, and much unrevealed, until the kingdom appears. I have, I trust, some view of the unsearchable riches of Christ, and a hope, through grace, I shall inherit the new earth. What my employment will be, I know not. But this much I am constrained to believe: I will not be idle. I shall have full and free feelings of joy and pleasure, forevermore. Amen.

How often has my heart been melted at the repetition or reading of these words: "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet believe." Yes, I shall see, by grace; I shall see things in the kingdom of heaven—and hear things, not yet revealed. This is my hope—this is the promise of God to all that love the Lord Jesus, in sincerity. This promise is not fulfilled. It will be literally accomplished as it is revealed. Patiently I will wait to read what my brother, S. has to say relative to the promise of God to Abraham.

The two witnesses will be in the kingdom. There will be no nonsense or absurdities current there on man's theology—no such kings as any earthly wicked autocrats or rulers. Enough: such are a few of my heart feelings.

North Carolina, March, 1871.

From Sereno Fisk.

Br; Storrs: Enclosed find three dollars; two of which for the excellent Herald of Life, and the balance I send for your late work. I thank God that He has almost miraculously brought you up from the brink of the grave, to publish this work; and I thank you, most heartily for your great favor toward me, in continuing the Herald of the future or coming kingdom. I trust you will not lose your reward at the resurrection of the just.

You know I have been slow to adopt your views concerning evil spirit, the Devil and Satan, of which the Bible speaks in many places. You know that in my first letter to you, March, 1857, I no longer believed in the future eternal misery of the wicked, for the reason I could not find it to be a doctrine of the Bible, after long and careful study; so now, I do say, that I do not believe in the existence of one mighty malevolent spirit, at the head of hosts of others, continually doing mischief to the children of men. Yet I do not feel certain that I am right in this doubt. But, the more I study the Bible the more I thus doubt. I long for the appearing of our dear Lord, when all darkness shall flee away. Meanwhile I am resolved to keep my eye upon the eye which shines in a dark place, until He comes whose right it is to reign.

It is now near eight years since I saw you last; and O, how many times have I longed to see you and counsel with you since I saw you. We have both passed through great trials since our last meeting; but how great are God's mercies. In the midst of great trials, I can often call on my soul, as the Psalmist did, Why art thou cast down O, my soul! for I shall yet praise the Lord! And He will take up my feet from the mire and clay, and set them upon a rock and establish my goings; and He will put a new song in my mouth, even praise to God.

I earnestly pray, that we may meet at the Camp-meeting at Springfield.

May God continue to bless and help you in your blessed work of promoting the cause of truth, the truth of God.

Your brother in the hope of the everlasting kingdom of God.

From N. Jane Lucas.

Br. Storrs: Although a stranger to the most of the readers of your excellent paper, the Herald of Life, yet I feel it a duty to write a few lines in favor of the truth it advocates. Recently, under the labors of Eld. W. M. Bryant, I became convinced that there is no life from the dead out of Christ. I was somewhat prejudiced at first, though not fully aware of it at the time; have said, repeatedly, that there was not anything more clearly taught in the Bible than the two resurrections; but I think I never had the truth so clearly presented before as by our dear brother. I can now understand fully how God is represented as being a God of love. Praise the Lord. What glorious light shines around my pathway. Truly the word of the Lord is a lamp to my feet and a light unto my path. I feel confident you have the truth. I praise the Lord for opening the eyes of my understanding to see the beauty and harmony there is in the Scriptures. I have laid away many friends in the cold and silent grave. Some of them sleep sweetly in Jesus, awaiting his gracious call; and some of them died having no hope in Christ; and O how comforting it is to me that they are not coming up to be judged, and suffer the pangs of the so-called, "second death." "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."—John iii. 36. Jesus says, "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth on me, though he were dead yet shall he live."—John xi. 25. This language is very plain and unmistakeable, to my mind, that it is the sleeping believer that is going to have life from the dead, and not the wicked; for they have no hope. A short time ago I could not have believed there was so much in the sacred volume showing that the wicked are to have no resurrection from the dead. How blessed the truth looks. It makes us free. Let us have the whole truth, if it cuts our theory to pieces. Praise the Lord, O my soul.

I stand upon his precious word,
My soul rejoiceth free,
The glorious light the gospel gives,
Is light that shines for me.

I'll suffer now, I'll triumph then,
I'll die for Jesus here;
In that bright world I'll live again,
A conqueror's crown to wear.

From Eld. R. V. Lyon.

Br. Storrs: I have spent three Sundays in Canada West; and we had some excellent meetings. Also great freedom in presenting the truth. Immersed one into the name of Jesus our Life-giver, for the remission of sins.

I obtained one new subscriber for the Herald of Life.

Last Sunday I preached in our own house, to a good congregation, who gave the best attention to my message.

Immersed one in the pure waters of Niagara for the remission of sins.

Friday I leave home to hold a number of grove meetings in C. W.

The Number 666.

Dear Sir: Could you afford room for this short note, which has no reference whatever to any man's name; but only to the number 666 itself.

We know that in Scripture the number 8 is used to express supernatural or superhuman perfection, being one degree above 7, which stands for ordinary perfection. And we find that our Lord's name in the Greek contains exactly the number 8 three times—888—so as to express the utmost degree of superhuman or heavenly perfection. Now, it is evident that the number of the beast ought, by all the rules of analogy, to be a complete contrast to the number of our Lord—to the number of "Jesus"—in the same Greek language. Therefore, it follows that the number of the beast must, by analogy, be composed of three sixes—666; for 6 in Scripture expresses earthly imperfection, being one degree less than 7; so that the contrast is absolutely complete between the number of the beast and the number of our Lord. Three eights in one, superhuman perfection; three sixes in the other, earthly imperfection. And each thrice repeated to make the perfection or the imperfection more intense. Therefore, I feel convinced that the true "number of the beast" is 666, in spite of all contrary readings; for it is evident that 606 (for example), or any other number except 666, would completely destroy the contrast between the two names and the two numbers. Our Lord's own number being positively fixed by the Greek word "Iesous," must give the number 888, and no other number; thus fixing the contrasted number of the beast to 666.

Believe me, dear Sir, yours sincerely,

Torquay. R. A. Purdon.

Sayings of Bishop Whately.

A mistaken notion of the Christian unity spoken of in the Scriptures, which represents it as consisting in having one community on earth to which all Christians belong or ought to belong, and to whose government all are bound to submit, has led to truth being made the secondary, and not the paramount object.

The church is undoubtedly one, and so is the human race one; but not as a society, for as such, it is only one, when considered as to its future existence. Its present unity consists in that its various societies are designed to be modelled on the same principles, and to enjoy common privileges; "One Lord, one faith, one baptism;" and all forming part of that great society of which the Head is in heaven, and of which many of the members only "live unto God" or exist in His counsels; some having long since departed, and some being not yet born. The term unity is applicable to the Universal Church, as one in reference to its Supreme Head in heaven, not as one community on earth, as the human race is one in respect of the One Creator and Governor; but this does not make it one family or one state.

To vindicate our own or any other Church, not on the reasonable ground, that they are not at variance with gospel-principles, or with any Divine injunction designed to be of universal obligation, but on the ground of the exact conformity, which it is notorious they do not possess, to the most ancient models, and even to go beyond this and condemn all Christians whose institutions and ordinances are not "one and utterly like" our own, on the ground of their departure from the apostolical precedent, which no Church has exactly adhered to—does seem, to use no harsher expression, not a little inconsistent and unreasonable. This principle would go to exclude at once from the pale of Christ's Church, almost every Christian body, since the first two or three centuries.

BETHLEHEM HOME SCHOOL.

This excellent and well-known institution has just passed into the charge of Rev. Ambrose Rondthaler, who for upwards of sixteen years has been a Professional Teacher and Principal of educational institutions in York, and at Bethlehem, Pa.

The course of study is thorough, and all students enter not only the school-room but also become part of the Principal's family. All sectarianism is banished from the school.

The Bible only is the standard of religious instruction.

For terms and particulars send for circular.

Rev. AMBROSE RONDTHALER,
Principal.

Note by the Editor.

It gives us pleasure to insert the above notice in the Herald of Life, that our friends may know where to send their children to a school of a right character. Br. Rondthaler is one of our firmest friends. For many years a minister in the Moravian church, but unsectarian, and a firm believer in the Life views.

I Need Thee, Precious Jesus.

I need thee, precious Jesus,
For I am very poor;
A stranger and a pilgrim,
I have no earthly store:
I need the love of Jesus
To cheer me on my way,
To guide my doubting footsteps,
To be my strength and stay.

I need thee, precious Jesus,
I need a friend like thee,
A friend to soothe and pity,
A friend to care for me.
I need the heart of Jesus,
To feel each anxious care,
To tell my every trial,
And all my sorrows share.

I need thee, precious Jesus,
I need thee day by day,
To fill me with thy fulness,
And lead me on my way;
I need thy Holy Spirit
To teach me what I am,
To show me more of Jesus,
To point me to the Lamb.

I need thee, precious Jesus,
I hope to see thee soon
Encircled with the rainbow,
And seated on thy throne;
There, with thy blood-bought children,
My joy shall ever be
To sing thy praises, Jesus,
To gaze, my Lord, on thee!

[We place before our readers the following very interesting communication, furnished us by Dr. E. P. Miller, whose services were so effectual in our case last winter.—Editor.]

Turkish Baths.

Geo. Storrs: Dear Sir: On reading the highly complimentary editorial notice of myself and my Institution in the Herald of Life of January, and knowing the deep interest which your readers feel in whatever tends to the restoration and preservation of health, I thought perhaps they might like to learn something more of the processes which we employ for such purposes, and, with your permission, I will lay before them a brief description of the Turkish Bath.

The essential features of the Turkish Bath can be traced back through more than three thousand years of this world's history; and it is a significant fact that the people of all nations, whether barbarous, civilized, or enlightened, and the physicians of all schools of medicine, have devised some form of bath with which to produce the effects so readily achieved by the Turkish Bath.

These effects are summed up in a few words, namely: to purify the blood, to cleanse the skin, to remove the causes of disease, and restore health by means of free perspiration and ablutions.

Various contrivances have been employed to secure these ends. The rude Indian, on the bank of the river, constructs a cabin of bark, covers it with skins, and in this exposes his body to the vapor arising from the heated stones immersed in a pool of water; and when perspiration is reeking from every pore he darts from his cabin into the river, and returns renewed and invigorated by the processes.

The lamp bath, the steam box, the vapor chamber, the vapor bath, the Russian bath, the wet-pack, and numberless other inventions, have been employed for inducing perspiration; but all these are far inferior to the Turkish Bath in the grand results produced, and in promoting the pleasure and comfort of the bather.

In all of these processes heat vapor or moist air is employed as the means of inducing perspiration. In the Turkish Bath dry air is used instead of vapor or moist air, and for various physiological reasons, we are satisfied that it is in a majority of cases far superior. It is an admitted fact that a dry climate is more healthful than a moist one: that far greater extremes of heat and cold can be borne with impunity in a dry than in a moist atmosphere: that malarious and contagious diseases are much less prevalent in a dry than in a moist climate. The reason for this is that too much moisture in the air checks the action of the skin, retaining impurities within the body; while dry air favors the action of the skin and aids their elimination. Nearly three-quarters of the impurities of the body pass off through the pores of the skin; and whatever retards their elimination, in this way, tends to produce disturbance and disease. Most diseases are caused by the presence of morbid matter or poisons in the blood. The skin is one of the principal organs concerned in eliminating these poisons. "Taking cold" is simply closing the pores of the skin, thus preventing the escape of impurities from the body.

Fourcault, a French anatomist, made numerous experiments upon animals, which have thrown much light upon the function of the skin. Rabbits that were covered with varnish so as to prevent the action of the skin died from axphyxia in a few hours. Dogs that were partially coated with pitch became paralyzed in the hind legs in a short time. Guinea pigs that were covered with tar soon became afflicted with scrofulous ulcers. Consumption, fevers, and a variety of diseases were developed by a partial closing of the pores of the skin; and death in every case results from the complete suspension of its function.

Human beings are often afflicted with paralysis, scrofula, consumption, fevers, and various other diseases, simply because the skin does not properly perform its functions. The attack of bronchitis, from which you have just recovered, was no doubt induced by a severe cold which closed the pores, driving blood in upon the mucous linings of the bronchial tubes; and you will remember what an amount of depuration was performed by this membrane during your sickness; neither could you get relief until by the persistent use of fomentations, bathing and friction the action of the skin was re-established, and the blood was diverted from the mucous membrane to that organ, and its function fully performed.

When we study the structure and function of the skin, we cease to wonder at the dangerous results which follow when its action is obstructed or prevented. The number of pores in the skin varies in different individuals from five millions to eight millions, and each one of these pores is the opening or outlet of a little perspiratory tube an eighth of an inch in length. If the perspiratory tubes of a medium sized person were placed end to end they would reach twenty-eight miles! At the bottom of each of these tubes is a little tuft or gland which filters out from the blood certain poisonous or effete matters which must be removed, or they soon load the blood with impurities and cause disease. The vast number of these short tubes scattered everywhere upon the surface of the body, forms a complete and thorough system of drain pipes, through which, by sensible and insensible perspiration, the blood is purified and the body kept in a healthy condition.

A number of chemists and physiologists have analyzed the perspiration, and they find in it the following substances, many of which are poisonous to the human system: water, chloride of sodium, lactic, butyric, acetic, and carbonic, acids, chloride of potassium, lactates and acetates of potash and soda, phosphates of lime and ammonia, peroxide of iron, urea, desquamative epithelium, and alcoholic matters. In various diseased conditions it contains bile, sugar, urate of soda, albumen, and different acids, with other substances which cause disease. Dr. Stark of London found sulphur, mercury, sodium, iodide of potassium, assafœtida, garlic, saffron, olive oil, rhubarb, indigo, copper, quinine, and the different alkalies and acid salts; in short, almost every drug used as a medicine, when such substances had been taken.

The Turkish Bath is the most effectual method yet devised for inducing perspiration, and for removing these poisons from the system.

The processes of the baths consist in the application of heated air to the body until perspiration is freely induced, followed by rubbing, shampooing, and kneading the body with the hand, gloves, or brushes, and finally washing, soaping, spraying and cooling the body by the shower or plunge bath, as is most agreeable.

The bath comprises, usually, an office, three large rooms of different temperatures, and one or more shampooing rooms. The first of the larger rooms is called the cooling room; connected with which are the dressing rooms. In the cooling room the bather reclines after the active processes of the bath until the body is reduced to its normal temperature. This room is kept at about 70 degrees Fah.

The second room is termed the tepidarium, or tepid room; in which is maintained a temperature of 120 degrees or more. The third large room is called the sudatorium, or hot room, where a temperature of from 150 degrees to 180 degrees is maintained.

After assuming the bath apparel, the bather enters the tepidarium, reclines upon a couch, and drinks freely of cold water until perspiration is induced. This takes place in some cases in a very few moments, while others require from twenty minutes to half an hour. The hot room is now entered, where the bather reclines until perspiration issues freely from every pore. The fresh water that is drunk immediately enters the blood, absorbing its impurities, and is again drained out through the perspiratory tubes, leaving the blood and tissues of the body in a purer and healthier state.

The time to be consumed in the perspiratory process depends entirely upon the condition of the bather; some remain in only a short time; others from half an hour to half a day.

In acute rheumatism, and other affections occasioned by poisons in the blood, the patient is frequently sent to the bath twice a day, and remains from one to three hours each time. After sufficient perspiration has been induced the shampooing room is entered. Here water is applied to remove the perspiration, and the shampooing begins. This consists in rubbing and kneading the body all over to take off the dead cuticle, epithelium scales and effete matters that have accumulated on the skin, and to soften hardened tissues, limber stiffened joints, and bring the blood to the surface. When this process has been sufficiently prolonged, soap is applied by means of a sponge or brush, and this is followed by a warm, tepid, and cool spray; and this at the option of the bather by the plunge, shower or needle bath, at a temperature which is most agreeable. The bather is then dried with towels, wrapped in a sheet and sent to the cooling room, to recline upon a lounge or to walk about as is preferred. When the body is sufficiently cool the clothing is resumed, and the bather departs a cleaner if not a wiser and better man.

Now the question arises—What has been accomplished by all these processes? The blood has been purified, the skin cleansed, the joints limbered, the tissues rendered soft and firm, the circulation made vigorous at the surface, congestion of internal organs relieved, and better conditions of body and mind established.

Nearly all forms of chronic diseases, and many acute diseases are curable, or at least may be benefitted by this bath. Colds, rheumatism, neuralgia, sciatica, sore throat, chronic bronchitis, catarrh, etc., are effectually relieved by it.

This bath is a luxury to those accustomed to it, and is one of the most effectual means of warding off disease which we have at our command. If a majority of the people in all our large cities would patronize the baths once or twice a week there would be far less disease, and far less money spent for drugs.

Yours, very truly,

E. P. Miller.

A Good Work among the Chinese.

In San Francisco and vicinity the American Baptist Home Mission Society has been doing a good work for the evangelization of the Chinese. One of the missionaries employed at this point was Fung Saung Nam, a native Chinese preacher, singularly consecrated as a Christian man, and effective as a public speaker. He came to this country about fifteen months ago with Rev. R. H. Graves, who had been instrumental in his conversion from heathenism. Last week, after a few days' illness, Fung died, in the triumphs of a gospel faith. The cause of his sickness was overwork for the Master. While sick and nearing the end, his ruling passion still was for the salvation of his countrymen through the preaching of Christ. What a contrast between such a death in the enlightenment of Christianity, and one in the vague delusions of heathenism! This death has created a profound impression among those interested in the cause of Chinese evangelization, and is already having a marked effect upon such of the Chinese as knew him. And indeed many knew him, for he was accustomed each Lord's day to preach to a street audience of hundreds, and to receive the visit of a goodly number of interested hearers to his rented rooms. On Sunday his funeral was largely attended by both Chinese and Americans, at the First Baptist church. The services, conducted in two languages, were deeply interesting. The taking off of this good man is a mysterious providence; but we cannot doubt that God will make it the best for the mission cause. We believe that this now planted corn of wheat will bring forth much fruit.—Am. Baptist.

A Scotch elder, on learning from his minister that he proposed a series of lectures on Revelation, cautioned him: "I've nae objection to ye taking a quiet trot through the seven churches, but for on'y sake drive canny among the seals and trumpets."

The Beggar and Dr. Smollett.—A beggar asking Dr. Smollett for alms, the doctor gave him, through mistake, a guinea. The poor fellow, perceiving it, hobbled after him to return it; whereupon Smollett returned it to him with another guinea, as a reward for his honesty, exclaiming at the same time:

"What a lodging has honesty taken up with!"

It was said proverbially at Rome, that it was unbecoming a Roman soldier to fear while Cæsar was alive. It is much more unworthy of a Christian soldier to fear, for Christ ever liveth. He says, "Because I live, ye shall live also."

"Oh the sweet joy this sentence gieves—
'I know that my Redeemer lives.'"

He who has struck his colors to the power of an evil habit, has surrendered himself to the power of an enemy, bound by no articles of faith, and from whom he can expect only the vilest treatment.

Those who in the day of sorrow have owned God's presence in the cloud, will find him also in the pillar of fire, brightening and cheering the abode as night comes on.

"I never knew a man," says an old author, "who could not bear another's misfortunes just like a Christian"—which reminds us of the old lady who thought every calamity that happened to herself a trial, and every one that happened to her friend a judgment.

Man has two chambers in his heart—the one for himself, the other for a friend; but the latter had far better be empty than filled with that which is false.

Children's Department.

The Bird Preacher.

"O mother! the poor boy who always brings us white sand for our kitchen-floor is standing at the door in the rain, and he has brought me a beautiful canary-bird in a rough little cage, which he has made himself. He says that he would like to make a present to me, because I once knit his grandmother a pair of warm stockings as a Christmas gift. He has reared the beautiful bird himself. May I accept it from him, mother? I will give the boy a good big piece of money for it, if you say so."

"Of course you must accept it, Eva, but you must not give him any money for it. He brings it to you out of the kindness of his heart, and he would not like it if you paid him for it. After a month or two, you can give him something which is of more value than the bird, but do not do it now. Thank the kind boy for his present, and I will see that he does not leave the house without having eaten a good lunch."

Eva ran as fast as she could, and brought the beautiful bird into the house. She hung the cage by the window, and said to her little sister: "Mimi, the bird belongs to me alone, and nobody shall feed it but me. You shall never climb up on my chair, Mimi, and never even touch the door of the cage, for then the canary-bird would fly out, and get away from me altogether."

Mimi was a pale, sickly little girl, who was sitting on a low stool, and plaiting a little lamp-mat. She could walk but a few steps, though she had been old enough to do so for several years. Her hands and feet were very weak. She was a dwarf, and she sat nearly the whole day on her little seat, and played with her dolls, read her little story-books, or did any little work which she loved to do best. She was already ten years old, and while other children were out of doors, running around, and enjoying themselves in every possible way, she could only sit at the window and look at them. Occasionally, you could see the tears coming to her eyes, for she felt sorry that she could not run around and play too, but then they soon dried up again, and she looked as patient and as cheerful as any girl that passed along the street. Mimi was very glad when she saw the little canary-bird brought into the room, and she clapped her hands together in joy, for she thought it would be a splendid little companion for her, being compelled to stay in the house so much as she was. But she felt badly enough after her sister had spoken in such a harsh way to her, forbidding her ever to have any thing to do with the bird. Their mother was not in the room, for if she had been, she would have cast a glance at Eva that would have been a sufficient reproof for her unkindness toward her little dwarf sister.

The next day, Eva came from her bedroom, and said that she had had a wonderful dream about her canary-bird. She had noticed yesterday that her bird had just a little black feather upon the top of its head, which looked for all the world like a little cap. Now, last night she dreamed that the little fellow had a black velvet cap on, and stood upon a large ink-bottle, and that he had preached a little sermon. She felt sorry enough that she could not understand a single word of his sermon, for she knew that it must have been very fine.

Her mother was listening to her all the while, and then she said: "Now, who knows but that you may learn a good lesson from this?"

Eva looked up with some astonishment, and said: "Mother, what could I learn from a canary-bird? Why, I am a scholar in the second class!"

"Well," said the mother in reply, "you see that little Jack sings every day when you give him his seed, and when you fill his little cup with water. Now, it is not every little girl that is happy and thankful when she eats her meals and is satisfied with what she gets. God is the Giver of every good gift, and you cannot thank him enough for the least blessings which he bestows, and your heart should be as happy as God is willing to give. I will tell you another thing that little Jack can teach you: he can teach you to observe little things, and a mere glance of the eye, or the raising of the finger either by your father or myself, should be a sufficient indication of our wish, which you should always be glad to obey."

"How so," exclaimed Eva, in surprise and a little anxiety.

"Have you not noticed that whenever you take a cloth and lay it over Jack's cage, that he becomes as still as a mouse, and you would not know he was there until you took it off again?"

"Yes," said Eva, and then she saw the force of her mother's remark.

"How good it would be," continued her mother, further, "if all children would obey a hint like that!"

After a few days, little Jack had become an old story to Eva. She was heartily tired of feeding him, and was even half sorry that she had taken him. "What shall I do with the bird?" she said. "I go every day to school, play on the piano, and must take my exercise in the garden. I have so much to do, especially since I have commenced English, that I do not see how I can take upon myself any more labor. I think I will have to give up this work, and get somebody else to do it for me."

"No," said her mother, who heard these words with considerable surprise, "you must not cease to perform these little duties, for they will prepare you for greater ones which will devolve upon you when you become older. Besides, Eva, when one does a thing willingly, there will always be time enough to do it. Suppose, for instance, that you get up in the morning just a quarter of an hour earlier?"

"But it is so pleasant, mother, to lie in bed a good while."

"Yes, I know it is sweet, but every thing in excess that is sweet has an unfortunate result."

"Now, mother, I know what you are thinking of. You are bringing up again the preserved pineapple in Aunt Aurelia's cellar, which I ate so much of one day that I had to take a great deal of bitter medicine after it. Now, you know I was only a little thing then, and did not even go to school. Now, if I have to get up earlier in the morning, and provide seeds and water for little Jack before I go to school, the sand-boy will have done nothing for me but given me trouble and more duties to perform. The twig cage is very homely, and if I have a nice cage, it would cost more spending-money than I can now spare."

"One must always honor a present," said her mother. "Your money is sufficient to buy a beautiful cage, and the little trouble which Jack gives you will be a great benefit to you, if you perform it right. Life, especially the life of a woman, is one continual succession of little cares and many small duties, and just what you are doing now is a discipline that you really need to make you happy and useful hereafter. Little Jack will, by and by, amply pay you back for all your trouble by the confidence he will place in you, and the attachment which he will show to you; and all that will be very pleasant."

These words led Eva to think the matter over in a more sensible way than she had ever done before. After a couple of weeks, she bought a beautiful new cage, and every morning she arose twenty minutes earlier than she had previously done, to provide little Jack with what he needed. She used to call him her "bird preacher," for she could not forget the beautiful little dream that she once had about his preaching on top of an ink-bottle.

One day, her Aunt Aurelia came from the city and saw the little "bird preacher" for the first time. "What a charming little bird this is!" said she, as she looked at Jack. "I only hope he will not have to suffer what my little bird has had to pass through. Just think, my canary-bird is the first present which my husband ever made me, and the poor little fellow has been blind for several weeks. Now he strikes himself against the wires of his cage, and often cannot find his food. It is very pitiful to see him, and I often have to hold the grains in my hand and let him pick them up in his little bill, for it does seem to me sometimes that he would really starve if I did not attend to him this way."

"O Aunt Aurelia! just bring over your bird and let him live with my little Jack, for Jack is so good that I really believe he will take care of your bird too. You see what a nice large cage I have got. I will put them both in it, and we will see what they will do."

Her mother looked up with a smile, which seemed to say to Eva: How glad I am that you still find time to do a kind act for another! The aunt willingly accepted Eva's proposition, and the following day a messenger brought the blind bird to Eva, who put it in the cage with little Jack. "Now," said she, "I want you, Jack, to carry out your reputation of being a little bird preacher, and I want you to be very kind to your blind playmate, and if he is not very good and patient in his affliction, I want you to preach to him occasionally."

Jack did not know a word that she said, of course, and he looked at his new acquaintance, the blind bird, very closely, and kept his distance for an hour or two. In fact, several days passed by before Jack showed any friendliness to his blind companion. But, by and by, there was an evident change. He came nearer to the poor blind bird—whose name, I should have said long ago, was Bill—and helped him find his way to the water-cup, and to the place where the seeds were.

Once Eva watched them closely to see what they would do, and, to her great surprise, she saw Jack pick up grains very rapidly and put them in Bill's mouth. And what should Bill do but flap his wings and sing a little, just as much as to say that he was very thankful for what Jack had been doing for him. Then she saw Jack take his place right alongside of Bill, and flap his wings against him a little, and lead him in that way to the little bath-tub which stood in the farthest corner of the cage, and which Jack was very fond of visiting himself. As soon as he had led Bill there, he left him again, and Bill was evidently delighted to take a bath. Eva watched these manœuvres every day, and she one day saw Jack's kindnesses so plainly manifested to Bill, that she blushed deeply, and the tears started to her eyes.

"Oh!" said she, "how unkind and impatient I have been to my poor sick sister! I have not been half as good to her as Jack has been to poor blind Bill. I shall always be kind to Mimi hereafter. O Jack! you don't know what a little preacher you have been to me." And, with weeping eyes, Eva ran to her mother, and embraced her, and told her of her resolution. She then hastened to Mimi, and the sisters went together as they had never done before.

From this hour poor blind Bill was never separated from Jack, for the attachment which they showed to each other, and the kindness and forbearance which they always manifested, made it too plain that they ought to live together all their lives. So kind did Jack continue to be, that he lost his name in due time, and was only called the "bird preacher."

As I have passed by that house many times, and have seen the birds so happy in the same cage, and even hearing them sing so charmingly, I have wondered why all the little girls do not learn, not from the birds alone, but from the cattle in the field, and all the animals that are so friendly toward each other, the great lesson of kindness.—The Methodist.

A Bible View of Hell:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus; Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

A FREE GOSPEL FOR GOD'S POOR.

CHRIST draws the soul to himself, then casts it out into the world of work. Not spurning it from His presence, but arming it with God's power to do God's bidding; charging it with a commission that might appal a phalanx of angels—the completion of that of which the suffering and death of Jesus was but the sublime initiatory work—the rescue of a doomed, exiled world from the powers of death.

When the sinner sees Jesus, and cries, in mastering joy and gratitude, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" the mighty arm thrusts him out into the vineyard with the command, "Go work."

SAVED FOR HIMSELF.

A soul washed in the fountain of blood, dwelling ever and only in the immediate presence of Christ; never wandering out into the night, groping and stumbling, weary, footsore, disheartened in the search for the lost; never overwhelmed in the swelling waters of longing for the perishing, till the rigid lips cry, "How long, O Lord, how long?" a soul, unconscious of the sin that cost the ignominy and agony of the Son of God, "singing herself away to everlasting bliss," would be an anomaly in the moral universe of God. God must deny himself, reverse his purposes of grace and write "folly" on the sufferings of his Son Jesus to make it a possibility. And yet, some who make periodical, pious pilgrimages to the land of their youth, and, guided by some well-remembered landmark, dig long and deep for and when unearthed, shed childish tears of joy over it, are no more concerned for the world, that without hope, or God, or Christ, is perishing, than if they were inhabitants of another sphere, and the earth was only the potters field where their hope was sepulchred.

This longing for Christian emotional enjoyment, to the exclusion of anxiety for hard, heart-testing work for Jesus; this longing for heaven, with little regard for the earth, is one of the most successful snares for unsuspecting Christian souls. Dr. Lyman Beecher's blunt, courageous words ought to be framed for the walls of every Christian home: "A great many professed Christians have no other idea of religion than that it is the means of getting to heaven when they die. As to doing anything for God while they live, it does not enter into their plans. I tell you, my brethren, I do not believe there is one in five hundred of such professors that will reach heaven; for there is a magnanimity in true religion that is above all such contemptible meanness."

CHRIST'S IDEAL.

The real purpose of Christ concerning his followers; the tenor and spirit of every principle of our religion; the true law of development in the world of souls, is plainly seen in that familiar parable of Jesus. When the wealthy neighbors of the Royal Host had cried, in concert, "Have me excused;" spurning his feast and daring his displeasure, his servants were sent hurrying into the lanes and streets of the city, the homes of the despised and forgotten poor, to invite the maimed, and halt, and blind. They came in eager, wondering crowds, hobbling on crutches, piteous in tatters, and yet there was room. Out again into the highways and hedges, hunt through the dens of vice and hovels of squalor, beat up the hiding-places of the lost, as a sportsman beats the thicket; heed no stammered apology; accept no bold, defiant "I pray thee have me excused;" compel them to come in, that "My house may be filled."

Looking at the nature of our Great Commission, its divine authority; remembering that the Gospel of Jesus is God's power unto salvation, who can wonder that the tidings of life are to be carried to "every creature," or that the limit of the missionary field of the church of Christ is The World and human souls? The cross of the dying Jesus was divine charity, embracing all the lost; the story of that cross must be imbued with the same measureless charity. When thinking men of the world hard press Christians with the spirit of the teachings of Jesus and their inevitable outgrowth in the duties of practical Christian living, they often plead that circumstances are greatly changed since the days of the primitive church, and changing circumstances have brought different methods and have materially altered our relations and modified our responsibility. Has the Great Commission been changed, in word, or syllable or letter? Has the character of the world, as Christ-hating and truth-despising, been marvelously modified? Do not the multitudes now, as then, at the hearing of the invitation of mercy, in concert begin to make excuse? Is the great majority of the earth's millions, Christian? Are there fewer of the lost than when Jesus, the weary exile, preached the Gospel of his kingdom; or when Paul proclaimed the unknown God in sneering Athens? Are there fewer of God's poor to whom the pitying Jesus would have his Gospel preached?

No sane man would dare underrate the work of the Church in the proclamation of the Gospel of Christ. It is a story of splendid triumph. No pen can write it but the pen of a recording angel. No book can contain the record, but the book of God's remembrance. But we need to-day to read again the command of Jesus, and to measure again the field of the world. We are not, as we should be, preaching

THE GOSPEL TO THE POOR.

Here and there their tatters are touched by the fingers of far-reaching charity, and their dull ears are pierced by the welcome of life; but the masses—the great, countless, sinning, sorrowing masses—are crowding deathward in fearful, piteous truth, "having no hope, and without God in the world."—Selected.

FROM MRS. P. A. KRISE.

BR. STORRS: I found the enclosed extract in "Fox's Book of Martyrs" the very day I read Br. Ellsworth's exposition of Matt. xxiv, in the HERALD issue of May 17th. I thought it possible that you had not read it, and it seems so much like the fulfilment of that prophecy, that I cannot forbear calling your attention to it. I have waited this long, however, hoping some one else would do so. Br. Ellsworth says, "No earthly power or potentate has ever yet declared, 'no man shall buy or sell' save he wears a certain mark." Fox, speaking of the persecutions in Louis XIV's time, on page 437, says, "Protestants were expelled from all offices, trades, privileges and employs, thereby depriving them of the means of getting their bread." If Br. E., reads this book, I think he will conclude that human ingenuity was taxed to the utmost to make "a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation," etc. Its accordance with Scripture seems so striking that one almost expects it to close with, "That it might be fulfilled," etc., though of course I may be mistaken. From the memoir of Fox's book (which is partly torn out) I gather that he lived in Queen Elizabeth's time, was eleven years engaged in this work, and the papists were seriously alarmed at his labors, and exerted every possible means to depreciate the value of his writings; but this opposition had the most essential advantages, as it compelled him to weigh, with scrupulous attention, the certainty of the facts he related, and the validity of his authorities. The date of the publication of the book is torn out.

Can any one explain to what Matt. xxiv. 34 refers, and also where Elijah and Enoch went, if "no man has ascended to heaven?"

I am delighted with the "Oath of God to Abraham." I would rather be the author of your tracts than the greatest of earth's heroes.

May God bless you, and keep you under the shadow of His wings, is the prayer of

YOUR FRIEND.

LYNCHBURG, VA., June 28, 1871.

The following is the extract Sister Krise speaks of.—EDITOR.

"AN ACCOUNT OF THE PERSECUTIONS IN THE VALLEYS OF PIEDMONT, IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

Pope Clement the Eighth sent missionaries into the valleys of Piedmont, to induce the Protestants to renounce their religion; and these missionaries having erected monasteries in several parts of the valleys, became exceedingly troublesome to those of the reformed, where the monasteries appeared, not only as fortresses to curb, but as sanctuaries for all such to fly to, as had any ways injured them.

The Protestants petitioned the Duke of Savoy against these missionaries, whose insolence and ill-usage were become intolerable; but instead of getting any redress, the interest of the missionaries so far prevailed, that the Duke published a decree, in which he declared, that one witness should be sufficient in a court of law against a Protestant; and that any witness, who convicted a Protestant of any crime whatever, should be entitled to one hundred crowns. It may be easily imagined, upon the publication of a decree of this nature, that many Protestants fell martyrs to perjury and avarice, for several villainous papists would swear anything against the Protestants for the sake of the reward, and then fly to their own priests for absolution from their false oaths.

To encourage as much as possible, the apostacy of the Protestants, the Duke of Savoy published a proclamation, wherein he said, "To encourage the heretics to turn Catholics, it is our will and pleasure, and we do hereby expressly command that all such as shall embrace the holy Roman Catholic faith, shall enjoy an exemption, from all and every tax for the space of five years, commencing from the day of their conversion."

The Duke of Savoy likewise established a court, called, The council for extirpating the heretics.

As if these severities were not sufficient, the Duke, soon after, published another edict in which he strictly commanded, that no Protestant should act as a school-master, or tutor, either in public or private, or dare to teach any art, science, or language, directly or indirectly, to persons of any persuasion whatever.

This edict was immediately followed by another, which decreed, that no Protestant should hold any place of profit, trust or honor; and to wind up the whole, the certain token of an approaching persecution came forth in a final edict, by which it was positively ordered, that all Protestants should diligently attend mass. The publication of an edict, containing such an injunction, may be compared to unfurling the bloody flag; for murder and rapine were sure to follow. To give greater vigor to the persecution, the Duke of Savoy called a general assembly of the Roman Catholic nobility and gentry, when a solemn edict was published against the reformed, containing many heads, and including several reasons for extirpating the Protestants; among which were the following: 1. For the preservation of the papal authority. 2. That the church livings may be all under one mode of government. 3. To make a union among all parties. 4. In honor of all the saints, and of the ceremonies of the church of Rome.

This severe edict was followed by a most cruel order, published on January 25, A. D. 1655, under the Duke's sanction, by Andrew Gastaldo, doctor of civil laws. This order set forth, "That every head of a family, with the individuals of that family, of the reformed religion, of what rank, degree, or condition soever, none excepted, inhabiting and possessing estates in Lucerne, St. Giovanori, Bibiana, Campiglione, St. Secondo, Lucernetta, La Torre, Fenile and Bricherassis, should within three days after the publication thereof, withdraw and depart, and be withdrawn out of the said places, and translated into the places and limits tolerated by his highness during his pleasure; particularly Bobbio, Angrogna, Villars, Rorata, and the county of Bonetti. And all this to be done on pain of death, and confiscation of house and goods, unless within the limited time they turned Roman Catholics." A flight with such speed, in the midst of winter, may be conceived as no agreeable task, especially in a country almost surrounded by mountains. The sudden order affected all, and things, which would have been scarcely noticed at another time, now appeared in the most conspicuous light. Women with child, or women just lain in, were not objects of pity on this order for sudden removal, for all were included in the command; and it unfortunately happened, that the winter was remarkably severe and rigorous."—Fox's Book of Martyrs. Pages 475–477.

"The massacres and murders, already mentioned to have been committed in the valleys of Piedmont, nearly depopulated most of the towns and villages. One place only had not been assaulted, and that was owing to the difficulty of approaching it." Page 483.

THE N. Y. SUNDAY HERALD.

FROM ELD. WM. ROWORTH.

BR. STORRS: I send you an article taken from the "New York Sunday Herald," of June 25, which I thought might interest some of the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE. I read it with pleasure, to find that some of our views were spreading, and that the Pagan doctrine of the soul's immortality was losing ground. I have not found any in this place who sympathize in our views. I had an opportunity one Friday evening of making a few remarks at the first Presbyterian meeting, which were well received; formerly Dr. Duffield's church, who had preached considerable on the Advent. I have an invitation to preach to a large congregation of colored people in this city, and hope to be able to preach the truth as it is found in the word of God.

DETROIT, MICH., July 8, 1871.

"THE HERALD AND FREE RELIGION"—THE REV. JOHN WEISS AND HIS VIEWS.

To the Editor of the Herald:—

In Sunday's "Herald," June 25, is an interesting article, headed "The Herald and Free Religion," in which the writer says:—"In our comments upon Rev. John Weiss' assertion, that 'the nature of the Creator is in the material created,' we said we could hardly see how to escape the logical consequence of a changeable and perishable God."

Now, sir, in view of the fact that the elements of which all the bodies in the universe are composed are eternal and indestructible in their nature, we may easily see how the material creation, so-called, may reflect the attributes of Deity. The Apostle Paul says, "The invisible things of God are clearly seen from the creation, being understood by the things made, even His eternal power and godhead." So far, then, the "Hebrew philosopher" and the Hebrew apostle agree. Philosophically speaking, there is no such thing as creation. The popular orthodox theory of creation is that God made the earth and all the heavenly bodies out of nothing, than which no greater fallacy was ever presented to the contemplation of a rational being. Nothing in nature can be destroyed. The forms may be modified or totally changed; or they may be reduced to the natural elements of which they are composed; but those elements are indestructible, and must, therefore, be eternal in their nature and duration. All the creation there is consists in making one thing out of another. If we make a chair or a table out of a tree it is as much a creation as to make the earth out of materials already in existence. But as we could not make the chair or table without the tree, so no more could the earth or any of the celestial bodies have been made without the elements of which they are composed, and which are eternal and indestructible in their nature. The theory of making one thing out of nothing is worthy of priestcraft, the source from which it emanated, and it does to mix with purgatory and other insane dogmas. "Infinity within, infinity without, belie creation." From these scientific facts we may perceive, with the Apostle Paul and the "Hebrew philosopher," that "the nature of the Creator is in the material creation."

Again you say, "Mr. Weiss expressed his lack of faith in the soul's immortality and independence of the body," and you add that "scientific facts can never alter the common and universal belief of mankind in the soul's immortality and consequent independence of the body." And to support the assertion you refer the reader to numerous passages of Scripture, not one of which contains a declaration that man has within him an immortal soul which can exist independent of the body. And there is no man living who can produce either from the writings of the Old Testament or from what is called the New, a single passage containing such a declaration. Christendom has again and again been challenged to produce such a passage, and failed to do it. In England a hundred pounds reward has been offered in public prints to any one who would produce such a passage. A very popular orthodox London preacher admitted, in his own pulpit, that there was no such doctrine to be found in the Word of God, but that "the philosophy of reason taught it." Yes, heathen philosophers, Plato, Socrates and their pupils, taught it. And modern Gentile would-be philosophers, since the days of Christ and the apostles, have been vain and anti-Christian enough to engraft that heathen dogma into their theology. But are the dogmas and doctrines of men to be preferred to the Word of God? "In vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."

You say, "Our Hebrew philosopher appeals to Jesus and Paul, who, he says, never advanced such a doctrine." There are, sir, to-day, thousands of intelligent believers in the Word of God in these United States, Canada, England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales, who declare the same thing, and who are prepared to live and die in the faith. "The wages of sin is death," but the gift of God (to true believers only) is eternal life, through the medium of a resurrection. Paul, in arguing with the Sadducees (a sect that did not believe in a resurrection), says, "If there is no resurrection there is no future life, and if there is no future life let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die" (and are done with.) Moreover, he says, if your doctrine of no resurrection be true, "all the righteous dead are perished." Refer to 1. Corinthians. xv, (one of your own selections). Now, if Paul had been a believer in the heathen dogmas of the soul's immortality and of going to heaven or hell at death, what reason had he for declaring that, if there was no truth in the doctrine of a resurrection, as the Sadducees affirmed, all the righteous dead were perished? If he were a believer in the dogma of the saints going to heaven at death, what difference did he suppose the doctrine of no resurrection would make to them? To the saints already in heaven, enjoying their reward of a virtuous life in the flesh, what difference to them whether there ever was or was not a resurrection? But Paul declares, if there is no truth in the doctrine of a resurrection there is no hope of a future life, and that all who have "gone before" (who died in the faith) are perished. Paul declares, as plainly as language can convey ideas, that there is no conscious existence between death and the resurrection, and that if, as the Sadducees affirmed, there is no resurrection, there is no future life, after the breath has gone from the body, for either saint or sinner. And Paul said, "No other things than Moses in the law and prophets did say." The teaching of Paul on this subject is the teaching of the word of God from Genesis to Revelations. Well might Paul say to the Sadducees, if your doctrine is true, "let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die" (and are done with). But for an apostle who believed in going to heaven or hell at death to preach epicureanism, let us spend the remainder of our lives in the beastly practice of eating and drinking, because our lives are short, is incomprehensible, in an orthodox point of view, and degrades the character of the apostle to that of a common baccanalian. But who can believe it? Read carefully the whole of the fifteenth chapter of the First Corinthians, and you will be convinced that I have not misinterpreted the argument of Paul on the subject. Therein he says that "at the last trump this mortal must put on immortality." There is, therefore, no immortality obtainable, by the human race, till the morning of the resurrection, till 'the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible." Man, in his present state, is purely mortal, with nothing within or about him that is not perishable. In this respect, and in the article of death, Solomon says, "Man hath no pre-eminence above a beast; as the one dieth, so dieth the other; both go to the same place; both are of the dust, and both return to dust." Both would sleep an eternal sleep of unconsciousness, but for the promise to man of a resurrection, when "the trumpet shall sound." The promise of a resurrection to man constitutes the mighty difference in the future destiny of man and the beasts. But if we take away the doctrine of a resurrection, where, then, is the difference? We might well say, in the language of Paul, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die" like the beasts and are done with. Man's only hope of immortality and eternal life is to be found in the promise of God to resurrect all who, "by a patient continuance in well doing in this life, seek for glory, honor and immortality." All such are to be resurrected incorruptible, immortal, to die no more. This is the distinguishing reward of the righteous. Of the wicked, it is said, "they shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth upon them." "Shall not see life," and yet orthodoxy says they have immortal souls which can never die. Awfully conflicting statements. Which is to be believed, the word of God or the traditions of men? Let God be true though every man be a liar.

"Now, that the dead are raised even Moses showed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob; for he is not a God of the dead, but of the living." This last sentence, sir, you have selected, as one among others, to prove the soul's immortality, and that the souls of the saints enter heaven at death; whereas it is used by the author of Luke's gospel in reference to God's promise of a resurrection, whereby all true believers in Christ are to be made "equal to the angels, and can die no more, being the children of the resurrection." So that the fact that "God is not a God of the dead, but of the living," proves nothing, according to Moses, but that God will ultimately raise the dead saints. Meanwhile they sleep in the dust; they rest in hope of a joyful resurrection, and God is, therefore, prospectively the God of the living only—not of the dead. How could a saint in heaven be said to "rest in hope?" A saint said to be resting in hope of what he is in possession? The dead saints are said to "sleep in Jesus" till the morning of the resurrection. Neither Jesus nor Paul taught the heathen dogmas of the soul's immortality, and of the soul going to heaven or hell at death.

I certainly have no sympathy with your "Hebrew Philosopher" in his expression of the worthlessness of a "creed" in a system of religion. I am as much opposed to creeds as it is possible for a man to be, believing as I do that there is but "one faith, one hope, one baptism, one God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," etc. In the word of God there is but one creed from beginning to end. The gospel preached to Abraham was the gospel preached by Jesus and Paul. The essence of the gospel is contained in the covenants and promises made of God to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. The covenants and promises are the gospel in a nutshell—the gospel multum in parvo. Paul declares he preached no other thing than Moses in the law and prophets taught. The hope of Paul was the Israelitish hope; the faith of Paul was an Israelitish faith, and he said there was but one faith, whereas, now, we have a thousand faiths; in fact, there are scarcely two persons in the sectarian world who believe alike, or who know exactly what they do believe. Not five per cent of the sectarian world can tell the creed of the sect to which, by accident, as a rule, they belong. One of the precepts most strenuously urged by Christ and the Apostles was to preserve the "unity of the faith" in the bond of peace. Now, the cry is, "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos and I of Cephas," etc., etc. Is Christ divided? Truth is catholic; sectarianism is as false as God is true. There can be but one creed that is true. God cannot be author of confusion. We have a perfect "Babel" of creeds, and not one that is popular and orthodox is worth the attention of a Hottentot. The popular creeds are a mixture of heathenism and Judaism, with the slightest imaginable tincture of genuine apostolic Christianity. The creeds now ventilated were never found in the Word of God, but had their origin in the fancies and follies (traditions and commandments) of men—Luther, Calvin, Wesley, and hundreds besides, having contributed to produce the confusion around us. It would be impossible now to produce a creed so irrational that it would not find adherents. What is this state of things but that general "falling away" from the "faith once delivered to the saints," which some of the Apostles, in their epistles, predicted would take place in the "last days" of the present Gentile dispensation? We are realizing the predicted condition of the Church, when its worship would have dwindled into the mere "form of godliness," without the power. True, there never was a period in the history of the Church when religion (the profession) was more popular or more fashionable; and it is equally true that there never was a period in its history when there was less vital religion in it. Truth has fallen in the streets. The gospel taught by Christ and the Apostles is ignored both in theory and practice. The world is asking, "Where is the promise of Christ's coming? All things continue as they were from the beginning;" and a thousand other popular falsehoods.

THE TRIAL OF FAITH AND OF FRIENDSHIP.

FAITH and friendship are seldom truly tried, but in extremes. To find friends when we have no need of them, and to want them when we have need of them, are both easy and common. Who will not profess to love a man in his prosperity; how few will show that they do it indeed in his adversity? When we are happy in the spring-tide of abundance, and the rising flood of plenty, then the world will be our servant; then men flock about us with bare heads, with bended bodies, and protesting tongues. But when the waters fall to ebbing; when wealth but shifteth to another stand; then men look upon us at a distance, and stiffen themselves as if they were in armor, lest they should get a wound if they come near us. Adversity is like Penelope's night; which undoes all that ever the day did weave. The knowledge of such a blessedness as a friend is, can hardly be acquired without some sad misfortune. We can never thoroughly try him, but in times of our difficulty and distress. And till we have tried him, our knowledge can be called but by the name of hope. Man can neither be truly happy without a friend nor yet know him to be a true friend without his being in some sense unhappy? Our prosperity and ourselves are things so closely linked, that we know not which is the cause of the respect and love that we find till we and prosperity part, and then we discover to which of them the respect and affection of our friends did cling. I confess that he is happy, that finds a true friend in his extremity; but others will perhaps think that he is happier, that findeth not extremity wherein to try his friend. Thus the trial of friendship, is by finding what others will do for us.

But the trial of faith, is by finding what we will do for God. To trust him for food and raiment when we have the money in our iron chest, is easy and not thankworthy. But to depend upon him for what we cannot see; is both more hard for man to do, and more acceptable to God to see, when it is done. For in that act, we make confession of his Deity. We know not, when all goes well with us, what we ourselves are; nor how far we could neglect ourselves, to follow God's commands. All men will be Peters in their bragging tongue, and most men will be Peters in their base denial: but few men will be Peters in their quick repentance. When all goes well, we swear we will not leave God in our greatest trials; but when our trials come, we forget our vows and flee. When we meet with blows that force us either to let go our hold of God or our hold of our lives; then we see to which our souls will cleave the fastest. And, of this trial, excellent is the use we may make. If we find our faith firm when tested, it will be unto us a perpetual banquet. And if we find it starting aside, still, knowing the weakness, we may strive to sinew it with a stronger nerve. So that the trial of our faith, is always either the assurance of our happiness, or the way whereby we may be led to find it. Faith, trust in God, is our happiness. Without this confidence in a power that is always able to aid us, we wander both in trouble and in doubt. Infidelity is the cause of all our woes, the ground of all our sins. Not trusting God, we discontent ourselves with fears and solicitudes; and to cure these, we run into forbidden paths. Unworthy man, that can think so meanly of God as to suppose that he will suffer such to want, as, with a dutiful endeavor, do depend upon him. It is not usual even with man to be so base. And will God be worse than his creatures? Canst thou believe that God will deny a follower of His such gifts, as the needful things of this life are? Can a Deity be inhuman? Or can he that grasps the inexhaustible provisions of the world in his hand, be a niggard to his sons, unless he sees it for their good and benefit? Nay, couldst thou that readest this (whatsoever thou art) if thou hast treasure by thee, couldst thou let a diligent and affectionate servant, that always waited on thee, want necessaries? Couldst thou endure to see him in disgracing rags; nipped to a benumbing with the colds of winter; complaining for want of sustenance; or neglected in the times of sickness? I appeal to thy inward and more noble nature. I know thou couldst not. And wilt thou yet imagine that thou canst be denied such things as these, from so unbounded a bounty as His is? Serve him, and but believe; and upon my soul he will never fail to give thee what is most convenient. O my God! my refuge, my protector and my soul's anchor; I beg that I may but serve thee, and depend upon thee; I need not beg for a supply of what else I need, thou givest that without asking. Thou knowest that my soul's wishes are not for a vast abundance. If ever I should wish a plenty, it should be for the service of my fellow-men, not for myself. I care not to abound, and I am persuaded I shall never want either necessaries or conveniences. Let me find my heart dutiful, and my faith upon trial steadfast, and I am sure these will be ground enough for sufficient happiness while I live here.—Selected.

A Latter-Day Horror.

The ship Don Juan sailed from Macao May 4th, with 650 Coolies on board. Two days out, the vessel, in some mysterious way, took fire, and about fifty of the kidnapped Chinese escaped. It is supposed that the Coolies fired the ship, either with the hope that the conflagration might afford an opportunity for their escape, or with the desperation of blank despair hoping thus to, at least, shorten their sufferings. This Coolie business has been called "the modern slave trade," and justly so; for "Coolie labor" is but a cover for the most degrading, cruel and brutal slavery. The Chinese are kidnapped and sold from their homes by their own families, nominally as laborers for a term of years, but really to life-long servitude. The traffic is a disgrace to the boasted progress of the age, a shame to modern civilization and to Christendom. A few decided words from Great Britain and the United States, would, doubtless, put an end to the whole thing. We trust they may be spoken soon.

As to the burning of the Don Juan, we have no heart to tell the story of how when the flames were discovered the hatches were battened down upon over half a thousand human beings, thus left roasting alive for a full hour, when, it becoming apparent that the fire could not be stayed, the Captain and crew took to their boats, opening the hatches at the last moment, when the miserable wretches found egress from their fiery dungeon only to the blue sky above, and the waste of waters around, and such prospect of escape as was afforded by floating spars or portions of the wreck. Thus some fifty of these poor creatures escaped, one of whom testifies that he "saw blood ooze out from the sides of the vessel"—the gore of his companions who failed to make their escape from the vessel's hold.

We have only one word to add. Suppose the tortures of these poor wretches had been prolonged for a year—a month, a week, even, instead of a few hours! The blood chills at the thought of what they must have endured in the last minutes of their existence. Take, then, their tortures, and add the word eternal, and you have a faint picture of what the future punishment is often described to be. Believe it who can. We reject it as first, being intrinsically improbable; and, second, contradicted by "the Scriptures of truth."—Ad. Ch. Times.

The Apostles founded Christian churches, all based on the same principles, and having the same object in view, but all quite independent of each other. And while, by the inspiration of Him who knew what was in man, they delineated those Christian principles, which man could not have devised for himself, each church has been left by the same Divine foresight, to make the application of those principles in its symbols, its forms of worship, and its ecclesiastical regulations; and while steering its course by the chart and compass, which His holy Word supplies, to regulate for itself the sails and rudder, according to the winds and currents it may meet with. Now I have little doubt, that the sort of variation resulting from this independence and freedom, so far from breaking the bond of peace is the best preservative of it. A number of neighboring families living in perfect unity, will be thrown into discord as soon as you compel them to form one family, and to observe in things intrinsically indifferent, the same rules: one e. g., likes early hours, and another late; one likes the windows open and another shut; and thus by being brought too close together, they are driven into ill-will, by one being perpetually forced to give way to another. Of this character were the disputations which arose (though they subsequently assumed a different character) about church-music, the posture of the communicants, the colors of a minister's dress, the time of keeping Easter, etc., etc.—Bishop Whately.

Our Past Position.

The Herald of Life was commenced October, 1863. We gave several articles on the "ages to come," shortly after, in its columns. March 23, 1864, the following editorial appeared, to show what our position then was, and no one thought it their work to interfere with ours. We spoke as follows:

THE HERALD OF LIFE AND ITS EDITOR.

The Editor has heard of a few cases in which objections have been made to this paper because he seems to favor a future age where there will be probation to somebody. It is very hard for an Editor to annihilate himself, to please any one. As for himself, the Editor of this paper has no idea of trying the experiment. He has ever claimed, for himself, the right to speak what he thinks. While he published the Bible Examiner, through its fifteen volumes, he is not aware that an article was ever excluded merely because the writer differed from him. As then, so now, he speaks, and lets others do the same; and such as are unwilling to let him do so, have yet to learn, that he "seeks not his own, but the things that are Jesus Christ's"—His truth—"all that the prophets have spoken" concerning Him, his kingdom and reign. The Editor has endeavored not needlessly to wound the feelings of any one, or to treat harshly those from whom he differs. He does not claim, however, that he has never erred in this matter—for he never professed infallibility.

It is well known, he has for twenty years held to an "endless succession of ages" in the future. What will be the precise nature or character of those ages, he does not pretend positively to determine; but he has an opinion of what will be, in some respects, the character of the age next to succeed this; yet he has never felt like withholding fellowship from those who hold the view of "no probation for any one in the age to come," though himself not a believer in that view. They are at liberty to express their views, if they desire, in the columns of this paper; and they ought to have charity enough not to find fault if the Editor takes the same liberty. If we love truth more than a creed, let us show it by our works.

The Editor intends to treat all sects and parties kindly; but he will never consent to be trammelled in the expression of his convictions. He has bought his liberty at the sacrifice of name, standing, friends, property and everything except a good conscience and a fixed purpose to follow the truth wherever it leads.

And now a few words on the age to come. While he believes in the next age differing entirely from this, and of its being one in which Christ will personally reign on the throne of his father David, with all his saints made immortal and as associate rulers with the King of kings, he does not assent to many of the wild and haughty notions promulgated by some, who talk of little else than the age to come and the exalted positions they, themselves, fancy they shall hold on account of their supposed superiority to every one else who happens not to follow exactly in their steps, or do not allow them to dictate what others shall believe, and how they shall practice. With such an "age to come" people, the Editor of the Herald of Life has no sympathy; and, in fact, no fellowship, simply because they will not allow him to have any. By them he has been denounced; and if aught could disgust him with the whole theory of the age to come, their conduct would effectually do it. But the Editor's view "stands not in the wisdom of men," and is not shaken by the folly of men: "To the law and to the testimony" is his appeal.

To him, it is incomprehensible how any believer in the literal destruction of the wicked can doubt there being promises yet to be fulfilled to a remnant of literal Israel, in their national capacity.

[We here omit our remarks on St. James' words, Acts xv. 13 to 18, and the parallel prophecy of Amos ix. 8-15, and conclude as follows:]

How an unprejudiced mind can question the literal fulfilment of the latter part of this prophecy, when he knows the former part has had a literal accomplishment is unaccountable: and any transferring of these promises to the Gentile believers, seems to destroy the harmony of the prophecy. Those Christians are expressly named, and distinguished, by Jehovah himself, from "the house of Israel," as being the "heathen upon whom my name is called." But the Editor of the Herald of Life finds no fault with those who differ from him in this matter, provided they hold their view in charity; though with the spirit which would compel all others to see the future age, or ages, as they do, he has no fellowship. May God enable us all to remember, we are prone to be "slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken."

As to spiritualizing everything spoken of literal Israel, because we cannot see how such and such prophecies can have a literal fulfilment, the Editor leaves that work to those who have "little," not to say, "no faith." Let all follow the best light they have on prophecy, and leave God to judge the heart as to whether the views they entertain are held honestly or otherwise.

Such was our position in the first year of the Herald of Life; and such is our position still. No official interference was then made; and a principle was established on which the paper was to be conducted. Such will be the principle on which it will be conducted hereafter, unless it proves recreant to its calling. If it depart from it, farewell to its usefulness, if not to its existence.

We make this statement now, that the Life and Advent Union may be prepared to act at its coming anniversary as it sees best as to the paper and its Editor. With a sectarian paper we cannot be connected, nor with any sectarian organization.

Our Annual Gathering.

We again take occasion to urge upon the attention of friends scattered abroad the importance of the presence at the approaching camp-meeting of all who can arrange to be there. It is designed to make the meeting a success in every particular, but this can only be accomplished by all being there who can, and manifesting an active and earnest interest in the welfare of the meeting. If this is done an excellent work will be effected, and both those who are present and those who are absent will be strengthened and encouraged in their efforts to spread the truth and extend the cause of righteousness.

The annual meeting of the Union will commence Thursday, Aug. 17, at 10 A. M.

Again we say, let all who can be present; and may they come rejoicing in the Spirit, for then those means only will be employed or sought to be adopted which are felt to be best calculated to promote the interests of truth.

Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

Archbishop Whately, speaking of the reward of the saints, and the doom of the impenitent, observes:

"What that doom will be, whether the terms in which it is commonly spoken of in Scripture—'death,' 'destruction,' 'perishing,' etc., are to be understood figuratively, as denoting immortal life in a state of misery, or more literally, as denoting a final extinction of existence—this is quite a different question. It is certain that the words, 'life,' 'eternal life,' 'immortality,' etc., are always applied to the condition of those, and of those only, who shall at the last day be approved as 'good and faithful servants,' who are to 'enter into the joy of their Lord.'

"'Life,' as applied to their condition, is usually understood to mean 'happy life.' And that theirs will be a happy life, we are indeed plainly taught; but I do not think we are anywhere taught that the word 'life' does of itself necessarily imply happiness. If so indeed, it would be a mere tautology to speak of a 'happy life;' and a contradiction, to speak of a 'miserable life;' which we know is not the case, according to the usage of any language. In all ages and countries, 'life,' and the words answering to it in other languages, have always been applied, in ordinary discourse, to a wretched life, no less properly than to a happy one. Life, therefore, in the received sense of the word, would apply equally to the condition of the blest and of the condemned, supposing these last to be destined to continue forever living in a state of misery. And yet, to their condition the words 'life' and 'immortality' never are applied in Scripture. If therefore we suppose the hearers of Jesus and his Apostles to have understood, as nearly as possible in the ordinary sense, the words employed, they must naturally have conceived them to mean (if they were taught nothing to the contrary) that the condemned were really and literally to be 'destroyed,' and cease to exist; not, that they were to exist forever in a state of wretchedness. For they are never spoken of as being kept alive, but as forfeiting life: as for instance, 'Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life:'—'He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life.' And again, 'perdition,' 'death,' 'destruction,' are employed in numerous passages to express the doom of the condemned. All which expressions would, as I have said, be naturally taken in their usual and obvious sense, if nothing were taught to the contrary.

"That these expressions however are to be understood not in their ordinary sense, but figuratively, to signify an immortality of suffering, is inferred, by a large proportion of Christians, from some other passages: as, where our Lord speaks of 'everlasting punishment,' 'everlasting fire,' and of being 'cast into hell, where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.'

"This last expression of his is taken from the book of the prophet Isaiah (lxvi. 24), who speaks of 'the carcasses of the men that have transgressed, whose worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh:' describing evidently the kind of doom inflicted by the eastern nations on the vilest offenders, who were not only slain, but their bodies deprived of the rites of burial, and either burned to ashes (which, among them, was regarded as a great indignity,) or left to moulder above ground and be devoured by worms.

"From such passages as these it has been inferred that the sufferings, and consequently, the life, of the condemned, is never to have an end. And the expressions will certainly bear that sense; which would perhaps be their most obvious and natural meaning, if these expressions were the only ones on the subject that are to be found in Scripture. But they will also bear another sense; which, if not more probable in itself, is certainly more reconcileable with the ordinary meaning of the words 'destruction,' etc., which so often occur. The expressions of 'eternal punishment,' 'unquenchable fire,' etc., may mean merely that there is to be no deliverance—no revival—no restoration—of the condemned. 'Death,' simply, does not shut out the hope of being brought to life again: 'eternal death' does. 'Fire' may be quenched before it has entirely consumed what it is burning: 'unquenchable fire' would seem most naturally to mean that which destroys it utterly.

"It may be said indeed, that supposing man's soul to be an immaterial being, it cannot be consumed and destroyed by literal material fire or worms. That is true: but no more can it suffer from these. We all know that no fire, literally so called, can give us any pain unless it reach our bodies. The 'fire,' therefore, and the 'worm' that are spoken of, must at any rate, it would seem, be something figuratively so called;—something that is to the soul, what worms and fire are to a body. And as the effect of worms or fire is, not, to preserve the body they prey upon, but to consume, destroy, and put an end to it, it would follow, if the correspondence hold good, that the fire, figuratively so called, which is prepared for the condemned, is something that is really to destroy and put an end to them; and is called 'everlasting' or 'unquenchable' fire, to denote that they are not to be saved from it, but that their destruction is to be final. So in the parable of the tares, our Lord describes himself as saying, 'gather ye first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them; but gather the wheat into my garner;' as if to denote that the one is to be (as we know is the practice of the husbandman) carefully preserved, and the other, completely put an end to."—Future State, pp. 180–184.

And here it is proper to briefly notice another and small class of texts, of which the following is a member:

"And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal."—Matt. xxv. 46.

These closing words of Matthew's account of the judgment scene depicted by our Saviour, as well as a very few similar texts, are not unfrequently urged in support of man's immortality. We can easily see how they may be so regarded, so far as respects those living at the time of Christ's return, by people who hold the immortal-soul view, but we are certain that neither a simple perusal nor a close examination of the whole account would suggest to any stranger to that theory the idea of immortality of man or any thing connected with him. What was Jesus discoursing upon? He was describing the judgment of the world at his second coming; the judgment of those who shall be then living. This is undeniable; for, says he, verses 31 and 32, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations."

Were we to say, "all the nations of Europe are at war," would any person understand us to mean that all the dead of those various nationalities had been raised to life, and were engaged in the strife? No individual would so interpret the language: and yet it would be no more unreasonable to do so than to thus interpret the language of Jesus. Is there any thing said in the whole account about a resurrection of the dead? Nothing. Why, then, assume that reference is made to any but those who will be living at the coming of Christ? The language affords not the faintest intimation of such a thing, much less can it be held to justify the assumption.

Our Lord says, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him;" but he says nothing about any saints accompanying him. It is a significant fact that in all the numerous Scripture allusions to the final consummation, the rewarding of the saints, the establishment of the universal and everlasting kingdom, etc., etc., there is no hint that any part of God's people will be brought from any intermediate state of consciousness; but it is always their resurrection, their being raised from the dead. The fact is not only significant, it cannot be reasonably accounted for on the assumption that souls exist somewhere in a state of consciousness between death and resurrection.

No unprejudiced reader of the Bible can well fail to see that while special judgments are sometimes denounced against enemies of the Lord, death, the penalty of sin, is the general and final punishment inflicted upon all sinners: and if that death is irrevocable, as is the case with those who die in impenitence, then the punishment is everlasting, unending. Numerous strenuous efforts have been made to overcome the force of this simple truth, but they have alike utterly failed. It presents an insurmountable bulwark. The punishment is deprivation of life, and if the life is never restored the punishment is eternal.

One of the fallacies by which many of our friends on the other side of the question are misled consists in assuming that death is no longer punishment when consciousness has ceased. It is true that punishment by the infliction of a corrective penalty, should, to be effective, be attended with consciousness, but not so with punishment intended to be strictly exemplary. For instance, if a man should be, for some crime, condemned, as an exemplary punishment, to deprivation of life, the punishment would commence when life was extinct (the process of deprivation being only the means of infliction, and hence no part of the punishment proper), and will continue so long as death continues; and nobody would be so absurd as to say there was no punishment inflicted because the man was not conscious of the fact of his death.

Or, again: Suppose a man were, for some offence, condemned to be punished by deprivation of his liberty for sixty days, for instance, and on the day of his incarceration he should, by reason of some physical derangement, become totally unconscious, and should remain so for fifty-nine days: could any one in authority be found to decide, at the expiration of sixty days, that the man had not received the prescribed punishment because he was unconscious nearly the whole period? Of course there could not. If men assert that there can be no torment in the absence of consciousness, they say truly; but to assert that eternal death is not eternal punishment because there is no consciousness of it is to affirm what a dispassionate view of the case will, we think, show to be a manifest absurdity.

The language of the text plainly indicates what the states of the two classes spoken of will be. The two states are opposites, and as the righteous go into life eternal, the everlasting punishment to which the wicked are consigned must be eternal death. This may justly be considered conclusive, especially as we have shown that "life" means life and not happiness, as is so persistently and unreasonably urged.

But there are other considerations bearing directly on this subject; facts connected with the Scripture use of everlasting, eternal, and like terms. They sometimes express the idea not of unending cause, but of unending effect. This is so well set forth in the following letter, dated, London, Sept. 6, 1864, that we give it entire, and thus close our remarks on this point:

"TO THE MEMBERS OF THE AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.

"Dear Fellow Laborers: As a knowledge of the sense in which the words Eternal and Everlasting are used in Holy Scripture is essential to a comprehension of Divine Revelation, and as much difference of opinion is now expressed respecting the sense in which these words are there used, I purpose submitting to your consideration a few observations upon it.

"These words often in Holy Scripture have relation, only, to the duration of what has been effected, and not at all to the duration of what has been the cause of such effect—and this even in the places where there is mention only of the duration of such cause.

"Thus where it is stated in St. Jude that the Sodomites 'are set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire:' the fire of the Sodomites, if they were annihilated by it, was, as to them, eternal; they never did, or never will behold it, not continuing to exist; and the example of its having been to them productive of such an effect, is the same as to us; but the example of its being such as to its own duration, has no existence to any one to whom this Scripture is addressed, although what is stated specified alone the duration of the fire, which is alone the cause of what has been effected. Thus the qualification eternal does not here relate to the duration of the cause, but to the duration of its effect.

"Hence it is quite consistent with the language of Holy Scripture that in the statement in St. Mark of, 'The worm that never dies, and the fire that is never quenched,' the dying and the quenching does not relate to the duration of the existence of either the worm or the fire, but to the duration of their effect on the party affected by them. To him that is annihilated by them, their existence, in the language of Holy Scripture, is eternal or everlasting, even though his cognizance of that existence was confined to a few hours, minutes, or even seconds.

"But the sense of everlasting and eternal can never be decided until the facts revealed respecting man's nature be first determined. Does Holy Scripture reveal that man, under all circumstances, is an immortal existence, or that he is capable of annihilation? We read, John iii. 16, that 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him would not perish, but have everlasting life." Perish is here used to express a state opposite to ever-living, that is, not forever living, or, being annihilated; and it is never used in any other sense. God then, gave his Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not be annihilated.

"Thus Holy Scripture reveals, That man is capable of annihilation: and yet it is true to state respecting him, that his worm never dies; that the fire of his punishment is never quenched; and that both his punishment and his joy are eternal and everlasting.

"In Holy Scripture language no joy can be designated eternal, of which in itself, or in its effects, man does not eternally partake.

"I remain, Dear Fellow Laborers, ever truly yours,

"Herman Heinfetter."

Our Camp-Ground.

Dear Brn. and Sisters: I want to say a few words about our Camp-ground and the anticipated meeting. The ground is situated in a delightful grove about one and one-half mile from the depot in Springfield, and about a quarter of a mile from the old camp-ground. The trees are large and tall, affording beautiful shade. We have trimmed up the trees from twenty to thirty feet, thus letting in an abundance of light, while the sun is mainly excluded. From the stand up the central avenue, along which the seats are situated, the land rises somewhat, thus putting the speaker in full view of the audience, and vice versa.

On the whole, I think it is one of the most delightful spots for a camp-meeting that I have ever seen. A plenty of good water, with every other convenience to be had on any camp-ground; and if any of the brn. and sisters wish to spend a few weeks in the locality, they will find this a most delightful spot. After the 10th of July there will be some on the ground until the meeting closes.

We propose to furnish tents, size 12 by 15, to all who wish, for five dollars during the meeting, if they will notify me soon at Springfield. Direct your letters to J. C. Day, Springfield, Mass. If any, having tents, desire frames, and will send me the size of the tent, I will see that they are erected as cheaply as they can be by themselves. Those having large tents will please forward the dimensions to me, so that I may select their location.

Will Br. Bishop please forward me the dimensions of the life tent? Finally, brethren, all letters on business relating to the ground should be directed to me at Springfield.

Beloved brn. and sisters, this is the first meeting exclusively our own, where we shall have perfect liberty to present the crowning truth of revelation, no life in the future for any of Adam's posterity, except by a connection with Christ, the only name given under heaven whereby we can have life in the future. I hope the scattered brn. and sisters will make an effort to come up to the feast. And as the field seems white, ready to harvest, I pray that the Lord of the harvest may come up with you and prepare you to labor in earnest for the good of others. I hope self may be laid aside, and that we may come up together in the strength of God, and labor together for the good of perishing men; and if we do this God will crown our efforts with success.

I pray and expect we shall have one of the very best meetings of the kind which has been held upon this continent for a long time; and it seems to me that I can hear my brn. say, amen! Even so let it be. If all feel thus, we cannot fail to realize the blessing we desire.

We would say to our preaching brn. we don't want you to come here to serve tables, but to break to us, the bread of life. We want you to come here to preach the gospel of Christ in demonstration, and with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven; to labor together with God on the stand, and in the prayer-meeting. While one is trying to preach the word we want the others to stay up his hands; all take hold of the work together like men of God, ambassadors for Christ, beseeching men to be reconciled to God. Dear brn. it is time for the camp to move forward and pitch on higher ground. I am glad to find that very many of the brn. are beginning to feel the necessity of walking so close with God, that they will be glorified in all they do. My dear brn. let our united, fervent prayer go up before God that He may come up with us to this feast, and crown our effort with success.

J. C. DAY.

FARE TO CAMP-MEETING.

BR. STORRS: Will you please say, through the next week's paper, that arrangements have been made with the Conn. River R. R., and Hartford & New Haven R. R., for a reduction of one-half fare and with the Boston and Albany R. R., for one-third from Aug. 10 to Aug. 30, inclusive.

T. R. WEAVER, Sec. C. M. Com.

FROM ELD. H. ROCKWELL.

TO ALL THE LOVERS OF LIFE, scattered abroad: we send greeting. All hail the Holy One. Soon he comes to reign on the throne of his father David forever, even forever and ever. Even so, come Lord Jesus, and come quickly. Amen.

Cheer up ye weary ones. When ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. What things? We look at the context of Luke xxi. 31, and we hear Jesus. "And he spake to them a parable: Behold the fig-tree, and all the trees; when they now shoot forth, ye see and know of yourselves that summer is now nigh at hand." Why is the attention of the church called to this parable just at this time? Is it not quite possible that while the cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, has rested over the camp of the lovers of Life only in Christ; that as we have in the long forbearing goodness of God, been so highly favored, that all our doubts as to the correctness of this grand truth have subsided; and we have tasted the sweet waters of eternal life one step, at least, nearer the fountain head. And is there not danger of becoming weary in well doing? May not the blight of inactivity, or the full drought of blessedness, in not having a hope of a resurrection from the dead, tend to decrease our diligence in searching the Scriptures? Do we think, as some others, that we have got all there is in God's blessed Bible, and that we can learn no more?

O brethren and sisters, let us humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, and we shall be exalted in due time. Remember the crown is under the cross. The consummation of our hope is at the fountain head. Let us watch, with all diligence, that no man take our crown. Let us keep our garments, that we be not found naked and they see our shame. Let us ever remember that our opinions of truth cannot save us, nor those with whom we are conversant: but if saved, at last, it will be by grace, in humble faith, diligent obedience, and loving trust in a risen Saviour.

Please let one, who wishing to know all the truth relating to salvation, ask, Will there be any more sin after the closing of the present dispensation? The cause of this question is, that my mind is unsettled on two points; first, I have been led to think that there would not be any probation beyond the present age. Second, if there is not, then how can God's oath and promise be fulfilled to Abraham? For I cannot see that it has ever been fulfilled in the past. Again, as Adam lost his probation by sin, and his children inheriting his dying nature by natural generation, they would have all died without hope had not the promised seed been given. So in this great love of God, in the gift of his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life, we see probation brought to light, with the conditions made fully and understandingly known in this act of mercy; so that the children may obey and live, by being in Christ, by having the indwelling of his Spirit, so becoming regenerated by the Spirit, begotten of the Father, renewed in the spirit of our minds, that whereby we are in Christ, so that we are new creatures? 2 Peter i. 4: "Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust." Here, then, is an open door into the way of life. Again: after the Jewish dispensation had passed away, was there no probation for us? O yes. But what shuts probation's door to us? Disobedience and unbelief; and this constitutes us wicked and unworthy of eternal life. But with the Scriptures, "How can they believe him of whom they have not heard?" Will those be debarred salvation if they have never heard of this salvation? They should not be condemned for unbelief or disobedience; and there seems to be little doubt that many of the line of Abraham's seed lived and died without ever having heard the gospel proclaimed. Will they ever have a resurrection to life in the future?

If the numerous readers of the HERALD OF LIFE, or any one in the world that feels interested in the subject of Bible truth, will be kind enough to inform me, they will confer a great favor, and relieve an anxious mind. Whether the questions above are answered in the affirmative or negative, is it necessary for me to be confirmed in the belief of it, either positive or negative, to be saved? O I long to understand all truth needful to salvation. I have greatly desired to get Br. Storrs' pamphlet on this subject; but for the want thereof, I must wait, and while I wait, I will search the word. O may the Spirit of Jesus teach me as never man taught.

And now, may the blessing of God, our heavenly Father, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the sweet fellowship and communion of the Holy Spirit, keep and strengthen you and all connected with you in fulfilling your arduous labor of love, and bring you with your fellow-laborers and all the lovers of Jesus into the one fold, with the one shepherd, where we hope soon to cease from our labors, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest. Rest, sweet word; O how I long for thee.

From your weary and worn pilgrim brother.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., July 6, 1871.

FROM T. R. LAWRENCE.

BR. STORRS: Please send me two copies of "God's Promise to Abraham," at your earliest convenience. I am the only minister in this section of the country that entertains and preaches the Life views of the Scriptures, and I have to combat the preconceived prejudices of many of the Brethren, and especially those of the ministry; but there are many of the brethren who are beginning to think favorably of the "new doctrine," as they call it, and some have laid aside their old notions. I am in debt to you one dollar for subscription to your valuable paper, the HERALD OF LIFE, for the balance of this year, which I shall send you before long. My health has been so delicate that I have not been able to make the money to spare as yet; but I will send it before very long. Do not fail to send me the pamphlets referred to; for I shall need them before long, as I expect to have to combat the notions of some of those ministers who preach the "sky" kingdom views. The clouds of prejudice are gathering around me, and I stand here alone, knowing of no minister anywhere in this State that holds to the views of the Scriptures as I do. But by the help of God I have been able thus far to stem the current, and hope, by the same aid, to finally carry the banner of the great LIFE-GIVER, (Christ) in triumph over broken prejudices and false notions.

Your Bro. in Christ.

COLUMBIA, N. C., June 29, 1871.

Note by the Editor.

BR. LAWRENCE will please consider his paper paid for; and we shall be happy to furnish him with any of our "Campaign Documents," gratis, which he can use profitably. In the State of North Carolina, JAMES F. LEE, M. D., of Monroe, Union Co., has for many years been promulgating the Life views by preaching and tracts. We hope Br. Lawrence may be able to put himself in communication with him.

FROM JOHANNAN ROBERT.

BR. STORRS: Having left my former field of action, in Owen's Valley, Cal., in March last, for my native home, (Louisiana) I have, through the whirr of excitement in traveling on the steam-horse, the variegated scenery, and the meeting with friends and relatives after a separation of twenty-two years, neglected writing and forwarding my subscription for the HERALD. I have missed its kind teaching to the brethren, and its gentle admonitions to the thoughtless.

While working for the cause of our Lord, in California, I had many rebuffs; and there was some unkind feelings from those that should have had nothing but love abounding in their hearts. The seed has been planted. Who will water? It is God that must give the increase. Now finding myself located for the present in Texas, and feeling that there is work to do in our Master's cause, I feel to look forward hopefully, believing that there is some rich soil ready and willing to receive the seed of life. I feel ready and willing to sow it broadcast throughout this portion of the State, hoping that God will raise up His instruments all over the State, and our land, to scatter the good seed that it may bring forth fruit unto life everlasting. His promises are precious to every Christian's heart. May His kingdom come, His will be done on earth as it is in heaven.

Yours, looking for the promises.

CROCKET, TEXAS, July 3, 1871.

FROM ELD. J. LEWIS.

BR. STORRS: I write to let you and all the little flock know that I am under the necessity (not choice) to return home once more, by reason of poor health, together with pecuniary affairs. But we hope, through the tender mercies of our covenant-keeping God, to return soon to our field of labor, for we are gaining ground. Opposition is fast dying out. They find they cannot support the old blasphemous doctrine of the soul's inherent immortality. Knock that false prop from under them and down goes the whole structure together. Amen.

Br. Walter is with us, preaching with good effect. We hope he will stay with the people whilst we are absent; for it requires constant effort. May the Lord send more laborers this way, is the prayer of your unworthy servant. If any wish to share our labors they can have their wish by helping us on our way. Our post-office address will be, GRAFTON, Jersey Co., Ill.

July 10, 1871.

FROM GEO. W. CURL.

BR. STORRS: The interest in religion here is very low. We have not had preaching of any kind for many months. I have seen articles in the HERALD on prophecy and the signs of the times. I am glad to say, I have left definite time setting since '43. I could not see any thing in the Scriptures to warrant it. The articles, in the HERALD, on time made the paper useless to those I lent it to. They would condemn the advent doctrine as unsound on that account.

I have not heard a sermon on the coming of Christ since I heard you in Second street, Philadelphia, in the winter of 1849. I have not seen one that believes in the advent doctrine. I have been watching the Mother of harlots and the Beast that carried her, since I dropped time. I am satisfied it will not be long before our Saviour will set up his kingdom. My prayer is, Come dear Saviour.

Yours, in love.

ROCKLIN, CAL., June, 1871.

FROM LIBERTY WETHERBEE.

I WOULD here give the result of our meeting in Hampden on June 18, to consider about a Camp-meeting this fall. We made choice of a committee as follows:

Liberty Wetherbee, Bangor; Daniel Ireland, Exeter; Charles Philips, Hermon; Auston Pomroy, Hampden; Otis Smith, Orrington; Dennis D. Smith, Bradly; William Patten, Corrinna.

So there will be a Camp-meeting in September in the vicinity of Bangor. Particulars hereafter.

Per order of Committee.

BANGOR, ME., June 24, 1871.

HADES CONNECTED WITH SIN AND ITS PUNISHMENT.

WE come to the Scriptures with the preconception that the hades state is not a benefit, but an injury to the spirit, and we will find that the entire tenor of the Scriptures, and its direct testimony, confirms the deduction of reason.

In the first place, we learn from Scripture that hades is the result of sin, and a part of its punishment for all men alike. If sin had never entered into the world, there would have been no such place or state for man as hades at all. It was when sin entered, and as a punishment for sin, that not only the grave opened its mouth to receive the body, but hades came into operation to receive his soul. Hades had just as much relation, and relation of the very same kind, to sin, as the grave has. They are connected together as different parts of the judgment which fell upon man for transgression. And this observation, we readily see, affects the entire human family, without the smallest reference to any distinctions of good or evil that might at any subsequent period distinguish one man from another. It is part of the punishment inflicted, not for sins committed by Adam or his posterity after his fall, but for that first apostacy and sin of his which brought death upon him and all his descendants. Hades, therefore, according to this its scriptural view, affects all men equally, and all men disadvantageously.

And now we see at a single glance that the scriptural view of hades differs directly and positively from the Platonic notion of it. The separation of soul and body was, according to Plato, to the good man a blessing of the highest kind. It freed him from bondage, and introduced the spirit to a glorious and unending liberty. According to Scripture, it is not a blessing to any man; it is in itself no more a blessing to the good man than it is to the wicked man. It is to both in itself equally a punishment. Sin brought it upon both—not the sins of either good or bad men, but the sin of that first man from whom both are equally descended. It is a common inheritance handed down impartially to all the generations of the world, and is not in itself a blessing, but the very reverse.

This view of hades as the result of Adam's sin, and therefore as a punishment and loss to good as much as to the evil, is abundantly confirmed by the view which good men, some of them inspired when they spoke, have taken of the hades state. If the result of Adam's sin to them was the death of the body, while the spirit went at once to a place where it enjoyed happiness, and that, as is generally held, greater than any happiness that here the good man had ever enjoyed, then we should expect that while they would regard the grave as dark and loathsome, they would regard hades as bright and joyous. The grave and hades would, on this supposition, be opposites. There would not be a greater difference between the light and the dark in one of Rembrandt's paintings, than between the grave and hades as they were pictured by the righteous. One all dark, the other all light: one all gloomy, the other all joyous: one to be shunned, the other to be longed for. But is this the case? No.

On the contrary, we find that the grave and hades are perpetually connected together, and both described in so similar a way, and both so bound up together, that many deep students of Scripture suppose hades to be but another name for the grave. We will here note it as a proof that hades is regarded throughout Scripture in a gloomy point of view. If it were there pictured in the bright light which is so often thrown upon it, it would be as impossible to identify hades and the grave as it would be to identify the grave with heaven. The mere fact that honest men, deeply read in Scripture, often rise from the examination of it under the persuasion that there is no distinction whatever between the grave and hades, leads us at least to the conclusion that the general scriptural representation of the latter is sad and gloomy.

A hasty reference to the view which good men have taken of hades, will show us the correctness of our general view. Thus, David, looking on to the period when he as his fathers had done should enter on the hades state, says, "But God will redeem my soul from the power of hades: for he shall receive me." Hezekiah speaks yet in sadder voice when he praised God for deliverance from hades, "for hades cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee: they that go down into hades cannot hope for thy truth." Christ himself could not look forward to the state of hades with any joy or hope, except that he felt the certainty that God would save him from it, "therefore did my heart rejoice, and my tongue was glad; moreover also my flesh shall rest in hope: because thou wilt not leave my soul in hades, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption."—Psa. xlix. 15; Isa. xxxviii. 18; Acts ii. 27. The general tenor of Scripture is in accordance with these texts. Now their general teaching is very plain. Hades is associated in them with the grave as a part of the primitive curse from which, as much as from the grave, God would redeem his people: as part of the curse it could not be a source of joy in itself, a place of blessedness where it would be at all desirable to continue: while God does not forget his people in hades, but on the contrary, keeps them there full in mind, it is with the purpose of bringing them forth to enjoy his presence: the old feelings of praise and hope which animated the believer in his lifetime on earth are not felt in hades.

There is then apparently no doubt but that hades is for the righteous as for the wicked a result of Adam's sin, a judgment and a punishment inflicted on both. As such, and unless some further provision was made in virtue of which a distinction was made between these two classes, hades would be to all who enter it one and the same condition. Without here specifying what that condition is, we yet assume it as indisputable that hades as the result of Adam's sin is and must be the very same condition and state to all in it. There would and could be on this idea no difference whatsoever. As the grave, one result of Adam's sin, is the same to good and evil, so would hades be. If the one class slept there, so would the other; if the one class suffered pain there, so would the other. This we say, assuming that the hades state is, while it lasts, unaltered from its original aspect as the judgment on Adam's sons for their parent's sin.

If it is objected to this that it leaves the redeemed of Christ still under a curse, whereas God has in Christ delivered them from all curse, we reply that they are still under the curse of original sin, and will remain so until the resurrection. The grave is a part of the curse. The redeemed are not delivered from this. They have the promise of deliverance, but that promise is yet to be fulfilled. And what is thus true of the grave is equally true of hades according to the testimony of St. Paul. It is not, he tells us, until the resurrection that the power of hades over the redeemed as their portion from the original transgression is removed: then, but not sooner, will the redeemed be able to say, "O death, where is thy sting? O hades, where is thy victory?"

Hades then is the receptacle of all alike on death. Good and evil go there together. Such is the testimony of Scripture with which the early fathers generally agree. Our conclusion from this partial view of it is that in so far as it relates to Adam's sin, and is its consequence and judgment, it is and must be the same to all without any distinction as to their character. Other parts of divine revelation may modify this view. They may alter its aspect either as regards the wicked or the righteous: making it more terrible to the former or happier to the latter than it would be to either viewed simply as the consequence of the first transgression. But, viewed simply as such, and without any reference to other arrangements of God, hades is the same state and condition precisely to all souls who enter there, and so long as they remain within it.—The Rainbow.

"THEM THAT LOOK FOR HIM."

"And unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."

As the weary and care-worn traveller, long exiled from his native home, desires to behold the objects of his affection, and again fold them in his embrace of love, so do the real and true disciples of the Lord Jesus long for the coming of their Saviour, that they may behold him in his beauty, and where he is to be also. Not only in these last days when the fulfilment of prophecy concerning the coming of the blessed Redeemer seems well nigh expired, is love for his appearing roused up afresh, but upon this glorious event have the saints of all ages fixed their hope, as with a death grasp never to be released till Gabriel's trump shall summon them to banquet at the marriage feast of the Lamb.

The Psalmist David, amid all the splendors of earthly luxury with which he was surrounded, could cry out, "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God." This was the great and crowning desire of the sweet singer of Israel, to appear before God; "When shall I come and appear before God?" This was the burden of his heart, the delight of his thoughts. And for our joy and comfort the Apostle tells us that to all who possess this class of feelings, "to them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." And to the Christian, the object for which he is coming is of the greatest importance, and constitutes his highest joy. It will be "the time of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets, since the world began." It will be the ushering in of the millennial glory when Jesus "shall sit upon the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Israel forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." And when he comes he shall "change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."

This, then, in the Christian's hope, is paramount to everything else, to get rid of this vile body that has so long been a clog and hindrance to our spiritual joys. Oh! who has not mourned over it, sorrowed and sighed at its unlikeness to the Divine image, pressed down with the painful thought that it would never be otherwise while clothed in the robe of flesh. But when Jesus comes, we are not only to see him, with all the bright retinue of holy angels descending in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory, but we ourselves are to be changed and fashioned like unto the blessed Redeemer. Oh! with what joyful admiration do we look forward to that glorious period, that time of introduction when the saints who are alive at the coming of our blessed Lord and Saviour, shall be presented to those who have long slept in Jesus. Does not the very anticipation of this event so long prayed for fill the soul with holy rapture at its contemplation, determining us to break away from every thing that would hinder our meeting the Holy One with joy and not with grief?

And now that our redemption is nearer than when we first believed, it is important that we wake as out of sleep, that we may be truly ready and waiting for the approaching footsteps of our Lord and Master. These great and glorious realities are drawing upon us. The signs of the times, with the fulfilment of prophecy, clearly indicate that it is near, even at the doors. It may be we shall have to endure the warfare a little longer, engage in a few more conflicts, battling with sin and sorrow, maintaining the right against the wrong, standing up for liberty over oppression, exhibiting a life of love and holiness instead of worldly-mindedness and indifference. Then it will be said to us, "Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing; of a truth I say unto you, that he will make him ruler over all that he hath."—Selected.

A LIFE OF TRUST.

FEW Christian men there are who have not encountered trying seasons and circumstances in life, which, for the time being, have taught them the nature of trust, and led them to exercise it in a marked and high degree. They have called upon God in the day of trouble, with an humble faith which they never knew before. But if their trouble has passed away, their peculiar sense of dependence has gone with it. If day after day passes by, unmarked by any unusual trial, it is unmarked alike by any unusual conscious exercise of trust. Christians can exercise simple, unconditional trust; they can commit themselves unreservedly to God, and realize that their all is in his hands occasionally—when, as we might say, they are compelled to do it; but to live a life of trust in a living present God, is, apparently, a rare and difficult attainment.

Or, if some attain it in regard to spiritual matters, there still remains a difficulty in extending it to temporals. We may be able to realize every day, in regard to our spiritual interests, that it is not we that live, but Christ that liveth in us; we may have grace given us every day to triumph over the ancient enemy, legality, and to exclude boasting as to our salvation and growth in grace, when we can realize no similar dependence on God for our daily bread, for the support of our families, or for our success in life. Even in much of our labor for the kingdom of God, especially for the secular side of it, we may walk very much by sight, and not by faith, depending upon effort more than upon fervent prayer, losing heart or growing unduly elated by the fluctuating tokens which meet us from without, rather than strengthening ourselves in calm communion with and dependence upon our God.

Men have been discouraged from a practical carrying out of the principle of trust into their daily lives, and their efforts for the cause of Christ, from the fear of running into the opposite evils of presumption and fanaticism. To take the promises of Scripture in reference to the hearing and answering of prayer, with any great literalness, has seemed to them contrary to the dictates of common prudence and common sense. Hence there has grown up in connection with the Lord's work, all the complicated machinery of expedients for procuring the needful means, which the world employs, in carrying forward its objects. And we begin to believe that both in regard to the temporal wants of the Christian, and the means needful for carrying on the work of the Lord in the world, Christian people have espoused to a criminal degree the principles and policy of worldly wisdom. They have shrunk from an excess of pietism, and have become entangled in naturalism. The Christian world of to-day, carried away with the active spirit of the age, is in danger of trusting in work, instead of working by faith.

Nevertheless, the Church has not been without bright examples of the life of trust. They have been found in the humble and private walks of life; in unknown instances of the hopeful endurance of poverty, in which the necessary wants of the believer and his family have been supplied in answer to prayer, and in the patient, happy temper of the confirmed invalid, and the life-long sufferer, where unwavering, submissive trust, has converted their sick chambers into the banqueting house of the King, with the banner of his love spread over them, and all who drew near them, in the same spirit.—Selected.

"THE METHODIST."

THE above paper has been on our exchange list from the first issue of the HERALD OF LIFE," while the "Christian Advocate," of this city, and "Zion's Herald," of Boston, have had short fits of exchanging with us, and finally have left altogether. We do not much regret their absence since "The Methodist" has continued its visits, and is the most ably conducted of the three. It has lately come out in a "New Dress and Enlarged Size." It is edited by "GEO. R. CROOKS, D. D., and ABEL STEVENS, L.L. D.," very able men of the Methodist E. Church. The Conductors of the paper make the following generous offer:

"The Methodist" will be sent free for one month from the receipt of the name. Send your names to G. C. HALSTED, 114 Nassau St., New York."

Give it a trial. We think you will be interested in its perusal.

BETHLEHEM HOME SCHOOL.

THIS excellent and well-known institution has just passed into the charge of Rev. AMBROSE RONDTHALER, who for upwards of sixteen years has been a Professional Teacher and Principal of educational institutions in York, and at Bethlehem, Pa.

The course of study is thorough, and all students enter not only the school-room but also become part of the Principal's family. All sectarianism is banished from the school.

The Bible only is the standard of religious instruction.

For terms and particulars send for circular.

TO CORRESPONDENTS

WM. DOUGHTY.—Your paper is paid for to No. 877.

SOON!

I KNOW not if He come at eve,
Or night, or morn, or noon;
I know the breeze of twilight gray,
That fans the cheek of dying day,
Doth ever whisper—Soon!

I know not why our souls should doubt
His promise to appear,
When every flower's opening eye
Looks up into the changing sky,
And seems to murmur—Near!

I know not round His blessed feet
What peerless glories throng:
The good shall burst, in beauty's bloom;
And faith assures—Not long!

I know not if His chariot wheels
Yet near or distant are;
I only know each thunder-roll
Doth wake an echo in my soul,
That saith—Not very far!

I know not if we long must wait
The summer of His smile;
I only know that hope doth sweep
With thrilling touch my heart-strings deep,
And sings—A little while!

I know not on this glorious theme
Why lips so oft are dumb;
I only know the saddened earth
Will flush with beauty and with mirth
At sound of, "Lo, I come!"

BR. STORRS: The foregoing lines—"Soon"—I cut from "The Paris Visitor." It is so cheering to get even a ray of light from the so-called orthodox papers, of the present day, on the great view of the Saviour's personal reign, on a regenerated earth, and the resurrection of those who sleep in Christ, that I could not forbear sending them to you. But notwithstanding these great truths are so much lost sight of in these days, yet it is cheering to know that the good and the pure of the early believers rested on them with confidence and delight; and may it not be our blessed privilege to live in unceasing expectation of the happy day, when angel voices shall announce the glad sound, "Thy God reigneth."

Yours, in hope,
WILLIAM FLOYD.

TOLERANCE.

FROM G. H. BUZZELL.

BR. STORRS: I was glad to hear you say, not long since, that you had worn no shackles for thirty years.

I have been pleased to see, in any one, moral courage enough to be free from bondage, though we are few. I can say, with others, I am sorry that our HERALD is trammelled so that it cannot speak out on the promise and oath of God to Abraham. I have been interested in what I have called age to come for some years, and no doubt many others that we have not heard from.

Is it the same spirit that shuts this out of the HERALD OF LIFE, that shuts out the free discussion of the non-resurrection doctrine from the "World's Crisis?" Were not the Catholics once as free from a spirit of intolerance as we are to-day? It don't take long for us to become lords in spirit, and virtually say, We don't want this and that, and you shall not read this and that, and at the same time reflect on others who manifest a spirit of intolerance, and condemn them. Shall we condemn others in that we allow in ourselves? We may flatter ourselves that we are on higher ground than they, because we have a truth ahead of them, while at the same time we have inhaled the same spirit of intolerance. We may find ourselves shut out and in the same fold with them at last.

But some will have all the truth they can get, and stick down no stakes, for the path of the just is as a shining light, that shineth more and more to the perfect day. But some say, "This is not truth." It is easy to say that, but the thing is to prove it is not. So some say of the No life view. Some have been hasty to discard what to them was a new view, and then, afterward, have embraced it; but they have lost time. It is better to hear a matter before we judge of it. But some say, "I have investigated it." Very well: but do not others want the same chance, or shall we take the responsibility to judge for them? Is not this the way the Catholics do it?

The truth may not suffer any thing from opposition, but those who oppose it may, if they inhale a bitter spirit. If that which is not of God will come to nought of itself, we need not hive ourselves by heading it off; it is lost time. If it is truth, it will stand, and one may be found fighting against God, and then it is time lost.

We have a right to all the truth of the Bible; and let no one put up his hand to hinder the light from shining on us. But, you say, "This or that is not light." Please take down your hand. I want the right to judge for myself. Have we not enjoyed the privilege of believing, speaking and writing what we considered the truth? How then can we forbid others? My question is not so much what is truth, but shall free toleration be granted, so far as to grant others the privileges we wish to enjoy?

CONCORD, N. H. June, 1871.

MUST THE WICKED BE RAISED?

BY A. J. PAGE.

DID Adam's fall bring death upon all? It did. Did Adam pay the penalty for his own sin? He did. What was the penalty? Death. Was Adam arraigned before the Judge? He was. Did the Judge pass sentence upon him? He did. Did the Judge of all the earth do right? He did. Did Adam die? He did. Did Adam's death pay the penalty for the sins of his posterity? It did not. Has one of Adam's posterity ever died for their own sins? No. Has any one ever died for the sins of Adam's posterity? There has. Who? The Son of God. Then, has not the penalty upon Adam's posterity been paid? It has. Was Adam's posterity on probation for eternal life? They were. How were they to obtain it? By faith in the promised Son of God. Although they had faith in the promised Son of God, and that Son of God paid the penalty for their sins, are they not subject to death, and do they not die? They are and do. How then has the death of the Son of God paid the penalty for their sins? I answer—At the time the Judge of all the earth tried the transgressors in the garden, heard their testimony, found them guilty, and passed sentence upon them, he also put their posterity upon trial for life by giving them his promise, or word, of Christ, that he, Christ, should bruise the serpent's head. In the plan of this righteous Judge the death of Jesus, the Son of God, virtually took place at that time; and Adam's posterity then put upon trial for life, yet subject to death, and by having faith in this promised Son of God, and showing forth their faith in offering up the firstlings of their flocks, as an offering unto the Lord, they hid their lives with Christ in God, and had the Spirit of him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwelling in them which would raise them from the dead. So the second death, or the death of those who die without hope, without the spirit of life in them, hath no power over them, for their lives are hid with him who has the keys of death; he who is stronger than the strong man armed; and those that the Father hath given him, death cannot hold, the grave cannot consume them, the voice of the archangel and the trump of God will wake them, and they will be brought forth from their dusty beds clothed as was the Son of God in glory.

But what what of those who have not faith in the Son of God—of those whose offerings the Lord doth not respect? The second death holds them in its embrace; death shall feed upon them; the grave shall consume them; not having the Spirit of him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwelling in them, their mortal bodies, will not be quickened. Not having their lives hid with Christ in God, when the LIFE-GIVER appears, they cannot appear with him—they can never see life. Not having the spirit of adoption, "to wit," the redemption of their bodies, but go down in death without hope of life, to sleep the sleep that knows no waking. God grant that such a sleep may not be ours, but may we, should it be ours to sleep, sleep in Jesus, that when the LIFE-GIVER comes, the second death will have no power over us, and we may awake never, no, never more to sleep.

KNOWLESVILLE, N. Y.

LETTER TO A LADY SPIRITUALIST.

BY WILLIAM LUCAS.

TO MAY ST. CLAIR: I received your letter on Tuesday. I thought perhaps you did not get my last letter, and would naturally think, if you did not get an answer from me, that it would be useless for you to write again.

The next thing to write about is, your spiritualism and my materialism. Well, when I look back at my place and manner of birth, my poverty of pocket and intellect, my ignorance and the little chance I have had to be any thing else than an ignoramus, I must say to you, and those of your faith, remember what a poor unlearned thing I am. I think sometimes that my lot has been one of the hardest from early childhood. Yet O how I love this beautiful world, made by my heavenly Father. And when I look at nature as it is in the noble sturdy oak on the mountain top, and see its acorns drop, and in watching see some of these acorns spring into life and others not, I think this is materialism; but to think of it as at some future time becoming a spirit oak, having spirit acorns, I can see nothing in nature that teaches it. I know the theory of materialism is in the minority, but truth has always been slow, yet it has never been wholly blotted out. Let us compare what you call my cold materialism with your immortal-soulism or spiritualism.

I expect at some future time, if I die to be resurrected, made as God intended I should be, a true man physically and mentally, without sin, suffering, tears or death; to meet millions of my fellow-beings, all in the bloom of life, not a limb gone or displaced; all the arts and sciences of this life brought to perfection, and this earth in its Eden glory, and I free to talk and enjoy all that the Maker intended I should, with none to harm or take advantage. All this, and more, a million times more than my poor pen can begin to write; and best of all, I expect to have my intellect so improved that I shall be satisfied. Yes, glory to God.

Now for your spiritism. That wonderful thing you call spirit is the moving cause, the propelling power in mankind. Well, in early childhood it cannot propel or think; in old age it cannot manage the old machine. A little rum in a healthy person defies its powers. A little knock on the head stops all thought. A little poison causes it to go "beyond the bounds of time and space," (if you know what that is, I don't). It is powerless to get out of the way of a locomotive or bullet (or, rather to take its house out of the way). If it is endowed with such powers as you say it is, knowing more after it leaves the body than it did when in it, I do not see why it did not know enough to keep out of such a house; and after it was in, if forced in, why not shake the old house down as quick as it found out that it was a clog and a hindrance? When rum has rolled its house in the cold gutter, or gently laid it down to sleep with the pigs, why don't it jump out and run off, or mount up on a thunder cloud and play with the lightning to warm its spirit fingers? Ah, there is the trick; has it got any fingers? has it any limbs? has it any brains? has it got any thinking powers? Is it material at all? or is it a material something like gas or lightning, but without shape or form? If so, it is truly a warm affair. But how can each lump, or heap, streak, or bunch, approach its fellow and salute with half the warmth that we feel toward each other here? The good old Quaker notion, with me, goes a great ways, "Seeing is believing." And then you may throw in against my Quaker notion a Methodist notion, "Can you see a pain? and yet you know it is there:" or, "Can you see a thought? and yet you know it exists, because you see its acts."

My dear girl, you want my materialism to carry out such notions, for you cannot find a pain or a thought without an organization. I have not quoted Bible to you, for I know you would make (or try to make) a pig or a pup of it to suit your case. It is possible for you to be wrong. Your dear sister, on her last visit to us, stoutly contested the idea of the existence of a God. Yet in her last moments wrote to me, "Uncle William, pray for me."

If the spirits have so much knowledge, why is it that you cannot know all you want to know without writing? Why did not some of your spirit friends arrest Jeff. Davis when there was one hundred thousand dollars offered as a reward? "Don't want money," hey! Well, some folks don't. If spiritism is true, why don't all your folks know as much as the swine did, in the days af Christ? that is, run down into the sea, and save themselves the trouble of life, and thus quickly reap the reward of a spirit-life? Consistency is a jewel.

Let me advise you to face the storm of life as a lady of your education should. Help others to bear the burden of life, and leave the event with that Being who has created all things, and upholds all things, and I think some of the pleasures of this life will be yours, and you will reap the great and glorious reward of the righteous in God's own good time.

Yours, in friendship, love and truth.

OSSCOOWANNA LAKE, March, 1871.

LOVE IN THE FAMILY;

OR, WINNING THE HEARTS OF LITTLE FOLKS.

"Love is the little golden clasp
That bindeth up the trust;
Oh, break it not; lest all the leaves
Shall scatter and be lost."

THE heart of a child is easily won. Love begets love. Love children and they will love you. Let children feel that you care for them, that you are interested in all that interests them, that you sympathize with them in all their little sorrows, rejoice with them in all their little joys, that you are their friend, and you have the key to their hearts. Teachers, do you wish to be loved by your pupils? Love them. Children read hearts intuitively.

Smile upon a child—have you not won its heart? Does it not smile in return? Do not its eyes follow you? Does not its face sadden as you disappear, and smile when you come again? Does that smile cost you any thing?

It is sweet to have children love us. It is sweet to know that they delight to nestle upon our bosoms, and that their little arms long to clasp about our necks. It is sweet to feel the soft clinging tendrils of their honest hearts intertwining, cosily and trustingly, in among the stouter and chillier tendrils of our own. The cold selfishness of the world is in other hearts than the children's. The deception that lames our faith and saps our trust is in other bosoms than theirs. God bless the children, the rosy, laughing children, the dear, true-hearted children, the beautiful children! The world is ten times brighter for their being here.

"'Tis said that angels walk the earth—
I'm sure it must be so,
When round our path, scarce seen by us,
Such bright things come and go."

Happy children—kind, loving, affectionate, obedient—make happy parents. What blessing to parents, this side heaven, greater than a family of children, meek, mild, gentle—obedient sons and daughters, "polished after the similitude of a palace?"

Not a jar of discord, not a murmuring thought of impatience in the family circle—all is sweet, heavenly, harmonious. It is love in the morning, love at noon, love as the evening shades draw near. It is love lying down, love rising up, love going out, love coming in.

"Love through all their actions run,
And all their words are mild;
They're like the blessed virgin's Son,
That sweet and lovely child."

We have not half confidence enough in the power of love to disarm the violent and to reclaim the vicious. The fault begins in our families. Parents lose the confidence of their children, never to be regained by injustice, selfishness, and the absence of love. Love is the grand secret in domestic education. Give your children a genial, loving atmosphere in which to grow. Love precludes not decision or correction, but is prompt in the execution of both.

Deal with your children as God deals with his. Do not meet their anger with your anger, their petulance with your own, or their obstinacy with wilfulness still greater. Overcome evil with good. When God called himself a father, he chose a name which he designed to be significant of overflowing love, tender mercy, and long-continued forbearance.

Parents, "provoke not your children to wrath."

"A word, a look, has crushed to earth
Full many a budding flower,
Which, had a smile but own'd its birth,
Would bless life's darkest hour."

A heavenly countenance is the highest commendation, the most conclusive argument for the character of him who earns it. One glimpse of an angel's face would probably do more to impress us with the beauty of holiness than many an eloquent sermon an hour long. Stephen's radiant face was a powerful auxiliary to his discourse. The shining face of Moses when he came down from the mount was proof to the Israelites that he had seen the Lord.

If this is true with an audience of adults, how much more with children! Sensitive as they are, and often affected they cannot tell why or how, and gazing steadfastly as they do, with no sense of impropriety, into the face of their parent or teacher, it is almost unavoidable that his image should be reproduced in them.

"Then deem it not an idle thing
A pleasant word to speak;
The face you wear, the thoughts you bring,
A heart may heal or break."

What will not love do? Who can describe its powerful, subduing influences? Who ever accomplished any thing by reproaches, or violence, or harsh measures? You gratify a private and dark passion in your own heart, and arouse a darker one in another bosom. Oh, try the mighty efficacy of love. One smile of genuine sympathy is worth all your purse to the beggar. "Beloved, let us love one another; for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God."—1 John iii. 7.

Parents, commend your little ones whenever they do right, perform that which is good and praiseworthy. Whenever they are quick to obey cheerfully, express your grateful approbation; tell them how pleased you are at any improvement in well-doing. Your child has been very pleasing and obedient through the day. Just before putting him to sleep for the night, you take his hand and say: "My son, you have been very good to-day. It makes me very happy to see you so kind and obedient. God loves children who are dutiful to their parents, and he promises to make them happy."

This approbation from his mother is to him a great reward. And when, with a more than ordinarily affectionate tone, you say, "Good-night, my dear son," he leaves the room with his little eyes full of feeling. And when he closes his eyes for sleep he is happy, and resolves that he will always try to do his duty.

"Good-night is but a little word,
Yet beautiful though brief,
And falls upon the gentle heart
Like dew upon the leaf."

ELD. WM. P. SHOCKEY.

BR. STORRS: I wish you to publish the minutes of our Conference in May.

Pursuant to notice, met at "Bethel School House," near Aspinwall, Neb. Present, six from St. Deroines; five from Severance, Kansas; two from Dawson's Mill, Neb.; one from Hamburg, Iowa. All were much disappointed because Br. W. J. Orem could not attend, and teach the word, on account of the severe sickness of his wife; and Brs. F. Parker and O. A. Lesh, from Pawnee, who could not come because of notice of the meeting coming too late.

At candle lighting we had a lovely exhortation session, in which nearly all the brethren partook. On first day, 9 o'clock, A. M., we had an interesting conversation on prayer. There seemed to be a difference, but mostly in appearance only. It was held by some, that as prayers were in many instances miraculously attended to heal the sick, we could not pray at all. It was responded that, on the same principle as faith was attended by miracles, and they do not now attend, so there can be no faith. But there was rather a general agreement that prayer and faith can both be exercised consistently, though no miracles attend now; we can and ought to pray for our sick ones, as did our Lord in his case, "May this cup pass . . . but not my will but thine be done." That, as we and he can but desire to escape affliction, and there is no means of knowing the result of the sickness, therefore we can and ought to pray. Our heart's desire and prayer to God is, that they may be saved. In doing so, we have the joy of obeying the Lord, and the privilege of laying the unknown issues before our Father in heaven.

On the question of spending money for sounding out the word, all agreed it was duty; but some were opposed to pledging a certain amount to form a basis of confidence to act on. But most were in favor of it. It was resolved, that Br. J. P. Bitner act as corresponding agent to receive what any brother, sister or friend will pledge to sustain the preaching of the word.

2. That it is the sense of this meeting to ask in love all our brethren and sisters to make up as much of their earnings as each is able to pay for preaching, and report to Br. J. P. Bitner, Severance, Kansas.

Singing, "In the midst of temptation," we took the parting hand.

THE RING-DOVE.

THE Ring-Dove is a beautiful bird; its colors of purple, red and grey are delicately shaded, and it has a kind of collar of pure white, reaching nearly all round its neck.

It is not found in this country, but it is abundant in Europe and in the Holy Land. Persons living in the country there often hear its pleasant cooing. It is not a song, nor a call, but something peculiar to itself, coming from the depths of the wood; and unless disturbed it will go on for an hour, waiting a little while between, and then beginning again. You may try to get a sight of it, but it is such a shy bird that it is very seldom seen, only heard. Like other notes of birds, it tells you different things at different times; when you hear it on a bright March morning, it makes you feel quite sure the spring is come; on a hot summer day it seems to cool you to listen to it, like the gushing of a stream; and then later in the year it sounds so sweet and soothing, it seems to blend with the calm repose of the autumn of the year.

The pair are believed to remain united for life, and they are very attentive and affectionate to each other. They begin to build their nest very early in the year; it is soon done, for it is a very simple affair—a few sticks laid across each other on some high tree, and on these the two white eggs are laid. They are never more than two, and the young pair are always male and female. Ring-Doves live on grain and seeds, and in the autumn they fly about in flocks in search of this food. This is the best time to get a sight of them, when the wheat is gathered in, and the stubble fields are left bare and solitary. Yet not solitary, for you may see hundreds of these birds busily gleaning the scattered remains of the feast. If you are very careful you may get near enough to have a good look before they take the alarm, and are off into the woods again.

There are several different kinds of doves, and all of them are interesting birds, not only from their beauty, but for their gentleness.—The Children's Friend.

A CHILD'S FAITH.

"MOTHER, I am tired of work, and tired of play, even the old cat has left me and curled herself down at thy feet to rest," said little Nan as her mother sat by the stand reading. "Please dear mother lay thy book aside, and tell me a pretty story."

"And what shall I tell my little Annie? O yes; now I know, I will tell thee of a dear little boy named Willie, whom I remember reading about."

"Do, do, mamma, thee always can tell such pretty stories; what about little Willie, mamma?"

"Well, Willie was a good boy; but his father was dead, and his mother very poor. O his poor mother was so sad to think she had not even a crust of bread for her son, whom she so dearly loved. One day his mother went out to try to procure something for herself and child to eat. But Willie became so hungry, he all at once thought he would pray to his heavenly Father to send him some bread; he was all alone, but fell upon his knees and prayed, 'O heavenly Father, please send us one crust.' Just then he heard a rap at the door. 'Come in,' said Willie. A lady entered with a basket on her arm, and a nice loaf of bread in it. She said, 'See here, Willie, I was just returning home from market and heard your prayer. And now you see God answers the prayers of good little boys and girls; you had faith, my little fellow, and here is the bread your Father in heaven has sent you.'"—Selected.

THE HEART'S EASE.

THERE is a good fable told about a king's garden, in which, all at once, the trees and flowers began to wither away—the oak, because it could not yield any fair flowers; the rose-bush, because it could bear no fruit; the vine, because it had to cling to the wall, and could cast no cool shadow.

"I am no use in the world," said the oak.

"I might as well die," said the rose-bush.

"What good can I do?" murmured the vine.

Then the king saw a little heart's ease, which all the time held up its little cheerful face, while the rest were sad.

And the king said, "What makes you so bright and blooming when all the rest are fading?"

"I thought," said the little heart's ease, "you wanted me here, because you planted me; and so I thought I would try and be the best little heart's ease that could be."—Selected.

CHILDREN, cleanse your hearts of every impure thought. Thus, only can Love and Goodness blossom into the full, beautiful flowers, fit to be transplanted in the gardens of Heaven.

A BIBLE VIEW OF HELL:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus; Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. Address all orders to WM. H. SPENCER, (Lock-box 507), Rochester, N. Y.

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition: Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE GREAT SPEECH IN THE VATICAN.

TRANSLATED BY REV. LEONARD W. BACON, BALTIMORE.

THE boldest and most powerful condensed argument extant against the pretensions of popery is a speech pronounced by a Roman Catholic bishop in the Roman Council. The copy in my possession is one published in the Italian language by the association which issues in Florence the journal entitled, "Papal Rome Unveiled to the people." It ought to be printed for general distribution here, and would be, if we had an effective society for Protestant work. A sixteen-page tract would contain it all.

The great speech is published without name, but my copy, which has just reached me from Rome, bears on its title-page, in the handwriting of one of the most eminent Catholics in that city, the note: "This speech is by Mgr. Strossmayer, Bishop of Bosnia in Croatia."

It is difficult to abridge what is already a marvel of condensed force; but I will do my best.

After a few calm, weighty words of introduction, the Bishop says that under a grave sense of his responsibility to God, he has studiously applied himself to the examination of the Holy Scriptures on the question whether the holy pontiff who presides in the Council is really the successor of St. Peter, the vicar of Jesus Christ, and the infallible teacher of the church. The effect of this inquiry has been startling:—

I open, then, these sacred pages. . . . But what! shall I dare to tell it? I find in them nothing to justify, however remotely, the ultramontane view. Nay more! to my utter astonishment, I find nothing said about a pope, successor of St. Peter, and vicar of Jesus Christ, any more than about a successor of Mohammed.

Yes, Archbishop Manning, you will say that I blaspheme; and you, Bishop Pie, that I am out of my senses. No, no, my lord bishops! I am not blaspheming; I am not beside myself! But having just risen from the reading of the New Testament from beginning to end, I declare to you before God, lifting my hand toward yonder great crucifix, that I find in its pages no trace of the papacy as it now exists.

Do not refuse to listen to me, venerable brethren! Do not by your murmurs and interruptions, justify those who declare, with Father Hyacinthe, that this Council is not free, but that our votes are imposed upon us in advance. If this were so, this august assembly, toward which the eyes of the whole world are turned, would fall into the most shameful contempt. If we would be great, we must be free.

I thank his grace, Bishop Dupanloup, for that nod of approval! It gives me courage to go on.

Reading, then, the Scriptures, with such attention as the Lord has made me capable of, I have not found in them a single chapter, a single verse, in which Jesus Christ commits to St. Peter, lordship over the apostles, his fellow laborers.

If Simon, son of Jonas, had been appointed to be what we understand his holiness, Pius IX, to be in our time, it is astonishing that Christ did not say to the apostles: "When I am ascended up to my Father, ye shall obey Simon Peter as ye have obeyed me. I appoint him my vicar upon earth."

Not only is Christ silent on this point, but he has so little thought of giving the church a chief, that when he is promising thrones to his apostles, to judge the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt. xix. 28), he promises twelve of them—one apiece—without saying that one is to be higher than the rest, and is to belong to Peter. Surely if he had wished this to be so, he would have said so. What must we infer from his silence? Logic tells us: Christ did not intend to make Peter chief of the apostolic college.

When Christ sent forth the apostles to the conquest of the world, he gave to all alike the power of binding and loosing; to all, the promise of the Holy Ghost. Let me repeat it; if he had meant to make Peter his vicar, he would have appointed him commander-in-chief of his spiritual army.

Christ, says the Scripture, forbade Peter and his colleagues to have rule and lordship and power over believers like the princes of the Gentiles.—Luke xxii. 25. If Peter had been made pope, Jesus would not have spoken thus, for, according to our traditions, the papacy holds in its hands two swords, the symbols of spiritual and temporal power.

One fact has profoundly impressed me. When I observed it, I said to myself: If Peter had been pope, would his colleagues have suffered themselves to send him with St. John to Samaria to preach the gospel of the Son of God?—Acts viii. 14.

What would you think, venerable brethren, if, at this moment, we were to permit ourselves to depute his holiness, Pius IX, and his eminence, Monsignor Plantier, to betake themselves to the Patriarch of Constantinople, and adjure him to put an end to the Eastern schism?

But here is another fact, of greater importance still. An ecumenical council was assembled at Jerusalem to decide on questions on which believers were divided. Who would have convoked this council, if St. Peter had been pope? St. Peter. Who would have presided over it? St. Peter or his legates. Who would have formulated and promulgated the canons of it? St. Peter. Well, now, nothing of the kind took place. The apostle was present at the council, like all his colleagues. But it was not he who framed its conclusions, but St. James; and when the decrees of it were promulgated, this was done in the name of "the apostles, the elders and the brethren."—Acts 15. Is this the way we manage things in our church?

The deeper I go, my venerable brethren, in my examination, the more I am convinced that in the Holy Scriptures there is no appearance of the primacy of the son of Jonas.

While we teach that the church is built on St. Peter, St. Paul, whose authority cannot be questioned, tells us in his epistle to the Ephesians (ii. 20) that it is "built upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone." The same apostle is so far from believing in the supremacy of Peter, that he openly rebukes those who say: "I am of Paul and I of Apollos" (1 Cor. i. 12) in the same terms as those who would say: "I am of Peter." If, then, the latter apostle was vicar of Jesus Christ, St. Paul would have taken good care not to censure so violently those who held to his colleague.

The same apostle Paul, enumerating the offices of the church, mentions apostles, prophets, evangelists, teachers, pastors. Is it credible, venerable brethren, that St. Paul, the great teacher of the Gentiles, would have left out the greatest of all the offices—the papacy—if the papacy had been founded by divine institution? It seems to me that this omission would have been no more possible than a history of this Council that should make no mention whatever of his holiness, Pius IX. [Voices in the Assembly: Silence, heretic! silence!]

Keep calm, venerable brethren. I have not got through yet. By hindering me from going on, you will show the world that you are in the wrong, and that you have gagged the humblest member of this body.

I proceed: The apostle Paul in not one of his letters addressed to the various churches, makes any mention of the primacy of Peter. If this primacy had existed, if, in short, the church had had a supreme head, infallible in teaching, would the great teacher of the Gentiles have omitted all mention of it? Nay! He would have written a long epistle on this important, this vital subject. When, therefore, he is rearing the edifice of Christian doctrine, is it possible that he leaves out the foundation and the key-stone? Now, unless the apostolic church is to be reckoned heretical, which we neither wish nor dare to say, we are constrained to acknowledge that the church has never been more fair, more pure, nor more holy, than in the days when it had no pope. [Voices: It is false! it is false!]

Monsignor de Laval cannot contradict this; for if any of you, venerable brethren, should dare to think that the church which at this day has a pope for its head is stronger in the faith, or purer in morals, than the apostolic church, he must say it openly in the face of the world; for this room is the centre from which our words fly from pole to pole.

I proceed: not in the writings of St. Paul, nor in those of St. John or St. James, have I found any trace or germ of the papal power. St. Luke, the historian of the missionary labors of the apostles, is silent on this vital point. The silence of these holy men, whose writings are a part of the canons of the inspired Scriptures, is as inexplicable, if Peter had been pope, as that of Thiers would have been, if he had omitted the title of emperor in the history of Napoleon Bonaparte.

I see before me a member of this body, who says, pointing at me with his finger, "He is a schismatic bishop who has got amongst us under false pretenses."

No, no! my venerable brethren, I did not come into this august assembly like a thief by the window. I came by the door just as regularly as yourselves. It is my right as a bishop, as it is my duty as a Christian, to speak and declare what I know to be true.

But the thing which astounds me beyond all expression is the silence of Peter himself. If he had been what we say—the vicar of Christ upon earth—he must have known it. If he knew it, how does it happen that he never once—not one solitary time—acted as pope? He might have done it on the day of Pentecost, when he pronounced his first discourse; but he did not. He might have done it at the council of Jerusalem; but he did not. He might have done it at Antioch; but he did not. He might have done it in his two epistles to the churches; but he did not. Imagine such a pope as this, O my venerable brethren!

If then, we would maintain that Peter was pope, it necessarily follows that we must maintain that he was not aware of it at the time. I put it to any man with a head to think and a mind to reflect, whether these two suppositions are credible.

To sum up, then: During the lifetime of the apostles, the church never thought of the possibility of a pope. To maintain the contrary, it would be necessary to put the Holy Scriptures into the fire, or out of the mind.

But I hear from all sides the questions, "Was not St. Peter at Rome? Was he not crucified here head downward? The chair from which he taught, the altar at which he said mass—are they not all in this Eternal City?"

Venerable brethren, the sojourn of St. Peter at Rome has no other proof than tradition. But even if he was bishop of Rome, what argument can be drawn from his episcopate here to prove his supremacy? A scholar of the highest rank, Scaliger, has not hesitated to say that the episcopate and sojourn of St. Peter at Rome must be classed among ridiculous legends. [Repeated cries: "Silence him! silence him! Down with him from the platform!"]

Venerable brethren, I am ready to be silent; but is it not more becoming to such a body as this to prove all things, as the apostle enjoins, and believe that which is good?

In the midst of such a storm of disapprobation, the bishop reached the close of his main Scriptural argument. The interruptions he encountered, and the retorts he made upon the overwhelming majority that roared against him, are not the least interesting and instructive things about the speech. But nothing could check the torrent of voluble Latin, in the fluent use of which, no man in all the Council could compare with Strossmayer. The historical argument which followed, was not less notable than the beginning.—Congregationalist.

A WORD FOR OUR TIMES.

"And when they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep and that mutter; should not a people seek unto their God? for the living to the dead? To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them."—Isa. viii. 19, 20.

THIS admonition is found in a prophecy that pertains to the gospel dispensation. For the preceding verse, which reads, "Behold I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs and for wonders in Israel from the Lord of hosts that dwelleth in Mount Zion," is quoted in Heb. ii. 13, and applied to Christ and the New Testament Church. Thus we read, verses 11–14: "For both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one; for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren, saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee. And again, I will put my trust in him. And again, Behold I and the children which God hath given me. Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil."

And it is worthy of notice, that in verse 16, which reads, "Bind up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples," the term disciples is used, which is the common designation in the New Testament of a follower of Jesus, though it is not found elsewhere in the Old Testament. The force of this expression, as pointing us to New Testament times, is seen in the fact that He who uses this term, "my disciples," is evidently our Lord Jesus Christ.

A further proof that this passage relates to the New Testament dispensation, is found in the fact that the "stone of stumbling" and the "rock of offence" of verse 14, which reads, "And he shall be for a sanctuary, but for a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence," is our divine Redeemer. For thus the New Testament applies this verse, which it blends in quotation with Isa. xxviii. 16, giving the language of both in one. Thus:

Rom. ix. 33: "As it is written, Behold I lay in Zion a stumbling stone and a rock of offence; and whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed."

1 Pet. ii. 7, 8: "Unto you therefore which believe he is precious; but unto them which be disobedient, the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner, and a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient; whereunto also they were appointed."

Another evidence that this prophecy of Isaiah pertains to the gospel dispensation, is found in the fact that the next verse, which says that many shall "stumble and fall and be broken," is applied to the texts last quoted, or in their connection, to those who reject Christ. Thus Paul says of those who stumble at Christ crucified (Rom. ix. 32), "They stumbled at that stumbling-stone."

It thus appears that the admonition of Isa. viii. 19, 20, belongs to the New Testament dispensation. A further study of the connection will establish the fact that it was designed especially for the last days of this dispensation, when the disciples of Christ are waiting upon the Lord and looking for him. For the prophet, who personates in this chapter sometimes the Lord and sometimes his people, says in verse 17, "I will wait upon the Lord [Douay Bible, 'for the Lord'] that hideth his face from the house of Jacob, and I will look for him." The New Testament Church was commanded not to look for that event till the Roman Antichrist should have his predicted period of exaltation. 2 Thess. ii. But when the tribulation of those days should expire, the Saviour promised that the signs of his second advent should begin to be seen, and the saints were then to look and wait for their returning Lord.

Thus we are instructed:

Matt. xxiv. 32, 33: "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh; so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors."

Luke xxi. 25–31: "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh. And he spake to them a parable: Behold the fig-tree, and all the trees; when they shoot forth, ye see and know your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."

Luke xii. 35, 36: "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh they may open unto him immediately." Zeph. iii. 8: "There fore wait ye upon me, saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey; for my determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms to pour upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce anger; for all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of my jealousy." Heb. ix. 28: "So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him, shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Isa. xxv. 9: "And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us; this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation."

The prophecy of Isa. viii. 17–22, in which the waiting position of the church is designated, has reference therefore to that period immediately preceding the advent of the Saviour. He has proved a stone of stumbling to worldly professors, whether his first or second advent be considered. And it is from this class that He hides his face.

Another clue to the time of the fulfilment of this prophecy is found in the work which it assigns the church: "Bind up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples."—Verse 16. We know that the Man of Sin was to oppose and exalt himself above all that is called God, and to think to change times and laws. Dan. vii. 25; 2 Thess. ii. And we know that the law of God and the precepts of Christ have been wickedly mangled by the great Antichristian power. This work of binding up the testimony and sealing the law among the disciples of Christ, is the very work of the third angel. This law and testimony thus restored to the people of God, is that to which they are to appeal in their final conflict with the familiar spirits. "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."—Verse 20.

We cannot doubt, therefore, that the admonition of Isa. viii. 19, 20, respecting the familiar spirits, pertains to the time in which we now live, when the unclean spirits are making preparation for the battle of the great day of God Almighty. Rev. xvi.

And when the prophet says of them that seek to familiar spirits, "They shall pass through it, hardly bestead and hungry; and it shall come to pass, that when they shall be hungry, they shall fret themselves, and curse their king and their God and look upward" (Isa. viii. 21), he fitly describes the famine predicted in the following passage: Amos viii. 11, 12, "Behold the days come, saith the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord; and they shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east, they shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord, and shall not find it."

And when Isaiah adds: "And they shall look unto the earth; and behold trouble and darkness, dimness of anguish; and they shall be driven to darkness," verse 22, he speaks of their dreadful anguish in the battle of the great day, and of their final destruction in the outer darkness. Jude xiii.—Selected.

"IT'S NOT ESSENTIAL."

HAVING on one occasion called the attention of a friend to the fact that the kingdom of Christ spoken of in Scripture, is a visible exercise of kingly authority by the Lord Jesus, upon earth, over all nations—a kingdom of such a nature as to exclude the existence of any other cotemporary governmental powers;—a kingdom that shall break in pieces, and consume all other kingdoms, and stand forever (Dan. ii. 44); our representations were met by the remark, "Well, it may be so, but it's not essential!" And this was urged as an excuse for not searching the Scriptures, so as to have a decisive belief on the matter. This, we have reason to believe, is no uncommon occurrence; and being convinced that objection is a very important one, we wish to reason a little with those who are in the practice of putting it.

"It's not essential!" You mean by that, we presume, that you can be saved without believing it; therefore you will not search the Scriptures, or trouble yourself about the nature of the kingdom of Christ. Supposing it not essential, is your indifference commendable to yourself, or reverential toward God? He has been so gracious toward us as to reveal his purposes regarding the future of the world, and its inhabitants. He has told us in the Bible that the kingdoms of this world shall become his kingdom, and the kingdom of his Christ; and he has told us much of the nature, extent, duration, and results of this kingdom of his dear Son. You know that among those who declare themselves Christians there is great diversity of belief regarding this kingdom; but you refuse to investigate the divine records and decide for yourself, because, you think, you will be saved whatever you believe about this kingdom, or whether you believe any thing about it. God has in wonderful condescension drawn aside the curtain, and invited you to look into his council-room, yet you treat the invitation with indifference.

But are you sure it is not essential? We think there are reasons why you should doubt this. Ponder these words: "These are written that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you might have life through his name."—John xx. 31. Here we have a plain and explicit statement of what we are to believe concerning Jesus in order to have life through his name. No statement can be of greater importance to us sinners than this. Often do we hear the exhortation from the pulpit, and at the corners of the streets, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." The conscience-stricken sinner inquires, "What am I to believe about the Lord Jesus Christ?" And, whatever answer he may receive elsewhere, the divine response is, "Believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and, believing, you shall have life through his name!" Plainly it is essential to believe that Jesus is THE CHRIST. Now what we wish you to consider is whether you can really believe that Jesus is the Christ, and yet not believe that he is to sit on the throne of his father David, and rule over the house of Jacob forever. The words "The Christ" are equivalent to "The King." "Christ" is a Greek word, and like its Hebrew synonym Messiah, signifies in English anointed. The Christ is, then, in our language, "The Anointed." The kings of Israel were installed into royal office by having oil poured on their head, and the usage led to the appellation, "The Anointed" to the kings of Israel. And Saul and David were called "The Lord's Anointed"—the Lord's King, i. e., the king he had appointed.

The truth of this is well illustrated in the first six verses of the seventh chapter of Matthew. The Magi inquired, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" Herod demanded of the chief priests and scribes where "The Christ should be born?" and they replied by quoting the prophecy of Micah: "Thou Bethlehem, in the land of Judah, art not the least among the princes of Judah, for out of thee shall come a Governor that shall rule my people Israel." Thus we see that, in the language of Scripture, Governor, King, and Christ, are synonymous terms. No one, therefore, can believe that Jesus is the Christ, unless they believe he is the King. So far, we presume, there is no doubt. What we wish to be considered, however, is the question, whether a correct apprehension of the nature of the kingship and kingdom of the Lord Jesus be necessary to our believing that he is the Christ. All professing Christians believe that Jesus is a King; but we think there is good ground for doubting that any one who believes that the kingdom of Christ is an invisible dominion, in the hearts of his people, or in heaven, really believes that Jesus is the Christ. Observe that the terms are definite, not a Christ, i. e., a King; but the Christ, the King—some particular personage. The inquiry of Herod related to a particular Christ, so did that of the Magi, and he was the Governor spoken of by the prophet Micah, who was to rule God's people Israel—the king of the Jews.

When Philip informed Nathaniel that he had found the Christ, he used these words, "We have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write."—John i. 45. Nathaniel was at no loss to understand the kind of character of the personage referred to; and when his doubts as to Jesus being that person were removed, he acknowledged Jesus to be "the Son of God, the King of Israel." Much more might be cited from the Scriptures in confirmation of this; we shall only refer further to the confession of Peter, "We believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God."—John vi. 69. Would belief in an imaginary Christ be a belief in that Christ of whom Moses and the prophets did write? Surely no. But it was that Christ whom the apostle meant when he affirmed that the purpose of his writing was that they might believe that Jesus is the Christ, and that "whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God."—1 John v. 1.

Our space is nearly exhausted; but we are convinced that every candid reader will acknowledge from the foregoing considerations that a belief in Jesus as that Christ promised to the fathers of Israel, and spoken of by Moses and the prophets, is of the most vital importance. Indecision or doubt, on this matter, is dangerous indeed. Search the Scriptures as to the character of the kingdom of Christ; there only can we gain correct information on this point; and the information there is both plain and copious.

For ourselves, we have no hesitation in affirming that the kingdom of Christ commonly preached and believed in the countries of Christendom, is entirely different from the kingdom described in Moses, the prophets, and the Psalms, as belonging to Christ. "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall rule over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke i. 32, 33. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, then shall he sit upon his throne of glory."—Matt. xxv. 31. "All people, nations, and languages shall serve him."—Dan. vii. 14. For "The kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever."—Rev. xi. 15.

"These things are written that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, and that believing you might have life through his name." W. LAING.

"FISHERS OF MEN."

As Jesus promised to make his disciples "fishers of men," we may safely conclude that all ministers of the gospel should be "fishers of men;" and as such, they should use as much wisdom in catching men, as fishers do in catching fish. Different kinds of fish can be caught with different kinds of bait.

So with men; some can be baited with sympathy, and others with reason. Paul's method was to "reason out of the Scriptures;" and men who will stop to swallow the bait of reason, will get the gospel hook so firmly fastened, that it will be hard to break loose from its power. There are always more nibbles around the hook baited with sympathy, and the fisher that uses this bait will get a great many more bites, but they are constantly slipping off the hook. A better kind of bait would catch a better kind of fish; however, this kind of bait is not to be repudiated, for it often gives an opportunity of using the hook baited with reason, by congregating the fish.

God's method of reaching men is by an appeal to their reason: "Come and let us reason together." Those who are moved without reason, are not so securely reached; for, "when any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart." The understanding must be reached, or it will be like having the fish holding the hook without having the hook hold him, ready to let go at any time. "He that receiveth the seed into good ground is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it." The understanding must be enlightened to hold men; the emotional element may often pave the way for this, but cannot take its place. W. S.

—World's Crisis.

A Wise Man may Gain by any Company.

As there is no book so poorly furnished, out of which a man may not gather something for his benefit; so is there no company so savagely bad, but a wise man may learn from it something to make himself better. Vice is of such a loathsome complexion, that she cannot choose but teach the soul of the wise man to hate her. So admirably hath God disposed of the ways of man that even the sight of vice in others is like a warning-arrow, shot for us to take heed. When she thinks, by publishing of herself, to procure a train of followers, God, by his secret working, makes her turn her weapons against herself, and strongly plead for her adversary, virtue. We are brought to good by contraries.

I confess there is nothing by which I learn more to correct faults in myself than by seeing how uncomely they appear in others. Who can help thinking what a nasty beast he must be in his drunkenness, that hath seen how noisome it hath made another? Who will not abhor an angry passion, and a saucy pride in himself, that sees how ridiculous and contemptible they render those that are infested with them? Why should I be so besottedly blind, as to believe others should not spy those vices in me, which I can see, when they disclose themselves in them? Though the bad man be the worse man for having vice in his eye; yet the good man is the better for all he sees that is ill. 'Tis certain neither example nor precept can be the absolute guides of the truly wise man. 'Tis only a knowing and a practical judgment of his own, that can direct him in the maze of life; in the bustle of the world; in the twitches and the twirls of fate. The other may help us something in the general, but cannot be sufficient in particulars. No man can leave his successor rules for particulars, because he knows not how the times will be. He that lives always by book-rules shall show himself affected, and a fool. I will do that which I see comely, (if it be not dishonest), rather than what a grave philosopher commands me to the contrary. I will take what I see is fitly good from any; but I think there was never any one man that lived to be a guide of perfection in all things. In many things I fall short of my guide; in some things I may go beyond him. We feed not the body with the food of one dish only; nor does the sedulous bee gather all her honey from one single flower's virtues. She takes the best from many; and together, she makes them serve; not without working that to honey, which other creatures might convert to poison. Thus should the wise man do. But even by this, he may better learn to love the good, than in any other way avoid that which is offensive. Those that are thoroughly versed in navigation, do as well know the coasts as the ocean; as well the sands, the shallows, and the rocks, as the secure depths. So, I think, those that are perfect men, (I speak of perfection such as may be), must as well know bad, that they may avoid it, as the good, that they may embrace it. And this knowledge we can neither have so cheap, nor so certainly, as by seeing it in others with a pitiful, compassionate dislike. Surely we shall know virtue the better, by seeing that which is not virtue. If we could pass through the world without meeting vice, then the knowledge of virtue alone would be sufficient. But it is not possible to live and not encounter her. Vice is as a god in this world; whither can we go to fly from its presence? It hath an ubiquity, omnipresence, and it ruleth too. I wish no man to know it, either by use, or by intrusion; but being unwittingly cast upon it, let him observe its character and workings, for his own more safe direction. Thou art happy, when thou makest another man's vices steps for thee to climb to heaven by. The wise physician makes the poison medicinal. Even the mud of the world, by the industrious Hollander, is turned to a useful fuel. If I light on good company, it shall either induce me to a new good, or confirm me in my beloved old good. If I light on bad company, I will, by considering their dull stains, either correct those faults I have, or shun those that I might have. As the mariner that hath sea-room, can make any wind serve to set him forward in his voyage; so a wise man may take advantage from any company, to set himself forward in virtue and religion. Vice is subtle, and ever plotting for her own preferment; why should not virtue be plotting for hers? It requires as much policy to grow good, as great. There is an innocent prudence, as well as a wolfish craft. Every good man is an ambassador here for heaven, and he must be wise and circumspect, to frustrate the plots of those that would undo him. And as those that are ambassadors for the kingdoms of earth, will gain something to help them in their business from all societies that they fall upon: so those that are ambassadors for this higher empire, may gather something beneficial from all that they shall converse with; either for prevention of evil, or confirmation in good; either to strengthen themselves, or confound their opposers.—Selected.

Notice.

The Woman's Christian Association will hold its annual meeting at Springfield, Mass., Aug. 23, 1871, instead of Concord, N. H., July 26, as published in last week's paper. It is desirable that all members of the Association should be present.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, JULY 26, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Camp-Meeting.

It will seen by the "Camp-meeting Correspondence," in this week's paper, the Editor has been invited to preach the dedication sermon of the new Camp-ground at Springfield, Mass., and that he has consented to do so.

The dedication service is to be on Sunday, August 13; the regular services of the Camp-meeting commence Monday the 14th, to continue through the week and over the Sunday following.

It is desirable that all persons who intend to profit by the meeting should be on the ground at the earliest day, and remain to the end. We should go to increase in the knowledge of God and our Lord Jesus Christ, that our love of God and our Redeemer may be increased, and thereby our love and usefulness to our fellow creatures may be enlarged. If we go for mere self-gratification, we shall probably be very little profited and of little profit to others.

Let us go in humble dependence on God, and with earnest prayer that heavenly truth may be promoted, and that the untaught and such as are out of the way of life and peace may be benefitted, and be brought to know and love the ways of the Lord. Thus shall we be a blessing and be blessed, and the name of our God shall be "hallowed," which should be our first desire, as it is the first petition our redeeming Lord has instructed us to use.

May our covenant God so over-rule all that relates to this gathering that we shall have cause to praise and bless His name that we came together.

Our Assistant Editor.

Br. Thorne's health is not good; and he has gone up into the country for two or three weeks, to seek rest and a change of air, in hope of a renewal. We sincerely desire that he may be benefitted by the quiet and repose sought.

His absence accounts for the suspension of his review of N. D. George's work on immortality. We trust he may be able, after a week or two, to resume the review which he has so ably conducted thus far; and when completed it will be published in Pamphlet or Book, or both. Let the friends be prepared to circulate it among the Methodist community, where N. D. George's work has gone. We have no fears as to the result.

Br. Thorne commenced this review by our special request, during our sickness last winter, and has diligently prosecuted it till now; and it will be found an excellent antidote for such works as that which it reviews.

The Overcomers.

"To him that overcometh will I give to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."—Rev. ii. 21.

It is not to the indolent, the thoughtless, the worldly-minded: it is not to those who wait to be dragged along this promise is made. It is to him who marches to the conflict in the spirit of self-sacrifice such as characterized our Lord in his conflicts, and in which he overcame.

To help us to achieve this victory, and be overcomers, the first act of Christ, after his exaltation to his Father's throne, was to send the Holy Spirit on his followers, and to give it, ever after, to all "them that obey him." He told his followers, while here on earth, John xvi. 7, "I tell you the truth: It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." Not unmindful of his promise, after he was exalted he shed down the Holy Spirit according to his word: see Acts ii. 1–4, 32, 33, "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we are witnesses. Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear."

The gift of the Spirit is not confined to those who are of one class, but is the blessing promised to all who obey Christ; and it is a gift without which we never can "overcome." It would be easy to enlarge on this point; and to show that this promise is not restricted, but is a blessing to be expected and sought for by all who would sit down on Christ's throne, or who would ever achieve the victory which will entitle them to that exaltation. Surely the encouragement to go forward in the struggle for victory is abundant; and the help offered ample. The certainty of a seat on Christ's throne, if we overcome, should be enough to arouse every soul, and to urge us on in the Christian course without fainting. To do so, however, we must have in exercise that faith which keeps the high honor before our minds, and which never lets us lose sight of the throne of Christ's glory, presented for our consideration and our inheritance. Let all earth's allurements—the suggestions of the flesh—and the temptations of the wicked, disappear in our minds before the immortal prize which Jesus, our Lord, holds up to the eyes of our faith: thus, "looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who," while on earth, "for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God," we shall be able always to triumph in Christ, through the word of truth and the power of the Holy Spirit; and "in due time we shall reap, if we faint not."

Camp-Meeting Correspondence.

About the 23d of June we received a note from the "Secretary of the Camp-Meeting Committee,"—Bro. Thomas R. Weaver, of Springfield, Mass., saying, the Committee had "voted to invite Geo. Storrs to preach the dedication Sermon" of the camp-ground, August 13th. After some days we responded as follows:

New York, June 28, 1871.

Dear Brother Weaver: Your note of the 22d inst. was received in due time. I have taken a little time for consideration before replying to the invitation of your "Committee to preach the dedication Sermon" of the "new Camp-ground." If I knew the ground was really to be dedicated to God and a free expression of the convictions of all, who love the Lord, as to their understanding of the teachings of His word, I should most gladly unite with you in the dedication proposed. But I have had enough of sectarian exclusiveness. We separated from the "Crisis" folks because they would not allow a free expression of what we considered views in advance of their position. If we are now about to do the same thing by excluding what some of us believe to be in advance of our past position, what are we better than those from whom we have separated? Are we not just as sectarian, and just as proscriptive? If the "new Camp-ground" is to be dedicated to a policy so narrow, I can take no part in the work.

I have written thus, because, as you know, the "Board of Managers" have put an injunction on the free discussion of the subject of the age or "ages to come" in the Herald. If this policy is to be carried out by the Life and Advent Union, my connection with it must cease; but if it is to be a free meeting, for a free expression of thought, done in a Christian spirit, by men and women of irreproachable character, (and of a "sound mind") then with my whole heart and mind, I can unite with you and take part in the meeting. If such is not to be the character of the meeting, nor the policy of the Union, then I shall be compelled to keep aloof from connection with it. It is high time that we should be able to hear what our brethren have to say, differing with us, or from our present views or past positions, without taking offence, or proscribing them because we do not see as they do.

If I can be satisfied the Campmeeting is not to be a sectarian one, I shall be free to preach the dedication sermon, and shall cheerfully comply with the invitation to do so. I cannot preach there, or anywhere else, with even an implied understanding that I am to keep back anything which I regard as truth, if I feel it my duty to utter it; while I utter it with a Christian spirit, not making it a test of fellowship; but present it in an honest conviction that it is the truth of God.

Geo. Storrs.

P. S.—If I can be assured by yourself and Br. Day, and others of the "Committee," who may be near you to consult, that the meeting is to be free, as I have suggested, then I will, the Lord willing, preach the dedication sermon; otherwise I must decline.

G. S.

BR. WEAVER'S RESPONSE.

Springfield, Mass., July 11, 1871.

Dear Br. Storrs: Yours of June 28th came to hand in due time, and as far as I was individually concerned I could have replied at once; but I thought I would take time to consult with other members of the Committee, and now having done so, as far as is practicable, I give you briefly our decision. We fullly concur with the sentiments and principles laid down in your letter, viz: That the meeting should be free in its fullest and broadest sense. The Committee will endeavor to carry out, as far as possible, that platform.

You say, "if you can be satisfied the Camp-meeting is not to be a sectarian one, you should be free to preach the dedication sermon." Br. Storrs, we assure you that you are at liberty to present the truth in just that way the Lord may direct you; and not only you, but others will have the same privilege, and we hope and trust under the guiding hand of an all wise Providence our meeting will not only be a great success, but a complete victory over all our opposers, and the enemies of the truth. Our success, you are well aware, will depend largely upon the kind, Christian spirit which we manifest towards those that honestly differ from us upon doctrinal points. I hope each one may have so much of the love of Christ in their hearts that there will be no room for contention and strife.

I hope what I have said will be sufficient to satisfy you, that you will have all the liberty any Christian man may want; and that every objection now is removed from your mind, and you can come and dedicate our beautiful grove to the worship of that God whose name and character is Love. Hoping to hear from you at once, I am yours in the blessed hope,

T. R. Weaver, Secretary.

P. S.—I hope you will do all you can to rally the Brethren and Sisters to our annual meeting, and we will do the best we can to take care of them and make them happy.

To the foregoing we replied immediately, accepting the invitation to preach the dedication sermon and asking Br. W. if he was willing we should publish our correspondence. He responded as follows:

Springfield, July 14, 1871.

Dear Br. Storrs: Yours of 13th inst. just received and contents noted.

I certainly ought to have no objections in giving our correspondence publicity, in as much as the Committee done what they did in good faith that it would be faithfully carried out at our meeting. You are at liberty to publish it.

Yours, in hope,

T. R. Weaver, Secretary.

Note by the Editor.

Now, we hope our friends from all quarters, will come up to the meeting, and be early on the ground. It will be the most important meeting ever held by Life believers.

Br. R. E. Ladd, Springfield, Mass., writes: Br Storrs: I heartily indorse your position relating to the paper and to preaching the first sermon on the Camp-ground. It is the only position I ever will occupy, while I have my reason. Perfect freedom before the Lord, in all things: according to others what I claim for myself. No man may come between me and my convictions of truth and duty. It was a mistake, to say the least, to put restrictions on the subjects discussed in the Herald; but the Lord will make all right in His time.

Our Annual Gathering.

We again take occasion to urge upon the attention of friends scattered abroad the importance of the presence at the approaching camp-meeting of all who can arrange to be there. It is designed to make the meeting a success in every particular, but this can only be accomplished by all being there who can, and manifesting an active and earnest interest in the welfare of the meeting. If this is done an excellent work will be effected, and both those who are present and those who are absent will be strengthened and encouraged in their efforts to spread the truth and extend the cause of righteousness.

The annual meeting of the Union will commence Thursday, Aug. 17, at 10 A. M.

Again we say, let all who can be present; and may they come rejoicing in the Spirit, for then those means only will be employed or sought to be adopted which are felt to be best calculated to promote the interests of truth.

Remarks on Daniel ii. 45.

"Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter," etc.

A mountain represents a kingdom; or, rather, we should say, it represents the Ruler, or body of rulers, of a kingdom. This figure is employed because of their exalted position. The term mountain is applied to obstructions, or that which stands in the way of the accomplishment of an object, as resisting or obstructing God's purposes; such mountains are spoken of, as being rolled down, melted, burned, etc. See Jer. li. 24–26.

In the text, Dan. ii. 45, it is quite evident it refers to a kingdom, or body of rulers. Hence the question arises, From what kingdom, or body of rulers, is the stone cut out—or "rent from," as the Septuagint reads.

As none of the kingdoms, or body of rulers, represented by the image in this chapter are called mountains, but, en masse, are a terrific "image," instead of governments in harmony with God, we must look elsewhere for the mountain, or body of rulers, out of which the stone was cut, or rent. That the government God instituted for Israel—that kingdom, or body of rulers—was represented by a mountain is abundantly manifest in the Bible. David says, "By thy favor thou hast made my mountain to stand strong."—Psa. xxx. 7. That kingdom when depressed was represented in language like the following: "The mountain of Zion is desolate."—Lam. v. 18. "Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest."—Micah iii. 12. See also Jer. xxvi. 18. In its desolation, Daniel prayed God to let his anger be turned away from his "holy mountain," and said, while he was praying "for the holy mountain," etc.—Dan. ix.

When the kingdom of Israel was under the Theocracy government, and after the people called for a king like other nations, if they walked in obedience to God they were a highly exalted nation, and stood like a mountain above all other people, hence their government was as a mountain, and its glory was seen afar off. This was specially the case in the days of David and Solomon. But by the wickedness of kings who came afterward they brought judgments on the government and nation or kingdom, till God said, "Remove the diadem, and take off the crown; this shall not be the same: exalt the low;" [other kingdoms] "and abase the high;" [the kingdom or government of Israel;] "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it;" [the government or kingdom of Israel;"] and it shall be no more, until he comes, whose right it is, and I will give it him."

Thus the mountain of the Lord's house, or the kingdom of Israel, was abased, and was made subject to the kingdoms, or bodies of rulers symbolized by the image, Dan. ii. But this subjection was not to last always. There was to be "a stone," a Ruler, who, as the seed of David, had the "right" to David's throne. The king of Babylon, in his vision of the image, saw first the four universal monarchies that were to arise and bear rule over the earth; and at the same time he saw "a stone cut out of the mountain without hands." No human power produced it; God produced it without man's aid, or the aid of any of the four Gentile monarchies, or their fragmentary governments, and in spite of their opposition in the latter times. Small in its first appearance, but it was a stone taken out of the ancient Royalty, kingdom, or mountain of Israel; and it was that, to whom God had promised to give the "diadem and crown" which had been taken from "the high" mountain, or kingdom of Israel; but the four earth-born monarchies were first to complete their rule, and show how perfectly incapable the best of them were to govern the world, and give peace and prosperity to the earth. Nor was this the only reason why there was a delay in the re-establishment of the kingdom which had been overturned. A body of associate rulers were to be prepared, to be united with the "King" who would "reign and prosper, and execute judgment and justice in the earth."—Jer. xxiii. 5. When that number of associates is completed, or made up, then is the time for the stone power to commence the smiting process, which is to ultimate in the entire demolition of the earth-born governments, symbolized by the image. It smote the image upon the feet—the last, or subdivisions of the fourth body of rulers on the earth. The smiting process, it is not likely, is instantaneous, or all completed at once. It may be partially accomplished before the full manifestation of the chief Ruler and his associates. That point is the crisis, when all the "corrupters of the earth" by their unholy rule, will be cut off and rooted out of the earth; and they being all "broken to pieces," will disappear, as "the chaff which the wind driveth away."

"The mountain of the house of the Lord" is to be re-established on a permanent basis, under immortal rulers, so that the kingdom "shall not be left to other people," nor ever pass away. This fact is often referred to in the Bible. The Lord saith, "It shall come to pass in the last days, the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it."—Isa. ii. 2. Here is the "stone" exalted into "a great mountain and filled the whole earth."—Dan. ii. 35. The "dominion is from the river [Euphrates], to the ends of the earth."

Micah bears the same testimony that Isaiah ii. does, and in nearly the same words. See chap. iv. i., and onward. Isaiah, speaking in the name of the Lord, utters nearly the same language of Dan. ii., where, speaking of the people of Jacob, the following language occurs: "Thou, Israel, my servant, Jacob, whom I have chosen . . . fear thou not; for I am with thee . . . Behold all they that were incensed against thee shall be ashamed . . . thou shalt seek them and shall not find them . . . they that war against thee shall be as nothing . . . for I the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not, I will help thee . . . I will make thee a new sharp threshing instrument" [the stone cut out of the mountain] "having teeth; thou shalt thresh the mountains" [the Gentile monarchies, or the rulers symbolized by the image, Dan. ii.,] and "beat them small, and shall make the hills" [the subdivisions of the last kingdom of Dan. ii.,] "chaff: thou shalt fan them, and the wind shall carry them away, and the whirlwind shall scatter them."—Isa. xli. 8–16. All this is a perfect parallel to the description of the smiting, Dan. ii.

The return of the kingdom to Israel's king is thus spoken of, Zech. viii. 3, "Thus saith the Lord; I am returned to Zion, and I will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem; and Jerusalem shall be called a city of truth; and the mountain of the Lord of hosts the holy mountain." Here is the "great mountain," Dan. ii. 35, and it will "fill the whole earth," making but one empire for all the inhabitants thereof. Here comes in, in its fulness, the prophecy of Isa. xxv. 6–8, "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, and wine on the lees well refined: and he will destroy in this mountain [under this government] the face of the covering cast over all people, [which has so long kept them in the bondage of superstition, bigotry, traditions, and will-worship], and the veil that is spread over all nations [by the claims and acts of "lords over God's heritage," both civil and ecclesiastical.] He will swallow up death in victory; [here is the resurrection of the saints of all ages;] and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it. And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God, [Ruler] we have waited for him," etc. Read to the end of the chapter. Here again is the Stone, now become a mountain, filling the whole earth.

Another figure is employed in Isa. xi., "A rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots . . . with righteousness shall he judge the poor . . . he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked: and righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins . . . they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

Here is the same result as in Dan. ii., and here the mountain kingdom is established over all the earth. The "rod," or "stone" has attained to universal dominion and displaced every vestige of the image kingdoms, and the Mountain kingdom, or body of rulers, succeeds to universal empire over all the earth. In that day, "The moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed when the Lord of hosts shall reign in mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously."—Isa. xxiv. 23. It is at that time God will "set my king upon my holy hill of Zion;" and the "kings and judges of the earth," who have refused submission to him, and have persecuted those he was preparing to "reign with him," will be "broken with a rod of iron," and "dashed to pieces like a potter's vessel."—Psa. ii.

Here, again, we have the same result as in Dan. ii. 35, 45. The same events are symbolized in Rev. vi. 12–17, and xi. 15–19; also xix. 11–21; which, please read.

Some further remarks on the stone, to determine beyond a doubt who, or what is intended by it in Dan. ii., may be of use. The Lord said, "Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation," etc.—Isa. xxviii. 16, and onward. "The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner: this is the Lord's doing," etc.—Psa. cxviii. 22. This stone, not only the Jewish builders of government refused, but it has been refused by all the image governments of earth; and they have sought by every possible means to destroy it, either by utterly rejecting it, or only tolerating it when its principles were corrupted, or its professed adherents compromised its claims with the claims of the earth-born image-worshippers.

This last text, Psa. cxviii., our Lord Jesus applies to himself, Matt. xxi. 42; and Peter said, Acts iv. ii., speaking of Christ "raised from the dead"—"This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders;" and Paul quotes the text Isa. xxviii. 16, and applies in like manner, Rom. ix. 32, 33. Our Lord Jesus saith, On whomsoever this stone shall fall it will grind him to powder; Luke xx. 18; thus fully representing the breaking in pieces of the image governments, as stated Dan. ii. 34, 35, 44, 45.

But a remarkable testimony is given of this stone-power, in Gen. xlix. 24, speaking of Jacob, it is said, "From thence is the Shepherd, the stone of Israel." There can be no doubt this prophetic utterance related to the then future "Shiloh," or Messiah. He is first presented as a Shepherd, to care for, protect, and provide for his flock. Then he is the "Stone of Israel," in due time to break in pieces the oppressive image dynasties, and destroy them from off the earth, the saint's inheritance; because God has determined that "The kingdom under the whole heaven [not above it], shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him."—Dan. vii. 27.

This is the kingdom which "the God of heaven shall set up, which shall never be destroyed," and which "shall stand forever;" sweeping away all other rule on earth. Dan. ii. 44.

As to the exact means God will employ to bring this kingdom to its full maturity, so as to fill the whole earth, we do not know; and there has been sufficient speculation about it to make "the wise" more cautious in views on the subject. That the work will be accomplished in God's own good time, and by such means as he shall choose, we need not doubt. Because we cannot fathom the whole programme, we need not be disquieted or doubt the perfect fulfilment of all that God has spoken; for his word will "not return void, but will accomplish that which he" hath spoken.

Let us, then, wait for developments, rather than to be too inquisitive as to how things are to be done. Faith accepts the testimony God has given; and where the means to accomplish may seem too inadequate and unlikely to bring about the end specified, we may rest assured that infinite wisdom and power is at no loss to fulfil all that God hath spoken. Here let our faith rest, keeping our eyes open to see the salvation of God.

"Eternity of Eternities."

This is the period of the torment of the wicked, once said Josiah Litch; and in proof of this position brought forward Rev. xiv., 9–11, a text which an intelligent man should blush to produce in proof of the punishment of wicked men at all, beyond judgments inflicted in this present life. In order to make this text available to our opponents, they must prove three things. First—That it is spoken of all wicked men. Second—That it relates to their punishment beyond this life. And, Third—that the term "for ever and ever" is used in its primary and absolute sense of endless. Neither of these points have they ever proved, and never can. It is not enough for a man to affirm all these points: let them be proved. We say again, it never has been done and never can be.

1. Is this language used in reference to all wicked men?

We answer, No. It is a specified class, viz; "If any man worship the beast and his image and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand." This is the class spoken of and threatened; and it comes almost infinitely short of embracing all the wicked. The beast and his image (see chap. xiii., 17,) are not in existence till a late period of the Christian era. The dynasty of rulers symbolised by this beast and his image are of late origin, if yet in existence; hence it is impossible that more than a small portion of the race of Adam can come under the threatening of ch. xiv. This fact alone shows the absurdity of our opposers quoting it in support of their theory, which is, that all wicked men will be involved in endless torment.

2. Does the judgment threatened in Rev. xiv. 9–11, relate to wicked men beyond this life?

We unhesitatingly say, No. The following chapters prove this. Chapter xv. opens thus—"I saw another sign in heaven . . . seven angels having the seven last plagues; for in them is filled up the wrath of God." The original is, "In them was completed the wrath of God."

Mark well, these plagues are the last on somebody; and they are to have a completion; hence it is impossible that they can be eternal or endless. Now observe, verses 7 and 8 it is said, "One of the four vital beings gave unto the seven angels seven golden vials full of the wrath of God," etc. "And the temple was filled with the smoke from the glory of God, and from his power; and no man was able to enter into the temple, till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled," or completed.

Let it be distinctly noted, these plagues are the last, and that they complete the wrath of God on the power to be visited; and also that no man can enter into the temple of God till they are completed. Now what follows—If these plagues, or any part of them, fall on the wicked spoken of in chap. xiv. 9–11, then either no man ever can enter into the temple of God, or the wrath spoken of will have been completed, or finished. Now listen—"I heard a great voice out of the temple, saying to the seven angels, Go your ways, and pour out the vials of the wrath of God [where?] upon the earth:" not in hell, nor the moon, nor any other fancy location. "And the first went and poured out his vial upon the earth." Well, what happened? "And there fell a noisome and grievous sore upon the men which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image."

Here is the commencement of the exact fulfilment of the threatening in chap. xiv. There we find the threatening; here the wrath in a course of accomplishment, and it has not missed the persons threatened. These plagues are all to fall on the earth: chap. xvi. 1; they are the "filling up of the wrath of God"—and they are "the last:" and till they are filled up and completed, no man can enter the temple of God: then what becomes of "the eternity of eternities" of their torment? It has passed away, like other fancies of mere theorists.

As we have shown that the threatened wrath in Rev. xiv. 9–11, is to be "upon the earth," and that it must have a completion, or no man can ever enter the "temple in heaven," it is unnecessary to spend time to prove that the term, forever and ever, in the text, is used, as often elsewhere, to signify no more than a protracted period, without defining its exact length. We might greatly extend our remarks on this subject; but we trust we have said enough to convince all candid inquirers, and more would not avail with bigots, and dealers in mere assumptions. Let the reader examine the fourth and fifth plagues.

Fare to Camp-Meeting.

Br. Storrs: I wish to correct the notice I sent you last week in regard to the reduction of fare on railroad for Campmeeting. The Supt. of the Conn. railroad told Br. Day and myself, he would reduce one half, and the Agent of the Hartford & New Haven railroad, gave us encouragement to that effect. To-day we are informed that the fare will only be reduced one third on those roads.

Will you have the kindnes to make it read as follows: Fare will be reduced on the Boston & Albany railroad, Hartford & New Haven railroad, and Conn. railroad, one third, from August 10 to August 30, inclusive.

Yours in hope,

T. R. Weaver, Sec. C. M. Com.

Philadelphia to Springfield.

FOR $4 50.

For the benefit of those brethren and sisters who live in this city and vicinity, who may wish to attend the Camp-Meetings at Springfield, these lines are penned, that they may be informed, who do not already know, of a very cheap, pleasant, and comfortable way of getting from this section to Springfield.

At quarter past six o'clock in the morning, daily, a train leaves the foot of Walnut street, in this city, for New York, via Amboy. The cars on this train are commodious, comfortable, and first-class. Thirty miles of the way, from Amboy to New York, is by steamboat, from which a fine view of Raritan and New York bays is to be had. The boat is due at Pier No. 1 North River, in New York, at eleven o'clock. The entire fare from here to New York by this pleasant route is $2 25.

Leaving the pier in New York, take the horse-cars which pass the pier and go to the South Ferry station. Take the horse-cars at that station for Peck slip, near which the Hartford steamboat will be found. A through ticket for Springfield can be bought on the boat at the captain's office for $2 15. This sum secures a comfortable berth in the saloon for sleeping. The boat leaves the pier every afternoon for Hartford at four o'clock, and arrives there the next morning about seven. A walk of half a mile from the landing at Hartford leads to the railroad depot, where cars are to be taken for Springfield. Horse-cars run from the boat to the depot, which may add a little to the sum mentioned. Thus, the actual travelling expenses, all told, may be covered by a five dollar bill, or ten dollars out and back.

It will be noticed that there will be about four or five hours to spare in New York city, which can be spent as our friends see fit. Broadway and Central Park are amongst the objects of interest worth visiting. It is an hour's ride to the latter—fare five cents. An hour can be spent there in visiting the Terrace, Museum, etc., etc.

Yours, in hope.

"Heirs of the Kingdom."

It is an undisputed truth that the saints are "heirs of the kingdom." But when we inquire to what kingdom they are heirs, conflicting replies are given. But the apostle James affirms that they are heirs to that particular kingdom which God "hath promised to them that love him;" and upon a careful examination of all the promises of God, we fail to find a single promise of a kingdom for disembodied men at death, but easily find numerous promises of a kingdom for real men after the resurrection and judgment.

This theory of a kingdom for disembodied men has passed through several revisions, and is now passing through another important revision. We will briefly notice the different phases of this theory:

1. The heathen coined the theory of the existence of the "shades of the dead," and finally gave them personal forms, and assigned them a home in the bowels of the earth.

2. A part of the Jews received this heathen notion while in captivity, and tried to make it synchronize with the sheol of the Hebrew Scriptures, and gave the centre of the earth as its location—a kingdom of ghosts shut up in the ground, with a gulf between the good and bad, so narrow that they could talk from shore to shore, but so deep that a ghost could not fly over it.

3. When the Christian church first received the theory of the disembodied existence of men, they also received the theory of a sheol kingdom called hades by the Greeks; and they also assigned it a location in the heart of the earth; but the testimony of Inspiration is—"There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in sheol" (Eccl. ix. 10); so if sheol is really a receptacle for disembodied men, instead of corporeal men, its inhabitants are destitute of knowledge and wisdom.

4. At a later date, after much contention, the impression gained ascendancy that Christ went into sheol in a disembodied state, and liberated all the good souls, and took them up to heaven, after which time all truly good men at death go straight to heaven, and all naughty good ones go to the same place where good souls used to go, now called purgatory; thus a part go to the old sheol to be prayed out, and a part go to heaven.

5. Another class, not liking to give up the sheol kingdom, still insisted that all souls went to sheol at death, and none went to heaven, but changed the location of sheol, and all the light they could give about its new location was, It is not in the bowels of the earth, nor is it in heaven; but unfortunately they could never reconcile this idea with Jacob's language—"Then shall ye bring down [not up] my gray hairs with sorrow unto sheol"—as this statement indicates (1) that sheol is not up, but "down," and (2) that it is a realm for the corporeal man, as disembodied men do not wear gray hairs.

6. Anotner class, not liking this purgatory appendage, and not seeing any authority for changing the locality of sheol, denied that any went to sheol except the wicked, and converted sheol into hell; and claimed that all saints go to heaven at death. Thus the underground home of heathen souls, Jewish souls, and semi-Catholic souls, was all converted into hell.

7. At a later date, this sheol-hell has been taken out of the bowels of the earth, and put somewhere else, but nobody can tell where; and sheol has been tossed from pillar to post, till it is lost, like a play-boy's ball. It is a kingdom having no certain dwelling-place. At one time it was an underground kingdom for "the shades of the dead" in general, then it took the name of sheol, being somewhat improved by having a great gulf dug through it, to keep the good and bad ghosts from mixing up, but leaving them within sight and hearing of each other; then one part was converted into hell, and the other part recognized as paradise; then all the inmates of the good part were transported to the skies, and this good department changed into purgatory; then sheol entire was taken out of the ground, and in an attempt to locate it elsewhere, it has got lost, and can't be found.

Poor sheol kingdom! It must be tired enough to rest awhile, having gone through as many changes as the "Zion" of the Mormons, which was first established at Kirtland, Ohio, then moved to Jackson Co., Mo., then Far-West, then to Nauvoo, Ill., then to Salt Lake. But sheol is lost, though the advocates of a sheol kingdom insist that it is not lost, on the principle the cook denied that the tea-kettle was lost that had fallen overboard, because it was somewhere in the bottom of the sea, though he could not tell where: so it is said sheol is somewhere, and therefore not lost; but whether it is lost or not, theologians have so fully lost track of it, they dare not say it is here or there.

8. Recently, in opposition to the old theory of a sheol kingdom, and the more modern theory of a sky kingdom for immaterial men, a new version of the matter is being presented, setting aside hell and heaven, and introducing spheres in their stead, consisting not in locality, but in grades of development by progression. And this new view of a future existence of disembodied men, is rapidly gaining ground.

Against this system of changeable speculation, we present the following arguments:

1. The "heirs" to this promised kingdom, instead of being a class of deathless spirit-men, are a class of material men, once in possession of a dying nature, to be exchanged for immortality before they enter the kingdom; for Jesus says, "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, . . . neither can they die any more."—Luke xx. 35, 36. These heirs could once die, which is not true of deathless souls.

2. The promised kingdom is not due till the judgment; for Christ "shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom."—2 Tim. iv. 1. A sheol kingdom of unjudged spirit-men would be an undesirable locality. "O sheol, I will be thy destruction."—Hosea xiii. 13.

3. John informs us that the saints shall "reign on the earth," and "they shall reign forever and ever" (Rev. v. 10; Rev. xxii. 5), agreeing with the promise made through the Psalmist—"Wait on the Lord, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land; when the wicked are cut off thou shalt see it" (Psa. xxxviii. 34); "and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth."—Isa. xxv. 8. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."—Matt. v. 5.

—World's Crisis.

From Eld. H. Rockwell.

Br. Storrs: I want not only the help of the promised Comforter to guide me into all truth, but I want all the help I can get from men of liberal, truthful and honest hearts. Men above the influence of flattery or praise. To me it is a sad thought that such men are few and far between. Yet if I understand the word, there might be found a little cluster of them centering around the Herald of Life. One Noah, and eight in family, enough to save your city.

In looking over the paper since I last wrote you, I notice an injunction against writing on the subject of my inquiry. I hope they will excuse my want of conformity to their wishes, as it was not for want of proper deference. As I stated in my last, I wrote with no other object than to arrive at the truth. And having received your Pamphlet and Supplement, I concluded you sent them as an answer to my inquiry. And it arrived at the right time; for just as I had given it a second reading Br. W. S. Spencer's tract, "The Next Dispensation," was put into my hand.

O, my brethren, do not let us foster a feeling of intolerance one to the other; for the onward march of all those pure and sublime truths which have been obscured and hid under the assumed infallibility of popes and men of evil passions, must and will triumph; more especially those of them put forth under the sanction of the promise and oath of God.

With self-abasement and deep humility, let me reverently bow before the mandate of a holy and indulgent Father and God of love, and pour out to him the overflowings of a full heart, that I am permitted to see the clouds begin to recede one after the other. Surely we are walking through the valley and the shadow of death; but if there was no light in the distance there could be no shadow. For one, I am thankful that the dispensation under which we live is probational. Adam's was probational, and so were those of the patriarchs and prophets. Abraham's was probationary, but vastly different from Adam's or ours. And the results of it were as dissimilar from Adam's and ours, as daylight is from darkness. And then if it is the plan of God that probation be perpetuated to all the great future, whether it should correspond with my preconceived ideas or not, I apprehend that God is just as able to accomplish his own work, in his own way, as he was to furnish the lamb for faithful Abraham. O what an example of strong unwavering faith.

Dear brethren and sisters of like precious faith, why are we so sickly? why do we shrink back and denounce any advance in knowledge and love of investigation? O let us, as long as our absent Lord and Life-giver remains away, be vigilent; and if the dust of opposition has in any way injured our vision, take the old telescope of living power and faith, and like Abraham, when pleading for the cities of the plain, let us inquire, Wilt thou destroy the righteous with the wicked? That be far from thee: shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?

New Britain, Conn., July, 1871.

From Nathaniel Richardson.

Br. Storrs: Through the blessing of God I am able to write once more. For about three years I could not write, my nerves were so affected. I did not get out of the house last winter, from December to March; since then, I have been mending slowly. My wife died a year ago last January. We lived together fifty-two years. I have been very lonesome. All the comfort I could take was in reading the Herald of Life, which I read over and over again. I hope you will bear with me while I make my excuse for leaving Knoxville, Iowa, for California. I was lonesome after my wife's death, and thought I would go to see a daughter in this State. A friend gave me a free ticket, and it cost me nothing. I had not seen my daughter for twenty years. When we met you may guess what joy we had in each other's embrace. She has a family of nine children. She, her husband, and son-in-law and his wife all are Life believers. They think they can cure me of my disease, (erysipelas.)

By the blessing of God I mean to spread the glorious cause. How happy I have been in reading the letters and communications in our paper. I have passed through many trials. My son was murdered; had his throat cut from ear to ear, and I lost a good property by his death. I can truly say, God is love, in the midst of all my trials. He will do all things right. I am near eighty-one years old. I mean to try to get some one to send for the Campaign Documents; they would do a great deal of good here.

I hope God will bless you, and preserve your life a little longer to fight the battles of the Lord. I give my best respects to Br. Thorne. I hope he may have health and strength to help you in the good work. Love to all the brothers and sisters.

Hollister, Cal., July 9, 1871.

From William G. Scott.

Br. Storrs: I have taken the Herald of Life for about two years, and am much interested in its contents. The doctrines of immortality and eternal torment, as explained by the Herald, is quite new to many in this place, and has caused some excitement in the churches to protect their members from what they call "The modern heresy." The spread of the doctrines here have been compared to Sampson's foxes with the fire-brands to their tails. It spreads and they don't know how.

I have came in for a good share of abuse from the churches for advocating the doctrines, although I have been a member of the Wesleyan Methodist Church for thirty years.

I wish you to send me your tract, the "Promise and Oath of God to Abraham." I was sorry your article on that subject was discontinued. It is a subject that the Christian world needs information on. It seems to be misunderstood, as is many other doctrines which are revealed in the word of truth.

Guysboro, Nova Scotia, July 17, 1871.

Wm. G. Samson, Albany, N. Y., writes: I have your heavenly paper, and have derived much benefit from it. I feel sorry to give up the Herald. I have lost the use of both my legs for two years past, and have not been able to do a day's work. I am so feeble and poor in this world's goods, that I shall have to give up the paper, as I am unable to pay for it. I hold on to the old advent faith. I enjoy more happiness in my poor heart than I ever enjoyed since our first Tent meeting on Arbor hill, this city, in 1842. I am in my 77th year, and cannot expect to survive much longer. I can truly say, in my last days, I am enjoying my best days in the Lord.

Remark by the Editor.

Br. Samson, your paper will be continued for the present. Your note has called to mind the blessed seasons we had in the "House of Prayer" in Albany, in 1842, and has revived our recollection of yourself, which had long been out of our mind. Let your trust remain firm in God.

One Day at a Time.

"Take no thought for the morrow," that is, no anxious, fretful thought. Walk through to-day, as well as you can, and God will undertake for your future. When you go forward out of to-day, to worry about it, you are over the fence, you are trespassing, and God will scourge you back into your own lot. When I have been fishing in a mountain stream, I have always found that so long as I kept a short line I could manage my fishing very well; but when I let my line run out, the stream took it down, and there I was, at the mercy of every stick that stuck up in the stream, and every rock that jutted out from the banks. I lost my fish and I tangled my line; very likely I lost my footing also, and got over head and ears in the stream. Now, most men have cast out their line into life forty years long, when it ought to be but one day long. In consequence, they are not able to manage their tackle at all; but are pulled after it, stumbling first into this hole, and then into that; slipping up here, and slipping down there, struggling and splashing about in far more distressed fashion than the fish at the other end of the line—and as a general thing, there is no fish there. Haul in your line!—Selected.

"Lead Me, Lead Me."

What does this prayer teach us? Why, that the more mature Christian, if he judges aright, feels that he wants as much to be led in the right way as if he were only beginning the spiritual life. The word seems to be almost humiliating, "Lead me." It is a little child, saying, "Lead me, Mother, lead me." It is more than that; it is a blind man putting out his hand. He cannot see; he cannot find his way; and he is begging, "Lead me." Such babes are we, such blind men are we, apart from the guiding grace of God.

If we have faith in a living God, a Father and Friend of man, who does not only interpose once in a while, but is present always in human affairs, then every man is set to do a work; every man has a mission; a mission determined by his capacities and opportunities; a mission which no one can fulfil but himself, since every man has his proper gift from the Lord. The mission of Jesus differed from that of other men in these two points: that it was the greatest work ever given man to do, and that he saw more clearly what it was than other men see theirs.

Give the mariner a stout ship, a skilful captain, deep water, and plenty of sea-room, and he will be steady through any tempest; because the permanent outbalances the transient. So give the man on this great sea of life, trustworthy reliance on God, let him know that he can trust in the debt and sweep of this divine nature, in the trustiness of these things that are about him; let him see the eternal anchor ready to grapple and hold fast when all else fails, he will cheerfully face any tempest that can ever come.—Robert Collyer.

The Coming Kingdom.

I have heard the glorious tidings
Of a kingdom yet to be;
Over all the earth extending,
Lasting as eternity.
Of a king whose reign of mercy,
Will the suffering nations bless;
Who, in truth and justice,
Will judge in righteousness.

I have heard of earth's redemption
From the ruin sin hath brought;
Of the times of restitution,
By the holy prophets taught;
And my heart exults in prospect,
Of Messiah's glorious reign;
For I've heard creation's moaning
'Neath its heavy load of pain.

I have seen the deaf forbidden
All earth's pleasant sounds to hear;
And the blind, whose darkened pathway,
Earthly beauty might not cheer:
But I know there'll come a morning,
And I long to see its light,
When the deaf ears shall be opened,
And the blind receive their sight.

I have seen the lame and helpless,
Aided by some friendly hand;
I have seen the dumb conversing
By the signs they understand;
And I thought of that sure promise,
When our Lord salvation brings,
Then the lame shall leap for gladness,
And the loosened tongue shall sing.

I have heard the call to battle;
Seen the brave go forth to die;
Read of many a field of carnage,
Where in ghastly heaps they lie:
But when Christ shall reign in Zion,
He will make all wars to cease;
Man no more shall hate his brother,
But shall dwell in quiet peace.

I have stood beside the dying,
Watched the struggle with the foe;
I have seen death gain the victory,
And the wearied ones laid low:
But a mighty voice shall call them
From beneath the cold damp sod,
And they'll wake and live forever,
In the likeness of their God.

Hail, bright morn of restitution,
All creation waits for thee;
Hail Messiah, once rejected,
Rule the world in majesty:
Earth has never known such glory,
As shall rest upon her then;
When her King shall dwell in Zion,
And throughout her borders reign.

The Resurrection: Its Importance.

The Scriptures inform us, that but for resurrection there would be no future life for the dead. How else can we understand the force of the following language: "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die."—1 Cor. xv. 32.

The language just quoted was used in an argument by the apostle Paul against the false doctrine, "that there is no resurrection of the dead." There were some persons among the Christians at Corinth who were teaching this error; and Paul uses various considerations, facts, and remonstrances against the reception of such a belief. The consequence of the non-resurrection of the dead, were it true, would be appalling in the extreme to him and all who, like him, were suffering the loss of all things for Christ. All his efforts and self-denial; all his labors, and sufferings, and persecutions would be vain. "What advantageth me, if the dead rise not?" The Epicureans, who denied all future existence after death, used to stimulate each other to the enjoyment of the pleasure of life by the adage, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die;" and the apostle acknowledges that if the dead were not to rise, then the Epicurean motto would be worthy of adoption as the best course to follow. Most vividly does the language of the apostle show us that, in his estimation, if there were no resurrection there would be no future existence, consequently no reward.

The only way in which the language of the apostle can be understood, in fairness to the judgment of the apostle himself, is to regard it as expressing the idea, No resurrection to future life; and that he used the term die in the sense of utterly and forever ceasing to be.

In the same sense must we understand the term perished, in verse 18. "If Christ be not raised your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins. Then they also who have fallen asleep in Christ are perished." To substitute the notion of misery after death, instead of literal perishing would just do away with all the force of the apostle's argument throughout; for he proceeds all along upon the supposition that it is the fact of a resurrection that alone makes it worth our while to scorn present pleasure and to labor agreeably to the will of Christ. Everything depends on a resurrection of the dead.

The resurrection, viewed in this light, shows us the significance of the Lord's words in John vi. 39, 40. "This is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day. And this is the will of him that sent me, That everyone which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day."

But though a resurrection of the dead is indispensable to the possession of eternal life, a resurrection does not, of itself, secure eternal life to all who are raised. "The wages of sin is death," and "the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord"—a gift of which those who now accept it shall be put in possession "at the resurrection of the just."

The same truth is stated by our Lord in his discourse with the Sadducees (Luke xx. 27–38): "They which shall be accounted worthy to attain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more." How, then, are we to understand the language, "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain . . . the resurrection from the dead?" The secret of its import lies in the fact that it speaks not of the resurrection of, but "the resurrection from the dead." It is only of those classes who shall be accounted worthy to obtain the resurrection from (i. e., out from amongst) the dead;" not from the dead state merely, but out from amongst the dead persons.

What we wish to fix attention upon is the truth, That inability to die any more belongs to those who are "counted worthy to obtain that resurrection from amongst the dead." Language parallel to that in Rev. xx. 6, "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection, on such the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years."

This worthiness to obtain that resurrection from amongst the dead, and so be unable to die any more, can only be possessed by being "In Christ." It is they who are Christ's that rise at his coming. 1 Cor. xv. 23. Thus, again, we have the truth confirmed, that "Eternal life is the gift of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

It is only by so viewing the resurrection from the dead ones as the entrance into life that we can perceive the force of Paul's language in Philippians: "If by any means I may attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Whence his anxiety? Properly translated his words are these: "If by any means I may attain unto the resurrection from amongst the dead ones;" and from the observations already made on the privileges and honor of that resurrection, the all-engrossing desire of the apostle appears most reasonable and significant.

So also his language in Romans viii. 22, 23: "We know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now; and not only they but ourselves also, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption—to wit, the redemption of our body." And in 2 Cor. v. 1–8: "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven. For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed (i. e., bodiless), but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." The apostle, and those like-minded, groaned and longed earnestly for that time when "mortality would be swallowed up of life;" and that glorious event would transpire when they were clothed with their "house which is from heaven"—in other words, when "raised in incorruption."

The language of the apostle here, and elsewhere, plainly asserts that the personality—whether distinct from the body or not—is mortal; for it is mortality that is to be "swallowed up of life" at the resurrection. "The corruptible is to put on incorruption;" "the mortal to put on immortality."—1 Cor. xv. 53, 54. Popular theology is the most palpable inversion of this divine order; for according to it the immortal (soul) puts on immortality. Paul's desire for resurrection from amongst the dead is well accounted for, seeing that it was then that he expected the mortal to put on immortality. So that, granting that Paul believed in a soul, or personality distinct from his body, he had no idea of its being an immortal or incorruptible soul.

For our own part we do not believe that the apostle had any intention of conveying the idea of a distinct, separate, personal, individual existence between death and resurrection. The "our" is not the language of a being dwelling in an earthly house, but the language of a mortal man speaking of himself. The following seems to be a fair representation of the apostle's ideas: "For we know that if we mortal believers were to die, we shall be raised immortal; for as we are we groan, earnestly desiring to be immortalised and freed from our pains; since being so immortalised we shall not be found naked, or in a state of death. For we now groan, being burdened, not that we desire death, but for that glorious change at the coming of the Lord when mortality shall be swallowed up of life."

Resurrection from the dead was the grand hope and desire of the saints mentioned in the Old Testament. Not more fervently did Paul look forward to that event than did the patriarch Job. These are his words: "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God; whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me."—Chap. xix. 25–27. Or David's, when contrasting his destiny with that of "the men of the world, who have their portion in this life," who, satisfied with treasure, leave their substance to their numerous progeny, exclaims, "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness."

It was the hope of the resurrection which also cheered the heart of Israel's Messiah, our own Redeemer, when bearing the burden of our sins in his own body to the tree. "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell (or the grave); thou wilt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption; thou wilt show me the path of life; in thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand are pleasures forevermore."—Psa. xvi. 10, 11.

The prominence given to the resurrection in the New Testament is very remarkable, contrasted with the small place it occupies in modern religious literature; and whence this difference, if not from the circumstance that in the former writings it is regarded in the light we have represented in the foregoing pages—no resurrection, no future or eternal life—while in the latter it is regarded as of comparatively little moment, because the immortality of man's existence, as a conscious being, is altogether independent of his having an organised or bodily constitution. So much so, indeed, that death is regarded, by many, as an emancipation of the soul, or man proper. While our pulpit discourses, and religious publications, from the ponderous, learned volume to the ephemeral and sentimental novel, and rhapsodial hymn, revel in assertions and allusions regarding the eternity of man's future being, the resurrection from the dead is rarely ever mentioned or alluded to.

And herein we see the connection between the common religious belief, regarding human immortality, and the doctrines and beliefs of the Platonic school of heathen philosophy. These heathens wrote and talked much of "the immortality of the soul;" but the resurrection of the dead had no place in their philosophy. It is a strange and startling fact, that just in proportion as our popular theology approaches the doctrine of Plato, in this respect, it recedes from the teaching of Christ and his apostles. The philosophy of Plato has no need of the resurrection of the dead; but remove that item from the doctrine of Christ and his apostles, and it crumbles to pieces. "If there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen; and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and ye are yet in your sins. Then they also who are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. What advantageth it me, if the dead rise not, that I have fought with beasts at Ephesus? [If that be the case] let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die!"

The resurrection of life takes place at the coming of the Lord.

The order of resurrection ordained by God is thus stated. "Christ the first-fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming, then (or afterward,) the end."—1 Cor. xv. 23.

"The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord."—1 Thess. iv. 16, 17. It was the same solace with which the Lord comforted the sorrowing sisters of Lazarus: "Thy brother shall rise again;" "I am the Resurrection and the Life; he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth (i. e., is alive at my coming) and believeth in me shall never die."—John xi. 25, 26. How different this from the solace tendered in these days, to the bereaved, by many of the spiritual guides of the people!

Thus we see that till the return of the Lord there is neither glory nor reward for the Christian. "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just," said our Lord on one occasion, but this resurrection takes place at his return; and hence we find that the second appearing of Christ was the grand centre on which the hopes and expectations of the early Christians were fixed, expressed in words like these: "Our conversation is in heaven; whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."—Phil. iii. 20. "Ye are dead and your life is hid with Christ in God, and when he who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."—Col. iii. 3, 4. "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but to all them also that love his appearing."—2 Tim. iv. 8. And many similar passages which our limits forbid quoting.

Our modern theology reverses all this, by teaching that "The souls of believers are at death made perfect in holiness, and do immediately pass into glory;" so that the return of the Lord, whatever good it may bring to the living peoples of the earth, is of comparatively little moment to the believer; since at death his emancipated spirit wings its way to everlasting bliss. Thus death—the wages of sin—is made to take the Redeemer's place in the hope of the ardent believer; as is but too manifest in the various collections of hymns used by the Protestant assemblies of our country, so much so, indeed, that even when resurrection is the theme, death is celebrated as the deliverer—"The messenger of peace!" The following quotations from the Scotch Paraphrases (a collection of hymns for the most part of a very Scriptural character), will illustrate our statement:

"Why inconsolable as those
To whom no hope is given?
Death is the messenger of peace,
And calls the soul to heaven."

Again:

"Cheer'd by this hope, with patient mind,
I'll wait Heaven's high decree,
Till the appointed period come,
When death shall set me free."

The inversion of the hope of the gospel contained in these lines will at once appear manifest to the reader by his substituting "Christ" for the word "death." Death—the wages of sin—the expression of Jehovah's utter abhorrence of transgression, is made to take the place of the only begotten Son, who laid down his life for the life of the world! How truly verified are the apostle's words, that the time would come when men would turn away their ears from the truth and be turned toward fables! 2 Tim. iv. 4.

Surely it is time that those who know the truth should make it known; that the vain philosophy of heathen ages should be boldly and clearly exposed in the light of God's word; and that the return of the Christ, and the resurrection from the dead, should be held forth as the only hope of the world's deliverance, and the Christian's entrance into glory.—Selected.

Violence and Eagerness.

The too eager pursuit of a thing, hinders the enjoyment. For it makes men take indirect ways, which, though they may prosper sometimes, are never blessed. The covetous, because he is mad upon riches, practiseth injurious courses, which God cursing, bring him to a speedy poverty, or worse. Oppression will bring a consumption upon thy gains, and waste thy soul as well. Wealth snatched up by unjust and injurious ways, like a rotten sheep, will infect thy healthful flock. We think by wrong to hide ourselves from want, when it is that only which unavoidably pulls it on us. Like thieves, that hooking for clothes in the dark, draw the owner, who takes them and imprisons them. He that longs for heaven with such impatience, as to kill himself that he may be there sooner, may by that one act, be excluded thence. Nay, though we be in the right way, our haste will make our journey the longer. He, that rides all upon the gallop, tires his horse before his journey ends; and so is there the later for making such impatient speed. He is like a giddy messenger, that runs away without his errand; and so does nothing. When God hath laid out man a way, in vain man seeks a nearer one. We see the things we aim at, as travellers do towns in hilly countries; we judge them near, because we see not the valleys and the brooks in them, that interpose. So, thinking to take shorter courses, we are led about through ignorance and credulity, and find ourselves in bogs or waters when we might have reached our journey's end. Surely God that made nature, knows her better than imperfect man. And he that is once persuaded of this, will rather stay the leisure of the Deity, than follow the impatient beckonings of his own delusions. We go surest, when we avoid rashness and hurry. Sudden risings have seldom sound foundations. We might sweat less, and accomplish more.

What jealous and envious furies gnaw the burning breast of the ambitious? What fears and cares affright the starting sleeps of the covetous! And when his losses happen, they crush him ten times heavier than they would do the mind of the well-tempered man. All that desire things over violently, do over violently grieve in the disappointment. Whatsoever I wish for, I will pursue it righteously, though I do it assiduously. And if I can, the diligence of my hands shall go linked with a patient, uncomplaining heart. Nor shall my hopes be sanguine. I will do God's will, and he shall fix the result. So if things happen well, I shall have the more content, as coming less expected. Those joys embrace us with a friendlier clasp, that steal upon us when we look not for them. If things fall ill, my mind not being set on this or that, will shun all fretting. God will do all things well.—Selected.

The Butterfly and the Bee.

"Good-morning, neighbor," said a butterfly to a bee whom she met upon a rose-leaf one bright autumn morning. She was a beautiful creature, this painted lady. Her wings were made of the finest, softest feathers; and the pattern on them was inlaid in red and orange and brown and yellow. As she opened and closed them in the sunshine, you could not have helped stopping to admire them. As to the bee, you all know what he would be like—an honest, working fellow, in working dress, intent upon business, and not taking much heed to any thing besides.

So very unlike are bees and butterflies in their habits and ways, that I do not think they often meet for conversation. But it so happens they have one taste in common: they are both very fond of honey-dew.

Honey-dew is that sweet, sticky coating, the work of an insect, which we often find upon the leaves of plants. The butterflies seem to think it an excellent relish for their breakfast; and the bees sip it up, and then in their own clever way, mixed up with other things, they turn it into honey for our eating. So it came to pass, that, the feast being spread upon a rose-leaf, this particular bee and a butterfly met.

The bee was so intent on his occupation, he did not at first hear the salutation. "Good-morning, neighbor," repeated the butterfly: "you are stirring betimes this morning."

"Not sooner than usual," returned the bee. "I am an early riser: we all are. I have a deal of work to get through before night comes—honey to collect and store away, and the store-room walls to build up besides: so I had need begin with the sun."

"May I ask a question?" said the butterfly. "You must excuse my youth and inexperience. You know my experience of life only commenced yesterday, so that I know very little of the ways of the world; but of what use is all this labor, when you might take your pleasure as I do? What is the good of storing away honey, while there is always plenty to be had fresh and sweet from the flowers?"

"As to taking our pleasure," replied the bee, "why, we are always cheerful and happy over our labor; you may know this by our constant humming over it, which is our song of praise. But you ask about the honey; why, we want it for the winter, of course."

"Winter?" repeated the butterfly: "what is winter?"

"Oh! I forgot you did not know. Winter is the time when there are no flowers, no honey dew, not much sun, and nothing to eat. It lasts a long time too; so that we would be in a poor plight if we had not our cupboards full of honey, enough to last us till the spring."

"But how frightful!" cried the butterfly: "it makes me tremble all over to think of it. No sun, no flowers, and nothing to eat, oh! what shall I do! What does become of the butterflies?"

"No, indeed, I know nothing about it," was the bee's ungracious reply: "I never interfere in my neighbors' concerns. I cannot stay any longer now; I must wish you good-morning." So the bee flew away with a cheerful buzz. What good was it to the butterfly that the sun shone still, and the honey-dew was as sweet and her wings as richly painted as they were half an hour before? She could take no pleasure now in opening them and closing them: the brightness was all gone out of the world. She could enjoy nothing all that day; and the next day she hung listlessly upon the rose-leaf where the bee had left her.

Days and weeks passed away, autumn days grew chill, the yellow leaves fell in showers; and then the dreadful winter did come, even as the bee had said.

Snug and cosy in his well-stored home, it mattered not to him nor to his race that the flowers had faded, and that the snow lay thick upon the frozen ground.

Neither did it matter to the butterfly. Long, long before the first snow-flake fell, before the leaves had changed, even before the roses had withered and the honey-dew dried up, the butterfly had crept to the nettle-bed and laid her eggs—the one work she had to do—and then died.

It was never meant she should live to the chilly winter; and so she was never taught, as the bee was, to make provision for it. How foolish, then, it was to trouble herself about it!

But you and I are often just as foolish in vexing ourselves beforehand about things, which, after all, may never happen. You have your troubles. I believe in children's troubles, though grown-up people are very apt to smile at them. They melt away like a passing cloud; but still, while they are there, they are not little to you. You have your difficulties and your crosses only. Other people do not know of them, and you are too shy to speak of them. God, your heavenly Father, in his love sends trouble, whether to children or men and women, for their good.

But, over and above the troubles which God sends, we make them for ourselves by fretting often about something which we think is coming. Perhaps, like winter to the butterfly, it may never come; and, if it does, He who sends it will send us strength, support, and comfort with it.

Be thankful now for God's present gift to you in your happy childhood. He gave it to you to enjoy. And when you grow older, and are tempted to be anxious, or cast down, or distrustful of the future, remember the words written in the Bible, re-written in the experience of every child of God, echoed back to you by every living creature which his hand has made—"The Lord will provide."—[London] Child's Companion.

The Charity that Covereth.

"Dear moss!" said the old thatch, "I am so worn, so patched, so ragged; really, I am quite unsightly. I wish you would come and cheer me up a little; you will hide all my infirmities and defects, and, through your loving sympathy, no finger of contempt or dislike will be pointed at me."

"I come!" said the moss; and it crept up and around, and in and out, till every flaw was hidden, and all was smooth and fair. Presently the sun shone out; and the old thatch looked gloriously in the golden rays.

"How beautiful the thatch looks!" cried one.

"How beautiful the thatch looks!" cried another.

"Ah!" cried the old thatch, "rather let them say how beautiful is the loving moss, that spends itself in covering all my faults, keeping the knowledge of them all to herself, and by her own grace making my age and poverty wear the garb of youth and luxuriance."—Selected.

Overcoming Temptation.—A little child of only five years was strongly tempted to help herself to some peaches which lay in a basket on the table, but she resisted. Her mother coming into the room, and seeing her flushed with the excitement of the struggle, asked: "What ails you, my child?"

"O mother!" she exclaimed, "I wanted so much to take one of the peaches; but I thought I would first ask God if he had any objection."

A Bible View of Hell:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus; Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

INHERENT IMMORTALITY.

THIS subject is getting quite a ventilating in the "New York Sunday Herald." The Editor of that paper made a defence of the heresy a few Sunday's since. The following response was made Sunday, July 23d:

THE GOSPEL SCHEME OF SALVATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD: I have been much interested in the perusal of the leading articles in Sunday's "Herald" of the 16th instant, especially the one headed "Is Man Immortal?" in which you have done me the honor to make frequent reference to a few remarks of mine in a letter to the "Herald," published on the 2d instant, and in reply to which permit me to say, in the first place, that for many years I thought on the subject as you think. I accepted the popular mode of Scripture interpretation, taking for granted that professional Bible students and public teachers ought to know best. But at length I was induced to make a personal investigation of the entire source of religious belief, and soon found, to my astonishment, that the "one-half had never been told me," and that very much of what had been told me was "not according to sound doctrine." The more I investigated the more I was convinced of the doctrinal errors of popular theology; and this fact induced me to investigate carefully, and, as I hope, thoroughly, every portion of the sacred writings in a systematic way. And I may here remark that no desultory mode of searching the Scriptures, if continued for life, will enable any one to arrive at a clear knowledge of the gospel scheme of salvation. Nothing but the most systematic study of the sacred oracles will disclose the plan of redemption. Such a mode of research will soon reveal the fact that religion is a holy science, and that it must be studied as a science to be fully comprehended. A long course of private investigation has demonstrated that the doctrine of man's immortality is not once asserted and that it is a thousand times denied. All the assertions of all the clergy in Christendom will never convince me to the contrary. It would be as impossible for me to believe in the "soul's immortality," after my own investigation on the subject, as it would be for you to believe me if I told you that two and two are six. If you desired to be of my opinion on the point you could not. Just so with me on the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. While I was ignorant of the Scriptures I believed it; now I know better, I cannot.

I am, sir, totally unacquainted with the "Free Religion Association" mentioned in your interesting article, and I have made no attempt to "apologize" for any religious creed but my own. A blind, uniutelligent belief is no belief, and is "sure to err." Popular belief is taken for granted; and no one really knows whether any of it is true or false, and many of them don't care so they are spared the trouble of searching the Scriptures for themselves. Many of what I may term the "working class" of the human race in all countries are daily so much exhausted in body and mind, in laboring for "the bread that perisheth," that they have neither time, inclination nor mental power to investigate for themselves. The mental, moral and religious nature of the class, so far as they are individually responsible for the cultivation of either, is by the wealthy class and the priesthood entirely ignored. Whatever religious knowledge they may have must be supplied, for a pecuniary consideration, by the licensed clergy, who give them whatever they choose, and make it a sin to question the genuineness of the article supplied. This system goes on through life, and the great mass never really know any more about the gospel plan of redemption than Hottentots.

I am pleased to see you confess "we admit there is no such declaration in words (as the soul's immortality) in any part of the Bible." My heart always leaps at the annunciation of any great and important biblical fact. "But," you add, "when facts are stated which presuppose the immortality of the soul we cannot see what additional force a verbal declaration would give them." On this point, permit me, sir, to ask a question:—if God, through the medium of prophets and apostles, has failed to declare, "in so many words," in any portion of the holy Scriptures, that man has within him an immortal soul which survives the dissolution of the body, and can exist independent of it, upon what foundation, upon what authority are facts stated which presuppose the declaration of such a doctrine?

The Bible contains the only revelation of God to man; and if God has not revealed "in so many words" in any part of it such a doctrine, where is the testimony that such a declaration as the soul's immortality has ever been made? If God has nowhere revealed it in so many words, who else had the right or authority to announce it? That God should be silent and leave the human race in doubt on such an important subject is incomprehensible. That such a doctrine should be left for support and confirmation to "facts stated which presuppose the truth of a declaration which God has never made to man," is most extraordinary. Who can believe it?

The whole of the Scriptures are of Jewish origin. Every word of the sacred MSS. was penned by Jews. To what other nation has God ever revealed a plan for their redemption? From what other nation of the Adamic race have we received a single doctrine claiming God for its author? And if the only revelation we have contains no declaration of the soul's immortality, where could it have come from but, as I have before asserted from heathen sources? It emanated from that "vain philosophy" of Greece and Rome, against which Paul found it necessary to warn the churches of his day. It originated in heathen reasoning unaided by the light of divine revelation. Those who know the doctrine is false, also see that its propagation has been one of the greatest curses of the Christian dispensation. And this fact will become visible to all when the "veil is taken away from the face of all nations," and the truth appears in native beauty before the astonished gaze of a deluded world.

You say "if it (the doctrine of the soul's immortality) can be successfully denied, very much of what mankind now believes and has for ages believed must be cast aside as worse than useless—as positively mischievous;" and I may add, some of it positively blasphemous. The statement is as true as the gospel; and "pity 'tis, 'tis true."

King David in one of his psalms declares that when a man dies "in that very day his thoughts perish." When a man is dead and his thoughts perished we think it would puzzle an exceedingly clever anatomist to say what there is of him left alive. The spiritual mystification of religion for trade purposes has almost banished apostolic teaching and practice from the face of the earth. Were the doctrine of the soul's immortality true, we should have had "line upon line" on the subject, running like a "silken cord" through the whole of the Scriptures; whereas all men, even those who advocate it, are compelled to confess that "it is not to be found in so many words from Genesis to Revelations." Its advocates must feel this to be a very inconvenient as well as a very stubborn fact. But they leave the Bible and take refuge in Plato. It is, therefore, self-evident that it is one of the "traditions and dogmas of men," to be avoided like a pestilence. If God has not revealed such a doctrine where else is it source? Till this question is satisfactorily answered its apologists are merely "begging the question" by asking us to believe it.

The faith of a true Christian is based upon what is true, not upon what may appear to some expedient to teach, whether or not it is believed by those who teach it. A great deal too much of such worldly motive and policy for a thousand years has prevailed in the Church, and it is time a purer system was inaugurated if we are ever to arrive at a correct knowledge of Gospel truth.

I am fully persuaded, that you, sir, are sincerely desirous that Truth only should prevail, and that none more than yourself would rejoice to publish it to the world. I comprehend "the situation." I, myself was not convinced in a day nor a year, and confess myself to-day only a babe in biblical lore compared with what may be known by a persistent study of the sacred record. One thing is certain, it must be studied systematically, the same as any of the sciences. Read in any other way it is impossible ever to discover the plan or scheme of redemption from the consequences of the "fall." From beginning to end the Bible is a holy science; and this fact accounts for the fact that "few there be that find it." Those who would discover it must search as men search the bowels of the earth for hidden treasures. But "who will believe our report?" Who would not rather enjoy a life of mental laze "eat, drink and be merry," and give a priest the "tenth" of all they possess to think for them, than "search out their own salvation with fear and trembling?" Such is corrupt, depraved, besotted human nature; it is as bad now as it was at the "flood." And "as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be at the second coming of the Son of Man."

One thing I deem of importance I forgot to mention, namely, the fact that just in proportion as the heathen dogma of the immortality of the soul became popular in the Church the scriptural doctrine of a resurrection, so frequently announced in the writings of the New Covenant, was ignored. Can any bishop, priest or layman, explain this clerical inconsistency? If so, let him do it at once, or "for ever after hold his peace."

I am informed that very few intelligent persons now believe the doctrine of the resurrection. This astounding assertion was forwarded to me in a letter a few days ago.

In the apostolic age the doctrine of a resurrection was considered the only sure guarantee of a future life. What a gulf between the Gospel of the first and that of the nineteenth century! E. T.

ROME AND THE FUTURISTS.

MONDAY, July 3. To-day Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy, with his ministers and the representatives of foreign nations, entered the City of Rome, as the future political Capital of Italy. The Popes had held the "eternal city" for long ages. But the judgment has set and their dominion is taken away. The Pope is now a simple bishop in Rome, and Victor Emmanuel, the heretic is King. The Pope has protested and all nations have been appealed to for help. But he comes to the end of his temporal power, and there is none to help him. And so the Scripture is fulfilled before our eyes. "But the judgment shall sit and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy unto the end." (Dan. vii. 26.)

With all the evidence of the rise, triumphs and fall of the Papacy, the man of sin of 2 Thess. ii. 1–8, and little horn of Dan. vii. 21–26, we have expositors in Europe and America who teach that the fourth kingdom of Daniel's prophecy, and the "man of sin," are yet to rise.

While the Lord delays his coming there are many things coming up that greatly try the faith, as well as the patience of the waiting ones. For if we have not had the "great tribulation," in the long reign and triumph of the Papal power; if the prophecies of Daniel and John, as applied by Potestants for ages, are not fulfilled, then it would appear to men of sense who wait and watch for Christ on the ground of their fulfilment, that the whole matter becomes a mystery, an unsolved enigma. Darkness and doubt clothe the whole subject, where all was light and hope before.

If the futurist expositors are the true exegetes, then the whole Church has been in darkness up to this time. If, as the futurists say, the four great monarchies of Daniel ii. and vii. have not yet risen, and, consequently, the little horn of the fourth kingdom has not yet come up, or "made war with the saints" (Dan, vii. 21–22); or if the book of Revelation is yet to be fulfilled; if the "two horned beast," has not risen (Rev. ch. xiii.); if the "two witnesses," (Rev. xi. 2–14,) have not yet risen, been slain or raised; if six of the trumpets of Rev. viii. to xi. have not been fulfilled; if the "Second woe is not past" (Rev. xi. 14,) then, we as a people are without light! We have nothing to stand on, and, worst of all, our preaching for the past thirty years has been without foundation. We have simply been teaching falsehood in the name of the Lord! A sad conclusion indeed, but nevertheless a true one, if the futurist theory is correct. Beloved brethren of the Advent faith, is it really worth our while in this "hour of temptation" and "trial of our faith," to seriously inquire whether, indeed the Adventists with the great Reformers and the Protestant world have all been deceived, and that Mr. Maitland the futurist leader of England, and Dr. Seiss of America, are the only men who have light on the prophetic word? Can we after our study of the prophetic word, and tracing its fulfilment in the history of the nations and the church, give up all the evidence we have and the convictions it has enforced? In other words, shall we scuttle the old ship, and sink all hopes we have so fondly cherished, and pervert the cause that has borne not only the seal of our toil, cares and tears, but of the blessing of God himself? I trust not.

I do not object to the futurist views because they are new, but because they are absurd and not true. Many new things are true. But in this case the new things are fanciful and without proof. Many of these futurist views were connected with Louis Napoleon's career, as the supposed Anti-christ. But this man of destiny, has had quite a different destiny from what was anticipated. And when after this failure we are asked to believe that we are yet to see two men literally vomiting fire on their adversaries; literal locusts, horse-shaped, with crowned heads, women's hair, men's faces, lion's teeth, and scorpion's tails armed with literal stings, to torment men, (they would be more like to kill them with fright); literal horses with lion's heads, spitting fire and brimstone; that a literal flaming mass will be thrown into the Mediterranean, turning it to blood; that a third of the literal water of the earth will become wormwood tea; that a third part of the day and a third part of each night will be literally dispensed with—but we forbear. In this case we are reminded of our Saviour's words: "No man after he has drank old wine, straightway desireth new: for he saith, the old is better!" So it will prove with most of the old Adventists. They will decide that the old wine is the best.—Eld. J. V. Himes.

WE should continually examine ourselves whether we are arguing for the love of truth or the love of triumph.

"TIME OF THE END."

"THE words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end." Dan. xii. 9.

We are come to the Time of the End. Israel were to be punished Seven Times, as being cast out among the Gentiles, and made Lo-ammi, over and above what they were to suffer in the land, and as bearing the name of Israel. These Seven Times commenced when Ephraim, the first born, was cut off that they should not be a people. Then were they to come under the burden of Damascus, a Gentile people, which is predicted Isa, xvii.—Then were they to be lost as Ephraim or Israel. Then were they to become Lo-ammi as predicted, Hos. i. Their peculiar designation being taken from them, they were of course not to be distinguished, as to name, from the common Gentiles. The commencement of this period is noted Is. vii. "Within threescore and five years shall Ephraim be broken, that it be not a people."—Then were they to lose the name of Ammi, my people. Isaiah is said to have delivered that prophecy, seven hundred and forty years before the coming of Christ. Take sixty-five from that number, and we have six hundred and seventy-seven, as the year of Israel's political decease. The period during which they were to be punished as undistinguished from the Gentiles, was seven times as predicted, Lev. xxvi. 18, 21, 24, 28; which punishment was to take place after their being devoured by disease, v. 16, and by famine, v. 19, 20, and by beasts of the earth, 22, and by the sword, and by the accumulation of all these sore judgments wherewith the Lord threatened to punish them whilst recognized as his people, v. 25, 26. These seven times form the great prophetic week of prophecy.

Sometime the half of this week is called twelve hundred and sixty days, or three hundred and sixty,—the number of days in a prophetic year, multiplied by three and a half. The same period is called forty-two months:—forty-two times thirty, the number of days in a prophetic month, being the same number, of twelve hundred and sixty. The two half weeks or whole seven times, make two thousand five hundred and twenty. Now the six hundred and seventy-seven years before Christ, and eighteen hundred and forty-three since, make just the same number of two thousand five hundred and twenty. A day, we know from several parts of the prophetic word, is given to represent a year, when typical language is made use of. So reckoning, we are come to the end of the times of the Gentiles, the period during which Israel, and especially Ephraim, was to be confounded among the Gentiles, and during which the city was to be trodden under foot of other nations. Now is the book to be opened, "The vision of All" is to be disclosed. Now are we come, not indeed to the end of time, as some has supposed, but to the "Time of the End." Of which time it is predicted that many run to and fro, and knowledge would be increased:—now are we come to the time for the manifestation of the truth of God, as to the punishment and blessing of his people Israel, and the approaching glorious reign of Messiah their Prince.

A prime error, with regard to this subject, has been the limiting the term of Israel to the Jews, a very small portion of the people, and indeed not at all the people chiefly concerned in the predictions referred to. The Jews are not of Ephraim, in whom the threatening was fulfilled, and in whom the resurrection, as in the valley of dry bones, Ezek. xxxvii. is promised to be accomplished. The Jews were never lost as to name, as were the sheep of the house of Israel—as were the tribes more particularly for whom Christ became a servant, to raise them up, that he might also be for salvation to the ends of the earth: Is. xlix. 6.

The confounding together of Israel and Judah has brought much confusion into the views which men entertain of the prophetic word; on account of which confusion many have sought excuse for their utter rejection of that word; whilst others have been led to deny its application to the natural descendants of Abraham, and indeed its literal import altogether. Some have contented themselves with confused dreams on the subject out of which they have obstinately refused to be awakened even by their own most glaring inconsistencies.

The crudities which have been indulged in cannot, however, now long suffice. The time of the end in which we are now, requires, that knowledge should be increased on this subject as well as upon others. The need of it has been sufficiently apparent. Israel and their King are the great subjects of prophecy: the key to the predictions respecting Israel has been wanting. The true case of Ephraim has not been recognized. The calculation has been made without reference to the first-born, the heirs in Christ of the promises made unto the fathers. In some eminent students of prophecy in our own day, there was besides, an anti-christian leaven which ultimately corrupted their whole system; leaving in the public mind, a most fatal nausea of the truth itself, because of the evil which was contrived to intermingle therewith. It will be our earnest endeavor to assist in recovering both those who have fallen into that awful share, and also those who because of it, have fallen out of all consideration of the sure word of prophecy. May God give us faithfulness to manifest the heart and mind of our dear Lord.

In America in 1843 the Second Advent doctrine was comparatively new. Here many have been awakened from their long and deep slumber. Some great points they have realized. The second coming of Christ is very near, the resurrection at the same time of the saints, his glorious reign with these over the earth they have seen. These are great truths, but they are not the whole truth. So far from it, that our brethren have been left to form as the foundation of their system, five principles, the first four of which are directly opposed to the plain testimony of scripture; and the fifth is already contradicted by the fact, that the world has survived the times set, at which they fixed its destruction, and the second advent of our Lord. The time of the opening of the Book and the manifestation of Israel, they confounded with the entire completion of the present dispensation; and they have connected with the Lord's second coming, circumstances which do not occur.

The earth shall continue to be inhabited by men; by those that shall be preserved of Israel, and of the nations after the judgments have been poured out upon the wicked at the time of our Lord's second advent, and the resurrection of the saints. Then the glorified saints shall be given power over the nations, and have full authority to punish, and have marvelous means of blessing those under their dominion. Sin and its punishment among the inhabitants of the earth shall not then as now descend from sire to son, but every one shall die for his own iniquity: The man that eateth the sour grape his teeth shall be set on edge. Thus purely and immediately shall justice take place; and so shall peace be established unto the ends of the earth. Those means that are now wasted in destructive war, shall be turned into the multiplication of blessing, under the ministration of the King that shall reign in righteousness, and the princes that shall rule in judgment. Thus shall not only the saints be exalted into glory, but thus shall the creature itself be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. The whole resources of nature shall develop themselves to their fullest extent, under the blessed sway of the saints. They shall then with their Lord be kings and priests and they snall reign on the earth.—Selected.

THE "INFALLIBLE POPE."

THIS personage seems to be in various troubles, as all such pretenders are, sooner or later. Dr. Dollinger, the valiant protestant in the Ecumenical Council, and since against the dogma of Papal infallibility, though excommunicated by the Pope, still holds on his way against that blasphemous claim.

The Eastern Budget says that demonstrations of sympathy and approval, elicited in all parts of the Catholic world by Dr. Dollinger's protest against the doctrine of infallibility, have so alarmed the Holy See that it has made overtures to him with a view to counteracting the opposition which is everywhere manifesting itself against the Papal pretensions:—

"An Austrian bishop, Monsignor Fessler, Secretary of the Council, was first entrusted with this difficult task. He represented to Dr. Dollinger that the Council is not yet closed, and that it would therefore be possible to agree in promulgating a new definition of Papal infallibility. This definition might be made, either by the Pope or by the Council, a matter of theological doctrine instead of a dogma, and would thus lose its dogmatic importance. Bishop Fessler added that such a settlement of the question would be accepted by the great majority of the German and Hungarian opposition in the Council, and also by Cardinal Rauscher. The Bishop therefore proposed that Dr. Dollinger should, so long at least as the matter remains undecided, refrain from raising up a public opposition against the Church, the Council and the Pope, and preserve the Church from a fatal schism. Dr. Dollinger positively refused to accept this proposal. A week after he received a visit from another Papal emissary, Canon Lammer, of Bresslau. The canon who had just returned from the jubilee festival, said that the Pope still spoke of Dr. Dollinger with the greatest sympathy; that he prayed for his return to the path of truth, and by no means despaired of his renouncing his erors. To this Dr. Dollinger replied that he was grateful for the Pope's good will, which, however, could extend to his body only, as his soul had been excommunicated. Upon this Dr. Lammer observed that the Holy Father still hopes to find means of arriving at an arrangement, and that perhaps the best mode of achieving this object would be for Dr. Dollinger to put himself in communication with the Papal Nuncio. This suggestion, however, was as fruitless as the previous one. Dr. Dollinger said he had no communication to make to the Nuncio, and that if the latter wished to see him he would hear what he had to say, as in the case of any other visitor."

FROM SYRIA J. BRANSON.

BR. STORRS: Through the mercies and kindness of our heavenly Father, I am permitted again to write to the dear HERALD.

I am still doing battle for the glorious doctrine of Life future and eternal only through Jesus Christ.

Sometime since I received a challenge from Rev. Dr. J. H. Johnson, to meet and discuss the following subject—he affirming, viz:

The Scriptures teach that man is constituted of body and soul; that the soul is immortal; it will never die but live to all eternity; consequently the bodies of the wicked and the righteous will be resurrected to life, or everlasting existence, and receive their reward in heaven, or be tormented with the beast and false prophet in hell to all eternity.

We met on the 8th of July. at Middleton, Wayne Co., Ills., at 10 o'clock A. M. He commenced his argument by saying we had had some very smart men; instanced Webster and Dr. Franklin. Dr. Franklin had bottled up the thunder and lightning; but none of them with all their shrewdness, had ever made the discovery that a certain P. M. at Hickory Hill had, viz: That the soul was not immortal. He said, Man was created in the image and likeness of God; that God was a Spirit without body or parts, and filled immensity of space; and that man, to be in his image, must be like him in this respect.

Oh, what folly, what presumption, what blasphemy. I showed the absurdity of this; showed that man had body and parts; that he did not fill immensity of space; did not have the attributes of omniscience, omnipotence, nor omnipresence; that the image could not consist in having these attributes, but was a unit; showed that if man was constituted of soul and body, it took both soul and body to make the man; consequently, when soul and body were dissolved, or disunited, the man ceased to be; there was no man, because neither of those parts separately was the man, for it takes all the parts to make the whole: showed that Adam, a living soul, died; that souls had been killed with the edge of the sword; had been destroyed; cut off; consumed; "every living soul died that was in the sea;" that man is mortal, and only can get immortality through Jesus Christ that the resurrection came by Jesus, and not by an immortal soul entity, for Jesus is the LIFE-GIVER; is the resurrection and the life; none can attain unto the resurrection of life from the dead but those who have a union with this great source of life; Christ is the end of the law to every one that believeth; the sting or cause of death is sin; the strength or power of sin is the law; this being the case, the sting or cause of death cannot be removed until the strength or power of sin is made an end of; Jesus is the end of the law to him that believeth; those that believe in Jesus have their sins forgiven, consequently they cannot be holden forever by the power or dominion of death, but will get the victory over the last enemy—death—through Jesus, who is the end of the law to every one that believeth.

There can be no future life to those that have died but by a resurrection from the dead, because if the dead rise not, then they also which have fallen asleep in Christ have perished. How could it be possible for them to perish if they have a soul entity—so-called by immortal soulists—that survives death and is the real man, is never dying and never dies?

Further, how could there be a resurrection of the dead if the man never dies? Still further, where would there be any dead to be resurrected? How could the sea give up the dead persons that were in it, or death and hell deliver up the dead persons that were in them, if the personality consists in an immortal soul entity that cannot die? Further, I would ask, how such a hell, as is the theological one, could be a repository for that which is dead?

Mr. J. was entirely at a loss for argument. He had made a list of a great many texts and did not much but hunt out those texts and read them—nearly all were irrelevant—without comment. When asked to give an exposition, he would say, "I have not got time; I am afraid I will not get through my texts."

Yours, hoping for Life through Jesus, the way, the truth and the life.

Brotherly Love.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

DAVID, the sweet singer of Israel, the man after God's own heart, wrote, "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." Then he beautifully compares this brotherly union to the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the breast, even Aaron's beard: that went down to the skirts of his garments.

The Lord God gave the prescription for that oil, also the anointing, and who should not love to have seen it flowing down upon Aaron's beard and the skirts of his garments? All will say it must have been a beautiful sight. Well, David, the man after God's own heart, and his opinion must be worth something, says it was just like brethren dwelling together in unity.

Further he writes, it is as the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion; for there the Lord commanded the blessing; and what is that blessing? Life for evermore. O, bless the Lord!

When that for-evermore life is attained, brethren will dwell together in unity; but we rather think in order to have it then, we must begin soon. He of whom it was said, "Never man spake like this man," said, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one to another." If we have love one to another, and dwelling together in unity, then what!

Paul, the great apostle to the Gentiles, exhorts, yea, beseeches, to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called; with all lowliness and meekness, with long suffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of love. One body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all. He gives, and sends different laborers, but what for? For the perfecting of the saints; till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. We are to speak the truth in love, so that we may grow up into him in all things, which is the Head even Christ. Then comes the body. Let us think of that Head, Christ, and mark what sort of a body. It is fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part; maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love.

The Head perfect, and no schism in the body; each member doing its own part; thus making increase of the body, and itself being edified in love.

Upon such, God can, and does, and will smile; and then the blessing will be poured down, even life forever more. O, praise the Lord. Let us follow after the things that make for peace and the edifying of one another.

We may often be cut down and mortified, and our pride humbled; but all that is good for us. That charity or love which Paul speaks of in Corinthians, is not of natural growth. Still, without it we are nothing, even if we speak with the tongues of men or or angels, or have the gift of prophecy, or understand all mysteries, or have all knowledge, bestow our goods to feed the poor, even give our bodies to be burned. Without love all profits nothing.

Paul, in order that we be not deceived, describes this charity or love. It suffers long, and is kind. O, how trying that is! It envies not, boasts not, is not puffed up, does not behave itself unseemly, seeks not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil. Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

All that seems pretty strong, but he don't try to soften it down any, only finishes by saying, Charity never fails.

What is more if we have not that love here fully described, we are nothing; and if nothing must certainly fail of that blessed "Life for evermore."

Charity or love and humility are becoming to us, because we only yet know in part. By and by that which is perfect will be come, then that which is imperfect shall be done away. Now we see through a glass darkly, pretty soon face to face. Then we will know as we are known, yes know all about it. Till then let us cultivate faith, love, patience, meekness.

NEW YORK, July, 1871.

ELD. J. LEWIS, at Oconee, Ill., writes: Our beloved brother and faithful laborer in the blessed cause, Br. S. L. Walter, is very sick. He complained for several days before he took his bed, but still kept preaching almost every night until July 19, when we arrived at our beloved Br. and Sr. Babcock's, where he soon took his bed, with what the doctors call, the "milk fever." It is nine days since we came here, and there are but faint hopes of his recovery for many days to come. We desire an interest in your prayers. Dear brethren, let me say, Br. Walter is in need of help and far from home. I have done all in my power with my scanty means.

Direct to ELD. S. L. WALTER, (care of Wm. Babcock), OCONEE, Shelby Co., Ill.

Note by the Editor.

We trust Br. Walter will receive the needed aid. He has labored hard, with self-sacrifice, in the West; while age (70 or 71, we think) makes it still more imperative that he should have timely assistance.

"First Fruits."

THE presents were so-called which the Hebrews made to God, consisting of part of the fruits of their harvest, to express their submission and dependence, and to acknowledge the sovereign dominion of God, the author of all blessings and enjoyments.

The day after the feast of the Passover they brought a sheaf into the temple, as the first fruits of the barley harvest. The sheaf was threshed in the court; and of the grain that came out they took a full homer; that is, about three pints. After it had been well winnowed, parched and bruised, they sprinkled over it a log of oil; i. e., near a pint. They added to it a handful of incense; and the priest that received this offering shook it before the Lord towards the four-quarters of the world; he cast part of it upon the altar, and the rest was his own. After this, every one might begin their harvest. (Lev. xxiii. 10—.) This was offered in the name of the whole nation, and by this the whole harvest was sanctified unto them; that is, the Barley-harvest.

When the wheat-harvest was over, that is, the day of Pentecost, they offered again first fruits of another kind, in the name of all the nation, which consisted of two loaves of two tenth-deals: that is, of about three pints each. The loaves were made of leavened dough. Lev. xxiii. 15–20. Does not our Lord allude to this in Luke xiii. 20—"Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God? It is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened."

It will be seen by the foregoing statements that there were two offerings, and at different periods, which are called "first fruits." These types point out the antitypes. No one doubts but that the first fruit at the Passover points to Christ as the first fruit from the dead. But there is another first fruit. Who are these that attain to that honor? John speaks of them Rev. xiv. 1–5. There he sees a company of "a hundred forty and four thousand." These he saw standing with the "Lamb on mount Sion;" and it is said of them, "These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. These were redeemed from among men, being the first-fruits unto God and to the Lamb." Do not these constitute the "Bride, the Lamb's wife?" Rev. xix. 7, and xx. 9.

Whatever may be thought of them, they are a first-fruit. The first-fruits are often spoken of in the law and the prophets, and must have a significance, pointing to something then future. The barley harvest first-fruits came first; as we have seen, and all admit this pointed to Christ. Fifty days later, viz., at the Pentecost, came the wheat harvest first-fruits, which consisted in two-loaves. These were the second parcel of the first-fruits. Did not this typify "They that are Christ's at his coming?" 1 Cor. xv. 23.

That those gathered to God in Christ in the present and past dispensations are distinguished as "first-fruits" is clearly seen from Scripture testimony. Jer. ii. 3. "Israel was holiness to the LORD, and the first-fruits of his increase." James says, "Of his own will [the Father] begat us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruit of his creatures."—Jas. i. 18.

It will be observed that after the presentation of the first-fruits to God the main harvest followed. This was true in relation both to the barley and the wheat harvest; the first of which occurred in the first month; and the second not later than the third month. After these, in the seventh month, came the feast of tabernacles, "when they have gathered in the fruit of their land." Lev. xxiii. 39. The conclusion of the gathering in of the fruit of the land was some four months after the first-fruits of the wheat harvest. Does not our Saviour refer to this when he said to his disciples, "Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh the harvest: behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest?" John iv. 35. As much as to say, Hasten to gather the first-fruits, and not wait for the later harvest, which is sure to follow in its time: now is the time to harvest the wheat; that is, the early fruit; the later fruits will come in their season. It takes a longer time and a hotter sun to mature and ripen some fruits than others. The barley and the wheat must first be gathered; at a later period, various other fruits of the earth, or land, will be matured. Beside, it is true that "one soweth and another reapeth;" (John iv. 37); the work is not all done at once, nor by one class of laborers.

God's time for the development of the fruits of the earth are of his own ordering and in "His own power," and we cannot order them nor hasten the work. We are to do such work as He appoints us, and wait patiently for the manifestation of the maturity of God's wise and glorious purposes in the creation of the earth and men upon it. His scheme will not be frustrated or defeated, whatever may be the ignorance or folly of men, which is enough to defeat and destroy any plan of good, however magnificently laid out, were it not that the wisdom, knowledge and power of JEHOVAH, guided by His matchless love for the race, are all pledged to bring out a perfect regeneration and "restitution of all things which He hath spoken, by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began," from the declaration concerning "the seed of the woman," which will surely "bruise" the "head of the serpent" evil, and bring all things into a state of purity and peace, and the "head stone" shall be brought forth with "shoutings of, Grace, grace unto it." "As for God, his way is perfect," (2 Saml. xxii. 31); and when He began this world, He did not commence blind, or ignorant of the results, or unprepared for any and everything which might take place; but with wisdom, power, and love enough to make good to come to all the works of his hands, from the evil that might, for a time, be suffered to exist; but, in the end, be made to magnify the riches of His grace, and the boundless nature of the love which existed in His heart from the outset of the work of creating this world and men to inhabit it.

Poor blind mortals are we, who attempt to limit the Almighty in his work of love and mercy to the creatures He has made and for whom Christ died. "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him freely give us all things."—Rom. viii. 32. "For when we were without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly." . . . "God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."—Rom. v. 6, 8. "God is love." . . . "Hereby know we that we dwell in him because he hath given us of his spirit" of "love." "He that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God and God in him."—1 John iv. 8, 13, 16.

Materialism and Spiritualism.

A HIGHLY esteemed minister of the Methodist church, in a private letter, said to us, on what he called our "full-grown materialism:"

"If, as you claim, your exegesis of Scripture is correct, and you can find such rank materialism there, it is one of the greatest mysteries to me that earnest students of the Bible, and honest, unbiased searchers for truth have not, at some time in five centuries past stumbled upon the same peculiar doctrines. Why should it be reserved for the Nineteenth Century that such a discovery of truth be made? If, as you believe, the true 'Pauline Theology' be what you promulgate weekly, why do we not find it declared, maintained and defended for the first century or even centuries after Christ?"

It has not been our study to know what the so-called "Fathers" in the first centuries after the apostles, taught. We long since learned that no certain reliance could be placed on their teachings. They were not inspired; and it is certain that "corrupters of the word" existed in the professed church before the apostles closed their ministry. Hence Paul saith, "We are not as many, which corrupt the word of God," etc.—2 Cor. ii. 17. And again he says, "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men," etc.—Col. ii. 8. And in addressing the elders of the church of Ephesus, he says, "I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock; also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them."—Acts xx. 29, 30.

If these things were so while the apostles were alive, have we not every reason to conclude the truth was sadly corrupted soon after their death? And this corruption culminated in the abominable scheme known as Popery, out of which flood of corruptions of the word of God Protestantism has but just emerged, and has not yet washed her garments white from that corrupting system.

If appeal is to be made to the theology of the first centuries after the apostles, almost any vagary can be established; for it is difficult to tell what branch of heathen philosophy was not grafted on to the professed Christianity of those centuries. We learned, years ago, that appeals to the "Fathers" were of no value. If they had truth they learned it from the Scriptures; and if they learned it there, so can we, and much more certainly, because we have the word in a more accessible condition.

We therefore reject all theories, speculations and traditions of uninspired men, and go at once to the fountain, the word of God itself. There we find "the true 'Pauline Theology,'" which we "promulgate weekly," "declared, maintained and defended" in all its fulness and glory. That word is our only chart. We call not in question the sincerity of "earnest students of the Bible," nor their "honesty;" but when you ask us to admit their searching was "unbiased," you ask more than we can grant. Can the man be found, for the past "five centuries," who, however much he desired "truth," has sought it unbiased by any of the traditions of men, and his own early training, or the unavoidable circumstances with which he was surrounded? or if he discovered truth outside of the theology of his day, dared to brave public sentiment by promulgating it, at all hazards? Take Martin Luther himself. He discovered that the doctrine of the "immortality of the soul" was a "Roman dunghill decretal." See his "Defence," prop. 27, published 1530. But did he dare maintain the fight, unwaveringly, amid the odium brought on him, for this belief, by his fellow reformers? How many more have seen the same truth since, and like him have recoiled at the furious opposition with which they have been assailed, and have kept silence, who can tell us? Did not Bishop NEWTON reject the doctrine of eternal torments? See his works, London edition of 1787, Dissertation No. 60, "On the final state and condition of men." He says, "Hell, as a place of torment, is nowhere mentioned in the writings of Moses," etc. After this, he goes on to explain the terms translated hell in the Bible. At length he says:

"Nothing can be more contrary to the divine nature and attributes than for a God all-wise, all-powerful, all-good, all-perfect, to bestow existence on any beings whose destiny he foresees and foreknows must terminate in wretchedness and misery, without recovery or remedy, without respite or end. . . . 'God is love;' and he would rather have not given life than render that life a torment and curse to all eternity. . . . Imagine a creature, nay, imagine numberless creatures produced out of nothing . . . delivered over to torments of endless ages, without the least hope or possibility of relaxation or redemption. Imagine it you may, but you can never seriously believe it, nor reconcile it to God and goodness."

To this we may add the fact that the late Archbishop WHATELY strongly favored the ideas of the unconscious state of the dead, and the final annihilation of the wicked, as his sermons on "The Future States" clearly show. Multitudes of other "earnest students of the Bible" may have made similar discoveries, or "stumbled upon" these things, but have been deterred by the bigoted religionists and their persecuting spirit from promulgating them.

After all, it is not who has, or who has not, "stumbled upon the same peculiar doctrine" we hold and maintain. The question is, Does the Bible teach it? If it does, that is enough for us, even if we have to stand alone to the end of this life. We have never asked ourself whether we were to be popular or unpopular, though we knew it would be the latter, by promulgating our views of Bible truth. If it be the truth of God, that is enough for us. God's approval is consolation enough, though all men, good or bad, revile us.

Now, as to our "materialism." We know not why our friend should charge us with "full-grown" and "rank materialism." We repudiate the imputation. Such materialism rejects all spiritual existences. That we have never done. Yet, so far as created beings are concerned, we may safely challenge any man to show that there was ever a creation without material, and of course "materialism." To deny this, is to deny creation itself.

We believe in Bible materialism; and we also believe in Bible spiritualism. But we do not believe in atheistic materialism, nor Roman Catholic and Protestant spiritualism. The atheistic materialism denies to all men future life, and rejects all spiritual existences. Romanism and Protestantism both affirm man has a spiritual nature inherently, or by creation; while the great apostle affirms, 1 Cor. xv., the first man was "not spiritual, but animal," and that the spiritual was brought in by the second Adam; and he affirms, "the first man was of the earth, earthy;" decidedly a material being, and is only developed a spiritual one by an implantation of a spiritual seed and the resurrection from death, at the last trump; or a change, if alive, equivalent to a resurrection of dead ones. Then it is, by the Spirit of God given unto us as believers in Jesus, that we become spiritual beings. It is by the work of grace, and not by natural generation, that we come into the possession of a spiritual existence: not an intangible one; but that spiritual condition in which death has no more power over us forever.

Does not our friend see that he wrongs us by calling our doctrine "rank materialism," or "full-grown materialism?" So far as the finally impenitent are concerned, they are only "of the earth, earthy;" hence, are never any thing else than material, so organized as to think, while alive, like other animal beings, though with a more perfect organization or intellect, and capable of receiving an engrafted spiritual element; but without that they perish utterly, if they wilfully reject God's method of becoming spiritual after it has been fully presented to them.

Paul and the Pharisees.

WE have been pointed to Acts xxii. 6–8 as proof that Paul believed in the conscious existence of dead men. The eighth verse says, "The Sadducees say that there is no ressurrection, neither angel nor spirit; but the Pharisees confess both."

It is said by those who believe the dead are in a state of consciousness, that Paul believed in the conscious existence of the "spirits" of dead men, because he declared, verse sixth, "I am a Pharisee." But if that declaration is to be taken in an unlimited sense, Paul must have been one of the most wicked and heretical of men; for the Pharisees are denounced by our Lord as "hypocrites"—as compassing sea and land to make proselytes, and when made, they were children of hell: yea, our Lord denounced them as "fools and blind"—as "full of hypocrisy and iniquity." &c. See Matt. xxiii. He also warned his followers to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees as well as of the Sadducees; and defined that leaven to be their "doctrine." The Pharisees believed in the transmigration of souls; and among other parts of their "leaven" was their belief in the conscious state of dead men; in the face of their own Scriptures, which declare "there is no knowledge in sheol"—in the state of the dead.

With these facts before us, shall we assume that Paul believed in the conscious existence of spirits of dead men, because the Pharisees did? Even if we admit Acts xxiii. 8 teaches that to be the belief of the Pharisees—which may be doubted. Paul states a fact, verse 6th; it is this—"I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee." This fact relates to his birth and education. He then states another fact, which is this, that he was still in agreement with them as to the fact of "resurrection;" nothing more. He gives not one hint that he intended to be understood as indorsing any of their other views, what ever they might be; nor did he adopt their notions of the manner of the resurrection; which was by transmigration; and in fact was not dissimilar to the notions of Davis, Swedenborg, Bush, and others of that school, in these days. Paul says, it is "of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." This was the question, and not about "angels nor spirits." In the previous chapter, Paul had declared his conversion, and how he heard Jesus speaking unto him, with a "voice;" and that afterwards, at Jerusalem, he "saw him," and was told by him to "Depart" from that place. When Paul saw the violence to which he was exposed by the malice of his enemies, and perceived that they were divided into two sects, Pharisees and Sadducees, he exclaimed, "I am a Pharisee," &c. This had the desired effect; it set his enemies at war with themselves; and the strife was their own and not his. Paul had not said a word of any belief in spirits of dead men—he confined his expression of faith to the resurrection; but the Pharisees, instead of admitting it was Jesus, raised from the dead, that had spoken to Paul, as Paul had affirmed, immediately used their false doctrine, of belief in such spirits, to say, verse 9, "If a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him," &c; thus, by their tradition, doing despite to the doctrine Paul had taught, that it was one raised from the dead who had spoken to him. Here again we see the evil fruits of the Pharisaic doctrine of the conscious state of dead men; it led them to reject the grand doctrines of the Gospel, "Christ raised from the dead;" and "no future life except by resurrection." Such is the legitimate fruit of the doctrine that dead men have conscious spirits.

Effort and Success.

LET us look unto Jesus, and not to the apparent success of our efforts. Apparent success is not always the measure of real success; and, besides, God has not enjoined success upon us, but only labor. He will ask an account of our labor, but not of our success. Why, then, should we be too much concerned about it? We must sew the seed, God will gather the fruit; if not to-day, it will be to-morrow; if not for us, it will be for others. Even if success were to be granted us, it would always be dangerous to look complacently upon it. On the one hand, we are tempted to claim for ourselves some of the glory; on the other, we are too prone to slacken our zeal when we cease to see good results arising from it; that is, at the very time when we ought to put forth double energy. To look at our success, is to walk by sight; to look unto Jesus, and to persevere in following and in serving him, despite all discouragements, is to walk by faith.—Selected.

The American "Life and Advent Union" Camp-Meeting.

THIS Association of Advent Believers will hold their Annual Camp-Meeting upon their new and beautiful ground in "Carew's Grove," at Springfield, Mass., (distant about 1 1-4 miles from the railway station), commencing Sunday, Aug. 13, and continuing over Sunday, Aug. 20.

The Camp-Meeting Committee desire to say to the friends that Nature has contributed much for our camping place. We have an area of six acres of fine, level, dry tenting ground, dotted over with grand old trees, bestowing grateful shade. To these natural advantages, through the liberality of kind brethren, have been added all the accessories which thought could suggest as necessary to the comfort and convenience of all. Let all, then, far and near, from North and South, from East and West, turn aside from the dusty, weary way, and come in to this consecrated spot to rest and refresh awhile.

DEDICATION.

The Public Services of the meeting will commence Sunday, Aug. 13, at 10 1-2 A. M.; at which time a dedicatory sermon will be preached by GEO, STORRS, of New York.

FARES.

Fare on the Boston and Albany railroad is reduced one-third, which will be $4 from Boston to Springfield and return. Tickets to be obtained at the ticket offices between Boston and Worcester, at Grantville, Holliston, Natic, Westboro, Milford, and Southville; beyond Worcester at the usual stations. On the Hartford and New Haven railroad fare is reduced one-third. Tickets to be obtained at New Haven, Meriden, Middletown, Berlin, and New Britain, Hartford, Thompsonville, and Windsor Locks. On the Connecticut River railroad, fare is reduced one-third from South Vernon and intermediate stations to Springfield. On all the above roads camp-meeting tickets good from Aug. 10 to Aug. 30 must be called for at the ticket offices, and they must also be signed by the Secretary at the camp-meeting. Remember this. Friends coming from New York can come and return for $4 70 by taking the boat to New Haven, and thence by cars to Springfield. The boat which leaves New York at 3 15 P. M., connects with the train at the steamboat wharf, at New Haven. Passengers by this boat arrive in Springfield at 10 51 P. M. The other boat, which leaves New York at 11 P. M., reaches New Haven in time for the accommodation, which leaves New Haven at 8 A. M.; but passengers will have to go across the city by horse-cars to the depot of the Hartford and New Haven railroad. Tickets for the railroad to the camp-meeting will be sold on the steamboats. Passengers buying through tickets will be furnished with a return ticket, * which will be good only when endorsed by the Secretary of the camp-ground.

Omnibuses will be found in readiness at the Springfield depot to convey all to the ground. Fare 15 cents.

BOARD.

Good board will be furnished at 80 cents per day. Those intending to board themselves will find a choice and constant supply of groceries, provisions and fruits for sale upon the ground at regular market prices.

* The confusion experienced in regard to return tickets, by the boats, will not occur again.

Doing Our Own Work.

STRANGE as it may seem, one of the most difficult things to be secured in a newspaper is to have the public consent that it shall be conducted by its editor. Everybody wants to take his place, and direct as to its principles and methods, irrespective of what may be supposed to be his convictions of truth and wisdom. If he yielded to the suggestions which pour in upon him in words, letters and exchanges, he would do the most contradictory and inconsistent things, and pursue the most vacillating and absurd policy. Perhaps the most common invasion which he is called to repel is, the demand of one and another that he shall write upon this or that topic, or shall take up such and such a discussion, or shall admit a communication upon this or that subject, according to the turn of mind of the man who thus indicates his desire. This is especially apt to be done, when the editor has noticed the sentiments of some author, or writer, or preacher, or fellow-editor, and ventured to differ therefrom. Immediately said person feels that he may rightfully summon the editor to a full discussion of the topic with him, and may abuse him roundly, if he pays no heed to the call. Were we to begin to listen to such demands, whenever we expressed an opinion, we should always have a printed debate proposed by a dissentient, and our columns would be filled with matter selected by everybody but the editor! An unlucky paragraph in this number would entail a Second Advent discussion. Next week some passing reference would call out a long-winded Spiritist. Then an innocent mention of our views would induce a zealous Baptist minister or editor to insist upon a full discussion with him of the mode and subjects of Christian baptism. Before that was over, a Unitarian would discover something in an editorial which entitled him to challenge us to a debate on Liberal Christianity; or a Universalist would find occasion to feel aggrieved, if we did not measure pens and columns with him in an argument over future punishment.

Meanwhile our paper would savor only of controversy, its variety of subject and style would be lost, it would fail to keep pace with the run of weekly topics, and disgusted readers would drop away by thousands. We shall do our own work, edit our own paper, advocate our own principles. That we notice the sentiments of those from whom we widely differ, confers on them no right to occupy our columns. If we misrepresent them, they have a right to complain, and it is our duty, and shall always be our pleasure to make the needed correction. We must be the sole judges as to the topics to be treated at a particular time, and to the methods of handling them. No denunciation or ridicule will turn us from this purpose to control our own paper, in the interests of its readers and of truth as we understand them. We cannot gratify the eager controversialists of half a dozen sects, who would be only too happy to use our space to get their peculiarities before the public. They must use their own types, ink and paper, and when they print their ideas, we shall notice them or not, as occasion shall seem to require; and they must do the same by us.—The Advance.

No Neutral Ground.

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

"He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad."—Matt. xii. 30.

How often we hear men, when urged to accept Jesus as the only refuge of perishing humanity, claim that they stand on neutral ground! They greatly err. It appears from the plain declaration of Jesus that there is no neutral ground. He that is not for Jesus is against him. Every thought, every word, and every act of our lives has an influence either for Jesus or against him. That influence is like a perpetual eddy; when it is set in motion it knows no stopping.

In order to live with the constant approval of God, our hearts should be touched with heavenly fire. We must give ourselves wholly to Him, to be used in His service. We must be purified in the atoning blood of the Lamb, so that we can reckon ourselves "to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God." By such a sacrifice we become dead unto sin; become wholly the Lord's, and feel sin no more. By such a sacrifice to the Lord our whole influence redounds to his glory. If we use only a part of our influence for the advancement of his cause, we cannot consistently claim to be His, for we cannot serve God and mammon. Hence there is no neutral ground. If we would gather with Jesus we must do his whole will. We cannot divide our devotion—partly serve God and partly worship the things of the world—and be accepted of God. Paul prays for the waiting flock to be sanctified wholly, that they may "be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

In view of the fact that God holds us responsible for the manner in which we employ every moment of our probationary state, how important it becomes for us to be careful how we use our influence. Small as the influence of a single word may appear, yet it is often like casting a pebble into the water. At first it makes but a small eddy, but its circles increase until the whole water becomes agitated. I never saw in the same light before that human life is a fearful reality; that on every moment of our life hangs a great responsibility, as high as heaven, and as lasting as eternity.

Dear brethren and sisters, will you consecrate yourselves anew unto the Lord, and with a heart ablaze with heavenly fire, put forth renewed efforts in the cause of righteousness and truth? I hesitate not to confess that I believe our Redeemer will soon return from heaven to claim his own.

"Pilgrim, wake! behold the morning,
Long foretold by holy seers,
Gilds the heavens with its dawning;
Hail! the blissful day appears."

ROCHESTER, N. Y., July, 1871.

Justified by Faith.

THE heathen to be saved in any age, were to be saved by faith. The Scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed. So, then, them which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham. Gal. iii. 8-14.

B. MATTHIAS.

Note by the Editor.

That is true, brother; therefore God is pledged to see that the heathen have a chance to exercise faith: hence Jesus directed the Gospel to be preached to "every creature" that they may have the truth to produce faith, or be justly condemned for unbelief; and God has promised to see that the Good News, that Christ "gave himself a ransom for all," shall "be testified in due time."

"Eternity before Us."

IN "Messiah's Throne and Millennium Glory," by Josiah Litch, I read on the first page, of the first chapter:

"We exist! and eternity is before us! How shall we spend it? What shall be my destination when I pass from the present state of being?

"Shall I my everlasting days
With fiends or angels spend?"

One leaf farther on Eld. Litch says:

"Secondly: When man had incurred the penalty of the law, which was death, to consummate it (the penalty) it became necessary to drive him forth out of the garden, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and live forever. . . . Sin had rendered him mortal, but having incurred death, or mortality themselves, they could only give us what they possessed. Hence, it is written, By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death passed upon all men."

This good book of Eld. Litch's ought not to have been marred by those shallow lines of poetry. Shocking! "With fiends" forever dwell!

B. MATTHIAS.

From Eld. W. S. Campbell.

BR. STORRS: I have just been looking at the new camp-ground. It is a fine place, and will be fine in all its appointments. Under the direction of Br. J. C. Day all will be prepared, in due time, for the uniting of those who are looking for the LIFE-GIVER, and the kingdom soon.

In the first place, as most of our friends know, the proposed meeting is most centrally located, and the accommodations at the depot are ample. Passengers for the meeting can come or return by any and all trains coming into the depot, and always be under cover while there.

Another thing is, the meeting will begin in the best time, Aug. 13, to hold over the 20th. The other meeting will begin the 21st, so that persons can remain and attend the others if they wish.

This will be a free meeting: an Advent meeting. I do not suppose everybody will have the liberty to say everything; but, the grand freedom of the body upon the grand theme of Life and the coming kingdom is secured. Will the brethren and friends come up to the feast of tabernacles? This is our first attempt to hold a general camp-meeting, where the great Life theme shall be freely allowed on the Stand. And it is this freedom which commends the gathering to the consideration of the lovers of truth, and such gatherings. That is not all. I claim that none of our brethren are more alive to the coming of the Lord and the fulfilment of prophecy, showing that event near, than the Life brethren.

I shall speak, for one, (if I do speak), on the things that transpire now, as showing the day at hand.

Many of the old and tried, as well as the young and strong, of the brethren who "have waxed bold," will be there to speak the word. Come one and all.

SOUTHINGTON, CONN., July 27, 1871.

From Mrs. E. C. M. Boyd.

BR. STORRS: I have been for a long time intending to write you a word, but the continued illness of my father, of whom I am at present the nurse and companion, has hitherto prevented me.

I wish you to know that my heart and thoughts are often with you; especially in the few months past, in which you have begun anew to lay before us in the HERALD your views of "The Coming Kingdom."

I have often wished and prayed for more light on these points; and when, after the Camp-meeting last year, Br. Grim proposed investigation in that direction, I felt glad, for I had never had the opportunity of hearing the question fairly argued, and I thought we should soon have a full view of both sides. For some cause the subject was dropped, and I was disappointed.

When you commenced your articles on "the Promise and Oath," etc., I was much gratified, and read them with interest, finding nothing to which I could object, till your admission, as it seemed to me, of a future life by a resurrection of some not in Christ. This I could not see, and felt apprehensive of injury to the cause of "No Life out of Christ," by the misconstruction which would be placed upon it by some who differ from us on this point.

I had written to you, stating some objections to your argument, and asking explanations, which I felt you could give, and which would relieve the minds of many, when the action of the Directors and your acquiescence was published. Of course my article was not sent.

I regretted—and said so to the friends—that your articles were suppressed, and that no opportunity was given for the discussion of your new position. I was sure that you would prove your ground tenable or abandon it.

I have read your pamphlet, "Vindication," etc., and think that I have obtained light on the "ages to come," but do not see that it involves any change or modification of the view of the non-resurrection of the wicked.

I feel that if you had the opportunity of giving us all your reasons for the modification of your views, it might not seem so obnoxious as it now appears.

I do hope this will not be made a ground of difference at the coming Camp-meeting, or at the meeting of the Life and Advent Union. I have heard many speak of it; and I see that those who are not with us on the non-resurrection look forward, very confidently, to the break-up which it is thought must surely ensue on account of the attitude of the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE, and the Directors of the L. and A. Union.

But, I trust there will be harmony of feeling and action at the meeting, if there may not be perfect unity of belief and sentiment. Persons cannot always unite, (be one) though they may harmonize. To illustrate: in singing, two bass voices unite—produce one sound; a tenor and bass produce two sounds, yet harmonize. The sweetest sounds result from harmony of voices—the most powerful, from union on one strain. So I hope that the sound that goes forth from our meeting may be sweet and comforting, if not as powerful as though all echoed the same note.

GROTON JUNCTION, MASS., July 24, 1871.

P. S. Since writing the above, I have received your "Supplement," and find many of my own objections answered. I have read it over rather hastily (for lack of time) and am not fully convinced that the position there set forth is entirely correct; nor am I at all disposed to say that it is not.

This much I do admit—the argument, as you present it, does not deny or invalidate the doctrine of "No Life out of Christ," as we have held it; and if it be not true, still it is not "a pernicious error." I shall investigate it prayerfully, and trust that God may enlighten me, I believe I have no "pet theory" that I will not relinquish for the truth, whatever that may be; and I trust that none of us will be found so forgetful of the lessons of the past few years, as to wish to deprive any one of the liberty of expressing what they see as light, and honestly believe to be truth; even though that "light" has not yet been discussed by us, and the "truth" is so far in advance of what we hold as to seem to us, almost, if not quite, errors. E. C. M. B.

From W. S. Olmsted.

BR. STORRS: I received two copies of the "Supplement" to your first tract on the Promise to Abraham, forwarded to me from Hartford, Conn. My health having become impaired, I came to this place about a month ago to try the medical waters of Virginia, and may remain here through the summer.

Although not a convert yet, I am very glad to see this subject opened for discussion; there is more in it than I had supposed; and as truth has nothing to fear, but everything to hope from a free, candid, christian-like discipline, I have regretted that the columns of the HERALD OF LIFE was shut off from the discussion of this subject. But there will surely be other channels opened for a full exhibition of both sides of the question. If the HERALD OF LIFE is muzzled, I fear its usefulness will be greatly impaired. It is just the right medium for the discussion, pro and con, as its circulation reaches to the great body of Life believers, many of whom now will not see your argument. I desire very much to see the objections all answered on both sides; especially those Scriptures which present the great burning day; such as, the "Element shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, other works that are therein shall be burned up," and similar passages, which are so positive that it is difficult to bring the mind to harmonize with your theory of ages to come.

I endeavor to hold my mind open to the reception of truth. I hold no opinions so bigotly but am ready at any time to surrender them on sufficient evidence, having long ago learned that we "know only in part," and have had to surrender many positions in which I formerly believed, and in which I thought I was firmly established.

Yours, very truly.

GOSHEN, VA., July 28, 1871.

From B. S. Mills.

FRIEND STORRS: I sit down, on the spur of the moment, (having just received the "HERALD," and read the article defining your position,) to say to you that I have read many articles in your excellent paper which touched, to vibration, a chord in my heart; but I have seldom read a few words put together which seemed to me to breathe my beau ideal of a free and loving Christian's soul so well. I feel for you, and wish you God speed. May He bless your noble decision, and platform, so free and so generous withal.

I have not read the pamphlet in question, but desire that you would send me a few (I send you a dollar herewith,) and so I cannot say whether I endorse it or not; but whether I do or no, I am persuaded there must be something good in it; and the spirit you enounce pleases me.

I have been associated with, and held, also, myself, some of the "wild and haughty" notions of those who think that they alone have a perfect and exact knowledge of the whole plan of Truth; trusting (I fear) more in an arm of flesh than in Jehovah: who say they "have no creed," and yet have a creed, the most unrelenting and circumscribed; and a zeal of God; but not perfected by Love.

My straitness has broken o'er my own head, and I belong now to the honored and nameless band of "Cast-outs," for no act of wrong or wicked lewdness either.

I am sick of titles, creeds, and parties. I have nevertheless, very positive opinions; and feel free to state them, kindly; but believe I can honor, esteem and love those who as honestly differ from me, if only they manifest a gentlemanly, not to say, a "Christian" spirit, in stating them. I cannot think that any artificial or man-made test will henceforth confine my sympathy; but all who manifest a likeness to my God, and proportionate to that likeness shall have it, God himself helping me.

Alas! I fear the time will not come, this side of a perfect age, when all of those in whom the true spirit of Christ resides, will cease to bite and devour each other, and cast out of their synagogues all of those who cannot pronounce "Shibboleth" (Judges xii. 6) with just the accent, they themselves can and do; or when cant and hypocrisy will cease.

I am willing, if the Lord wills, that such things shall be, to try us, and to make us perfect. The Epiphany and Apocalypse of our Lord is at hand, when a competent judge will make manifest who are his, and who are not. Till then, let us wait and bear in patience, reproof and rebuff, knowing that our Gracious Saviour, who has bestowed upon us eternal Life, will give us an eternal crown. Love, then, all we can love; but hate none; state our opinions candidly, honestly, in the fear of God; according the same right cheerfully to others. As an editor, use your scissors and your pen fearlessly; but do injustice to none; especially to the truth. May God guide, help, prosper and bless you.

Yours faithfully, in Love.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 22, 1871.

Following Christ.

"These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth."—Rev. xiv. 4.

Is this our conception of a future state of bliss? Not a dreamland of inaction, consisting only of a series of negations, the absence of the sad catalogue of ills which beset us here; but do we realize it as a sphere of holy, spiritual activity, where we shall be enlisted in embassies of love and loyalty to the dear Lord who redeemed us? If so—the kingdom of God—the manhood of our spiritual being—should have, at all events, its childhood now; what we are to be, should have its dim and shadowy reflection in what we now are. If we are to follow the Lamb in his kingdom, that path of trustful and loving obedience should have its commencement here. Is it so? Are we thus following him; following him as a flock trustfully follows its shepherd? following him, not fitfully or capriciously—not at set times and seasons only, when the summer sky is overhead, and the birds are on the boughs, and valleys of life are shouting for joy; but willing to follow him when the sky is lowering—when the birds have folded their wings, and these valleys of existence are shrouded in mist and darkness; no patches of verdant grass to be seen, the music of no still waters to be heard, yet ready to say, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him?" Do we follow him in the sense of seeking to be like him—to have our wills coincident with his?—setting his great Life of purity and obedience and self-sacrifice before us, and desiring that ours be a feeble transcript of its spotless excellencies? Do we follow him, moreover, with the realizing thought before us of a Living Person?—not as the votaries of a creed, linked to some dry and formulated dogmas from which the great living "life" has departed;—but following, as these undefiled and faultless on the Mount Zion are represented as doing—following himself—the Lamb of God; anticipating the time when "we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is," and when we shall be able to say, with an emphasis the words of Peter never possessed, "We are eyewitnesses of his majesty: we are with Him in the Holy Mount!"—Selected.

Building on the Sand.

IN the East the peasants' huts are often very unsubstantial structures. They are built of mud or sun-burnt brick. A night's hard rain-storm will sometimes nearly demolish an entire village. Their mountain streams, also, possess a very peculiar character. The beds of these brooks are called wadies. In the hot season they are entirely dry. Yet, even then, they afford often the best pasturage. In the rainy season they are swollen streams. The shepherd builds his hut by the banks of one of these wadies. If it is built high upon the rock, it is safe. If it is built on the sandy soil, though there is no water at the time of building, the treacherous foundation gives way with the first freshet.

Appearances are deceitful—this is one lesson of the image. The man's house seems safe so long as the wady is dry. It needs a torrent to test it. No man knows whether he is safe till he has been tried. The storm is needed to show whether he is built on the rock or on the sand.

There is another lesson quite as important. The hearers of Christ's sermon understood it, doubtless. A friend of mine was once travelling through Palestine. The party pitched their tents one night in one of these wadies. The night was fair, the air clear, the grass green and soft, the torrent bed dry. Suddenly my friend was awakened by hearing the gurgling of water. Before he was dressed it was a foot high beneath his bed. He escaped with difficulty. His clothing, books, manuscripts, were carried off by the stream. Rain in the mountains had in a few hours filled the dry bed with a roaring torrent. So, without, stormy experiences of temptation come. They that are not built on a rock fall. There is no time to prepare after the temptation assails. Peter in the palace has no time to think. He must do his thinking before.

Foundations are hidden. It is not the apparent virtues which give stability to character. It is not what a man appears to be, but what he is in the foundations. This is illustrated by the history of one of the handsomest churches in Chicago. It was a magnificent structure; built throughout of stone, apparently only time could destroy it. Yet before it was quite completed the workmen abandoned it, the street was blockaded the inhabitants of the opposite houses feared for their lives because of it. It had to be taken down stone by stone. The foundations were imperfect. It was admirably built—but on sand. What are your foundations? Are you rooted and grounded in Christ?

Sayings of Bishop Whately.

ANY system that makes unity the primary and indispensable object to which all else must be sacrificed, robs its adherents of the character of witnesses; while minor differences make all the more undeniable and real, the testimony from the agreement in essential truth of persons left free to examine. The testimony (to use a simple and obvious illustration) of even a small number of eye-witnesses of any transaction, even though possessing no extraordinary powers of vision, would outweigh that of countless millions, who should have resolved to close their eyes, and to receive and retail the report they heard from a single individual.

OUR religion was designed to renew indeed, but not to subvert our nature—to exalt and purify each individual, but not to destroy his individuality. Whatever points are faulty, indeed, must be corrected by our religion, or it will not have done its proper work; but many differences of taste and temper still remain, (and will give a certain tinge, even to the religion itself of each man,) which are in nowise hurtful, but may even be rendered serviceable to the general cause—and which ought no more to be made a source of mutual jealousy and dissension, than the diversity of spiritual gifts among the early Christians.

WE must carefully guard against confounding intellectual deficiencies with heretical perversity of will, remembering that the honest endeavors after religious knowledge, the sincere faith and diligent obedience of those of feeble understanding or of uncultivated mind, are accepted by Him, in whose sight the wisest and ablest are but mere weakness and ignorance.

THE principle of sacrificing truth to unity creeps in gradually. The sacrifice first demanded, is in general, not a great one. Men are led on step by step, from silence as to some mistake, to connivance at fallacies, and thence to suppression, and then to misrepresentation of truth, and ultimately, to the support of known falsehood.

UNITY, when made the first object, is always an evil, besides the possibility that men may be united in what is erroneous and wrong in itself, it must be remembered, that whatever absolute truth there may be in what is assented to on such a principle, it is not truth, to those who assent to it not on conviction but for union's sake.

PEACE is too dearly purchased by slavery of any kind, especially spiritual slavery.]

HOW THEY DRINK IN SARATOGA—NOT WATER, BUT WINE AND WHISKEY.—During the last fashionable season, says the Progress, the Grand Union Hotel was open one hundred and twelve days. The daily wine room receipts were $1,000, and the bar receipts averaged $600 per day. So the amount spent for liquors at this one hotel in Saratoga, last summer, was $123,200 for wine, and $69,200 for other drinks, making a total of nearly two hundred thousand dollars for the 26,870 guests entertained during the heated term at the mammoth rum-hell! And Saratoga is a city of hotels, and besides it we have Long Branch, Cape May, Newport, and a thousand fashionable places of dissipation. These are startling facts, as they stand; they are but samples of what is common all over the land; they are the imprints which indicate the condition of the whole mass. What can we say for the progress made in human development, the intelligence, moral sense, political or domestic economy of any State, town or community, which tolerates such a woful state of affairs? It is time we had a birth of new intellectual and moral sense; a disgust for such perverted appetites; a profound conviction of wrong doing in the wasting of so much money; a desire to rise above these beastly convictions left us by former generations of sensual habits, when the appetites were pandered, and the passions fed more than the brains were cultivated.—Northern Independent.

The Catarrh.

THIS is a loathsome and troublesome disease; and it has been supposed to be almost incurable. On the subject, Br. Thomas R. Weaver, Springfield, Mass., writes us as follows:

"BR. STORRS: I think I have one of the best remedies for the treatment of Catarrh that is in use. I have been Agent for it for about six months, and I have sold a large number of them; and so far they have given entire satisfaction. I send you a circular which tells all about it. You are acquainted with a number of the parties that are using it, and know them to be men of honor and principle."

Remark by the Editor.

The references are good and reliable. To get an understanding of the matter send to Br. Weaver for his Circular, where the "CATARRAL DOUCHE" is described by a woodcut, which gives an idea that we cannot describe without.

Obituary.

DIED, in West Meriden, June 28, of injuries received by a fall, MAMIE, youngest daughter of Dr. Charles C. and Eliza Grover BARKER, aged 4 years and 3 months. Br. and sister Barker met with a severe loss in the death of little Mamie. Two years ago, Nattie, their only son, was borne away to the "land of the enemy" at the same age as Mamie. Side by side they sleep, awaiting the resurrection, while the parents also wait, earnestly desiring the re-union. One little daughter is still left to them. May she be spared to cheer their home.

Br. and sister Barker are sustained and comforted by the promise—"they shall come again from the land of the enemy."—Jer. xxxi. 15, 16. WM. N. PILE.

"Stand Like an Anvil."

BY BISHOP DOANE.

"Stand like an anvil!" when the strokes
Of stalwart strength fall fierce and fast;
Storms but more deeply root the oaks
Whose brawny arms embrace the blast.

"Stand like an anvil," when the sparks
Fly far and wide, a fiery shower;
Virtue and truth must still be marks
Where malice proves its want of power.

"Stand like an anvil," when the bar
Lies red and glowing on its breast;
Duty shall be life's leading star,
And conscious innocence its rest.

"Stand like an anvil," when the sound
Of pond'rous hammer pains the ear;
Thine but the still and stern rebound
Of the great heart that cannot fear.

"Stand like an anvil;" noise and heat
Are born of earth and die with time;
The soul, like God, its source and seat,
Is solemn, still, serene, sublime.

The Second Advent.

We take the following from the "Advent Herald," Boston, Mass.—Ed. Her. of Life.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

BY S. S. WARDWELL.

[In the Herald of Nov. 23, 1870, Deacon Wardwell, of Providence, R. I., commenced a series of articles on the second coming of our Lord—proposing to consider how, why and when he will come. As no article on the time of the Advent was sent to us, we concluded that death interrupted his plan and that the proposed work remained unfinished. A few days ago, however, Br. Pearce sent us the following, accompanied by a statement that Deacon Wardwell's daughter handed it to him with a request for publication, as it was the last of her father's writing for the Herald. It is remarkable that his last article should be based on the last words of our Lord Jesus Christ.—Ed.]

"He which testifieth these things, saith, "Surely I come quickly, Amen! Even so, come, Lord Jesus."—Rev. xxii. 20.

WHEN WILL CHRIST COME?

Our Saviour in speaking of his second coming, said, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only."—Matt. xxiv. 36. The precise time of his coming is purposely hidden from all men. They know not the day, the hour, nor the year, in which he will appear the second time. And this is the reason why all should be prepared for that day, and shows us the importance of the injunction, "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

But there are some portions of Scripture which may lead us to some knowledge of the coming of the Lord.

1. The Lord Jesus will come at the time which God has appointed. Paul in his address at Athens, said: "God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world" by Jesus Christ; and this judgment will be at the second coming of Christ; for he will "judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom." While we know not the precise day when this great event shall take place, it is known to God. He has fixed the day, and then Jesus will surely come. Then he will "descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God." Oh! that that day may not overtake us unawares.

2. Christ will come at the end of this dispensation, called in Scripture "the end of the world," literally, the end of the age. How soon this end will be and Christ's second appearing take place will depend upon the true interpretation of the book of Revelation; but upon this I will not enter. In the parable of the wheat and tares, Jesus says, "the harvest is the end of the world. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world [or age]. The Son of man shall send forth his angels and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do wickedly, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire, there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father."—Matt. xiii. 39–43. Thus it is shown that the coming of Christ will be at the end of this dispensation, when he will reward the righteous and punish the wicked.

3. Christ will come when the last kingdom represented in the image of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and by the fourth beast of Daniel's vision (chap. vii.) is still in existence. That kingdom is the Roman kingdom which still exists, not precisely as it did when John wrote the book of Revelation, but in another form, that of separate kingdoms as represented by the toes of the image mentioned. We may not be able to point them out exactly, but there is every reason to believe that they will hereafter be revived, as is indicated in Rev. xvii. 12, 13, and that their kings will be under the direction of the beast mentioned in that chapter; and these are to be destroyed at the coming of Christ, as predicted in Rev. xix. 19–21, and as foretold by Daniel as follows: "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."—Dan. ii. 44. That the destruction of these kingdoms will be at the second coming of Christ is clearly shown in Dan. vii. 13, 14—which see.

4. Christ will come at the period of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, as mentioned in the book of Revelation. "And the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever."—Rev. xi. 15.

Some writers consider the sounding of the seventh trumpet to be the same trumpet as mentioned in 1 Thess. iv. 16, where it is said: "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God;" and as stated in 1 Cor. xv. 52, "For the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised," etc. But this is evidently a mistake; as the sounding of the seventh trumpet marks a prophetic period, the same as the other six trumpets do. If the first four trumpets are prophetical of the invasion and final overthrow of the western Roman Empire, then they relate to a period of nearly four hundred years from the time when John wrote the book of Revelation; and so the fifth and sixth trumpet—if they mark the period of the Saracen and Turkish powers—relate to a period of more than 1200 years and are not yet ended. The sounding of the seventh trumpet will then occupy a period of time, but how long we cannot tell; it probably will be a much shorter period, and the coming of Christ may be at the commencement of that period, for we read that upon the sounding of the seventh angel, "the four and twenty elders, which sat before God on their seats, fell upon their faces, and worshipped God, saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast, [and art to come], because thou hast taken to thee thy great power and hast reigned. And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldst destroy them which destroy the earth."—Rev. xi. 16–18. The words "and art to come" are omitted in the best manuscripts, because Christ has then already come. The whole passage shows that Christ is to come at the sounding of the seventh trumpet, as it is then that the dead are to be raised, the righteous rewarded and the wicked punished. It is the period of the wrath of God, the same which Paul designated as "the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God."—Rom. ii. 5.

Are we now living at the period of the sounding of the sixth trumpet? It is now the time of the second woe, and "behold the third woe cometh quickly." The seventh angel shall sound; the mystery of God shall be finished; Christ shall come in power and glory; the righteous shall be rewarded and the wicked punished. In view of these solemn events we may well inquire, "What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God."

5. Christ will come when the great majority of the world are not expecting him.

His coming will be sudden, "for as the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be."—Matt. xxiv. 27. The inhabitants of the world who are then careless and secure, as they think, will be surprised at his appearing and filled with consternation. They have said, "Where is the promise of his coming?" Many have ridiculed the idea of his second personal appearance, and of the saints being caught up to meet him in the air, but their ridicule and opposition will be turned into fear, and the "tribes of the earth shall mourn." "The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night"—unexpectedly, and the wicked will be wholly unprepared for it, "For when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them and they shall not escape."—1 Thess. v. 2, 3.

6. The coming of Christ will be at a time when even many church members will not be awake as they should be. Jesus said, "When the Son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?" The parable of the ten virgins shows that some will be found to be foolish virgins, having no oil in their vessels with their lamps, and they will be shut out from the marriage supper of the Lamb. The parable of the talents shows one who at the return of his lord had made no improvement of his talent, and was therefore cast out into outer darkness. We see from these parables what the state of many professors of religion will be when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven. They may cry, "Lord, Lord, open unto us," but it will be in vain. The Bridegroom and his faithful ones have gone in to the marriage, and the door is shut and cannot be opened for them.

In view of these solemn and important truths we may well inquire how we stand in relation to this subject. Are we saying, "Where is the promise of his coming, for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation?" Are we prepared for the coming of the Son of man—the Son of God? Have we the grace and love of God in our hearts as well as a profession of religion? Are we waiting for, and looking for, his coming? for unto "them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."

Let us hear the words of Christ himself: "Let your loins be girded about and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord when he shall return from the wedding. Blessed are those servants whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching. Be ye therefore ready also, for the Son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not. Blessed is that servant whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing."

The last words of which we have any account that Jesus spake to any man were, "Behold I come quickly." May we like John be ready to say, "Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus."

Paul's Election.

BY JOHN H. WATERBURY.

Br. Storrs: Allow me to express my opinion in relation to St. Paul's being chosen an apostle to the Gentiles, and in view of the question asked in your article, on "Election," in my last Herald of Life. You ask, if "Paul's call on his way to Damascus proves he was also unconditionally elected to eternal life?" You say, "If so, why does he say, I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest that by any means when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway?" You also ask, "Why does he tell us that he labored and suffered, if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead?" I will here say, my object in this communication is in no way for controversy or criticism; but as I differ so widely from your conclusions in this special call of Paul, would be greatly gratified to hear a more extended view of this subject without bringing my name before the public.

From the light I get in reading of St. Paul's conversion, it was effected through the direct power of the Holy Spirit in a special manner from the Lord in this case; and so far as I can see, had no conditions attached to the call. Paul was told by the Lord just what to do, and he did it. No promises of condition. Ananias was chided for presenting disparagements against Saul. The Lord told Ananias, Go thy way, for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel. For I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake. All this without a condition being attached to the call.

This view of the election of Paul to preach the gospel, impresses me that it was done effectually, and Paul's being a chosen vessel, selected out of the whole human family for a special purpose and end; that he was fitted to carry out the object, and endowed with the power to control his body, and fleshly nature, and was influenced by the Holy Spirit to overcome his carnal desires, or to keep them in subjection to the will of the Holy Ghost, that he was filled with. Every act of St. Paul sets forth that he was born of God. That he was made a new creature, having new desires, and influences. That he run the whole race of his mission, and that he believed there was a crown laid up for him from the grace given him to win the race.

The confidence St. Paul had in the call or drawing him out of persecuting the church of the saints, was manifested when he was told the Jews would bind him and deliver him to the Gentiles. Paul told them he was not only ready to be bound, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus. All this, to my understanding, demonstrates that St. Paul was elected to eternal life through the power and design and will of God. Any other view of this subject would clash with the teaching of the writings of St. Paul to the several churches. If I am wrong in my statement, please, at your convenience, define the error in the Herald of Life to an old man, near his seventieth year, and a suffering invalid for over two years last past.

I remain your brother in one Lord, one faith, and one baptism.

Remark by the Editor.

Paul's call to the apostleship and his "unconditional election to eternal life" are two very different things; so he evidently regards the matter when he says, "I keep my body under," etc., "lest . . . I myself should be a castaway."—1 Cor. ix. 27. If there was no possibility of such an event, his language seems unmeaning. So it appears to me.

Immaterial Souls.

BY JOSEPH CHAPIN.

There is a doctrine now taught by those who love to be praised as if they were teachers of truth, and taught in agreement with the teachings of God, yet they teach that of which they have no knowledge, and they that believe have no proof of the existence of that which they are taught to believe lives forever, namely: an immaterial, immortal soul, dwelling in the body of man, and as soon as the man dies it goes into its eternal state of existence, where it is punished or rewarded according to the doings of the body it inhabited; if the body did good it received a reward, if the body did evil it received punishment. Who is the author of this doctrine? Not God, because this immaterial, immortal soul-teaching is not supported by any evidence whatever. But the teachings of God are supported by strong evidence; the heavens, the earth, the cattle, the fish, the creature man, are proofs of a Creator, and God declares himself to be that Creator. See Isa. xlvi. 1 and 2: "Thus saith the Lord, the heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool, for all those things hath my hand made." And Jer. xxxii. 27: "Behold, I am the Lord the God of all flesh." God has created and given life and provided food for all his creatures; but this immaterial, immortal soul is no part of the works of God; it has no God to care for it, because God never made it; it stands upon the bold blasphemous assumption that it is itself a god, that it lives forever, that death has no power over it; the most that can be done with it is to punish it on account of the sins of the body it inhabited, and of which the body had not repented before it (the body) died; for remember that this immaterial, immortal soul is no part of the body it inhabits, for the body is material, made of dust of the earth; but this immortal soul is immaterial—not made of any thing. If this is so, how is it to be held accountable for the sins of a material body? It has no power over the body, because it is immaterial, and therefore cannot make the body sensible of its presence. Seeing, then, that the material body is one person, and the immaterial, immortal soul is another person, it should not be charged with the sins of the body. Each person should suffer for his own sins—the material body for the sins of the material body, and the immaterial, immortal soul for the sins of the immaterial, immortal soul.

How did this immaterial, immortal soul come into existence? It was first begotten by the deceiver, that old serpent, when he said to the woman, "You shall not surely die, for God knows that in the day you eat thereof your eyes will be opened and you will be as God, knowing good and evil;" and the woman conceived the lie, and it (the lie) grew and was made alive, and came forth, an immaterial, immortal creature; existing in the imagination. Must the testimony of God, the Creator, be set aside, that this seductive lie may be received? It is evident that God did not know of the existence of this immaterial soul; for after having created all things God said, "We will make man, in our image, after our likeness, and they shall rule over the fish of the sea, and over the heavens, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every reptile that creeps on the earth." And to the same man God said: "Because you have hearkened to the voice of your wife, and eaten of the tree which I commanded you, saying: you shall not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake: in sorrow you shall eat of it all the days of your life, and thorns and thistles shall it cause to spring up unto you, and you shall eat the herb of the field." (See Gen. i. 30. The same food is given to man now, that was, before, set apart for the beast, the birds, and the creeping things of the earth.) "By the sweat of your face shall you eat bread till you return to the ground, for out of it was you taken; for dust you are, and unto dust shall you return." This, then, is the testimony God gives of the man which he has made; not that he was made of nothing and lived forever, but that he was made of the dust of the earth, and lived by the will of his Creator. The immaterial, immortal creature, living in the imagination of the man, becomes extinct as soon as the man dies, because there is no longer an imagination to keep it alive. Col. ii. 8: "Beware lest any man make you naked by philosophy, by vain deception, according to the doctrine of men, according to the rudiments of the world, and not according to the Messiah."

The hope of the Christian is not imaginary, because their Redeemer lives and has the keys of death and the grave. What if death does capture them? What if they are prisoners of the grave? See 1 Thess. iv. 15, to the end. "And this we say to you by the word of our Lord: That we who may survive and be alive at the coming of our Lord shall not precede them who have slept; because our Lord will himself descend from heaven with the mandate, and with the voice of the chief angel, and with the trump of God, and the dead who are in the Messiah will first arise; and then we who survive and are alive shall be caught up together with them to the clouds to meet our Lord in the air, and so shall we be ever with our Lord; wherefore, comfort you one another with these words." Whoever loves the Lord loves also the words of the Lord. See John xiv. 23, 24: "He that loveth me observeth my instructions, and my Father will love him and we will come to him and make our abode with him; but he that loveth me not, observeth not my instruction, and the instruction which you hear is not mine but the Father's who sent me."—Murdock's Translation of the Syriac Testament.

Salvation for the Young.

I hope often to address you, dear children, not to amuse you, but to do you good. I am a stranger to most of you, and most of you are strangers to me. But I know that you need eternal life, for God has told me that, and he has told us that there is one way, and only one way, in which any of you can have it. The best proof that I love you which I can now give you, is to tell you how you may get it. If you were starving, you would not think the man your true friend who brought you toys, but the man who brought you bread. If you were drowning, you would not think that the man loved you who stood on the shore laughing and holding up comical pictures to you; but the man who forgot everything in his desire to save you. And so, when I know that you are perishing forever, because I love you, my heart's desire and prayer to God for you is that you may have life.

People sometimes tell you that, if you are good, you will go to heaven. It is too late to tell you that. If you were carrying a costly vase, it might be very kind to tell you how you might carry it safely. But it would be too late to tell you that when you had let it fall, and it lay in shivers at your feet. The only way to help you then, would be to replace it by a new one. You are a sinner and lost forever, unless there is some way in which a sinner can be saved. If you were good, or if you could be good, you would not need a Saviour. But God saw that you would be lost forever, and, in his great love, he sent his only Son to be the Saviour of sinners. The Son of God came into this world to answer for our sins—as the Bible says, "He died for our sins," in order that God might forgive us; and all that he asks is simply that you trust in what he has done and is doing for you.

But, although all your sins were pardoned, you could not make yourself good; and so, when you come to Christ for pardon, he will make you a new creature, and give you a heart to love and serve God. You have often tried to be good, and to leave off all sin; but some temptation came, and you failed; or you forgot God and your good resolutions, till, perhaps, you think it is of no use to try any more. Now, the loving Saviour of sinners knows all your weakness, and how apt you are to forget, and how trifles drive God out of your mind, and how evil companions lead you away. He knows how many good resolutions and promises you have broken; and he says to every one that trusts in him, however weak and easily led away you may be: "My grace is sufficient for thee." Men may often seem to forget that they were once boys; but there is one at the right hand of God who never forgets that he was once a boy in the village of Nazareth. He feels for you. He who once said to his disciples, "Take heed that you despise not one of these little ones," will not himself despise you. He will always have an encouraging word and a helping hand for you, and he will make you just what God would have you to be.

I wish I could tell you how he loves you. The wisest and the greatest cannot fully understand the love of Christ. The Bible says, "it passeth knowledge." What love it showed to come down here to be poor and despised and sorrowful, and to die on the cross for poor sinners who hated him! None but the Son of God could love like that. But I wish you to know that he loves you. The Bible says, "He is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever;" so that what his love was on earth, it is now in heaven. I cannot say that you are more welcome to him than older sinners; but I know that you are as welcome as any. When the people brought little children to him, his disciples thought that the Son of God could not stoop to notice little children; but when Jesus saw this, he was much displeased, and said: "Suffer the little children to come unto me." This shows what a friend you have in Jesus; and I am sure that the Son of God never appears more lovely than when he took the little children in his arms and blessed them. Dear children, you cannot now feel his hands upon your head, nor hear his voice when he speaks the blessing; but he is as able and as willing to bless you as ever.

All that he asks is that you will trust him. Trust him for pardon, because he has died for our sins and paid the mighty debt for us. Trust him to make you what God would have you to be, even a new creature, by the power of his Spirit. Trust him for grace and strength to do every duty; to resist every temptation; to subdue all your evil tempers and desires; to make you gentle, and humble, and loving, and "fruitful in every good work;" to make you a child of God; and, at last, to place you beside himself on the throne of his glory. He will do all this; and what do you want more? But remember, you are lost without Christ—lost forever.—Selected.

A Mother's Influence.

How touching is this tribute of Hon. T. H. Benton to his mother's influence: "My mother asked me never to use tobacco; I have never touched it from that time to the present day. She asked me not to gamble, and I have never gambled; I cannot tell who is losing in the games that are being played. She admonished me, too, against hard drinking; and whatever capacity for endurance I have at present, and whatever usefulness I have attained through life, I attribute to having complied with her pious and correct wishes. When I was seven years old she asked me not to drink, and then I made a resolution of total abstinence; and that I have adhered to it through all the time, I owe to my mother."

Burial of a Queen.

When the Queen of Madagascar was buried, fifty silk mantles were wrapped around the corpse; four hundred dresses, some of which had cost more than 100 pounds, were placed in her tomb; also twenty watches, one which cost 200 pounds; besides many earrings, finger-rings, and other valuables. Everything the queen was fond of was put in the tomb with her, there to spoil and rot. $22,220 were melted down to make her coffin, which was carried to the tomb before the body. The tomb itself is a square stone building, twelve feet high, parts of which are painted green and ornamented with gold.

Moments of time are as sands of gold. Remember this and be saving.

A Bible View of Hell:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus; Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. Address all orders to

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

All names of persons sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the Post Office, County and State must be given, and written plainly, and if a change is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

DEATH AND TRANSLATION.

"ALBERT BARNES is not dead; he is ascended, he is translated." Such is the language which has been repeated again and again, since the death of that great, venerable, loved and universally respected man. I have heard much stronger language used, as though his departure had been perfectly like that of Elijah—language even stronger than Elisha would have used with reference to Elijah. Though Elisha could cry, "My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof," yet it seems he was not permitted to see the open heavens, as Stephen did at his death, and as we were permitted to see at the translation of Albert Barnes!

From the language which is often used, we would naturally be led to suppose that the first death had ceased to be the penalty of the law—that it was the purchase of Christ's death, rather than the consequence of Adam's sin. It is astonishing how great, learned and good men can utter so much that is unscriptural. Mr. Barnes is acknowledged to have been one of earth's great and good men. In many respects, he had few, if any, equals. His was a most beautiful, as well as great character. His humility sought not—desired not such encomiums as have been lavished on him. He did not claim perfection while alive, and would have been unwilling to have been the recipient of such laudations.

Great as he was, good as he was, he was far from being equal to the Apostle Paul, of whom he so lately wrote; and who would dare to say that Paul "is not dead, but is ascended—that he was translated?" "Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead;" and Albert Barnes is dead. Of all the past generations, we can only say of two individuals, "They are not dead, they are ascended—they are translated." Enoch and Elijah owing to their remarkable holiness, and to the mercy of God through our Lord Jesus Christ, have escaped death, the penalty of sin. I am often astonished at the language of great and good men with reference to death. Scarcely does an eminently good person depart this life but some talk as if they believed the first death was the purchase of Christ's death—as if death was one of the good things which our Father has provided for us—as if they were really Swedenborgians. I do not wish to say aught against that sect, but if a man is a Swedenborgian, let him be one.

We learn from the Bible that death is the consequence of sin—that as far as man is concerned, death entered by sin, "by sin," and not by Christ. I most freely admit that through Jesus all things are turned into blessings to the believer—even the very curses are turned into blessings. "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God." (Rom. viii. 28.) Hanging on Christ—trusting in Him, we have nothing to fear from sin, Satan, death and hell. Christ brings good to us out of everything. Under his sovereign, blessed protection, our worst foes can only push us heavenward. They cannot harm us. Hence,

"We may smile at Satan's rage,
And face a frowning world."

But are they all therefore our friends? Shall we call them friends? Call Satan a friend? Cleaving to the Lord with all our hearts, it is our privilege and duty to thank God for everything; but ought we therefore to call everything a friend?

I most fully believe the Christian has cause to thank God that there are tempting devils. We will see the day, but not here, when we will thank God for every temptation by which He has permitted us to be tried; but shall we call devils friends, and thank them for all they have done to us? No. They most heartily meant it for evil, but our Father meant it for our good, and turned it into good. To hear many talk and preach, you would suppose that death is one of our very best friends; but the infallible Word calls it an enemy—only an enemy and never a friend. What right have we to alter that Word and call that friend which God has called an enemy? Do we know better than He? What comparison is there between death and a translation—between even a sudden death and the changing our mortal to immortality? By translation, the bodies of Enoch and Elijah were taken to heaven. When not translated, the body at death is left to moulder back to dust. The bodies of the most holy of all past generations have as really returned to dust as those of the most unholy. The holy who will be alive at the coming of Christ will be translated. "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," the resurrected dead, and the holy living will be changed, so that their corruption will put on incorruption, and their mortal put on immortality. (1 Cor. xv. 51–54; 1 Thess. 4: 16–17.) Their terrestrial bodies will become celestial. Is it not strange that our great and good men will so frequently compare the sad consequences of sin to the glorious triumphs of Christ's death—the rewards of sin to the highest rewards that will be given to the redeemed? I would rather compare earth to heaven—the present, sad, sorrowful life to the most glorious one which is to come. When we die, however sudden may be our death, however triumphant may be our faith, however glorious may be our departure, death triumphs over us. Our bodies must lie under the power of death till the resurrection.

Translation will take place at the coming of Christ; not before. Then we shall put on immortality, and shall triumph over death, and not before. Those who are alive at the coming of Christ and are translated will never be subjected to death. Their triumph over death will be as complete and as eternal as that of the resurrected. In the case of any one of us, we will not have triumphed over death until we shall have waked from the tomb, or until we shall have been translated at His coming. A happy death is not triumphing over death, but is our falling under the power of death in hope of a glorious resurrection—in hope of a future, glorious and eternal triumph over death. Those who die happily, believe their flesh shall only

"Slumber in the ground,
Till the last trumpet's joyful sound;
Then burst the chains, with sweet surprise,
And in their Saviour's image rise."

. . . . . .

Our resurrection, and putting on immortality will be in consequence of Christ's death, and of our trusting in Him. If Christ had not died, there would have been no resurrection. If we do not believe in Him, we will have no glorious triumph over death.

. . . . . .

We use language that is calculated to deceive when we compare death to a translation. Though it may please weeping friends, yet we use comparisons which the Bible does not authorize. Some of those who lauded Mr. Barnes lauded sudden deaths. They called in question the truthfulness and the wisdom of that petition in the Episcopal service which prays for deliverance from sudden death. Perhaps, some of them, had he died by a slow, lingering death, but in all the triumphs of faith, would have lauded that mode of departure. But is sudden death desirable? Our Father knows for whom it is desirable; whether it is best for you and me or not. I believe it is one of the subjects on which the Bible is silent; and, perhaps, it is best I should say but little on the subject. A mode of death which may be best for one, may not be for another.

. . . . . .

But if any one wants a sudden death, I know not that there is anything wrong in his praying for it, provided it is done in submission. Perhaps that very feeling may have been implanted by Him, who knows it is best for him. However diverse may be our feelings and petitions, every prayer which the Holy Spirit indites is right.

. . . . . .

I have been very much interested in the language of a lady, who, when questioned if she was happy, said, very far from it; but in answer to other questions, respecting her death, said if it was her Father's will to put her to bed in the dark, she could trust Him. It is good to trust God in the dark. Our Father is infinitely wise, good, kind and merciful, and if we trust in Him, He will select for us the best time, place and way. It is most desirable for us to have no will of our own—to lose our will in the will of God. We ought to be willing to live, labor and suffer for God as long as he wills. Let it be ours not to have a wish of our own. Such a frame of mind is incomparably more desirable than to die in ecstasies. Better to die perfectly resigned to the will of our Father, even if under a cloud, than to die in raptures—longing to be with Jesus. Men apparently on a death-bed, and longing to die, being very happy, have recovered, and returned to the world. Many who have been very happy in church have soon after shown that their joys were not well founded. But in sweet resignation to the will of God there is no deception. It is a more heavenly feeling than rapturous joy—better than to see the opening heavens.

I have been very much interested in the answers of a lady, who, when it was inquired if she was willing to die, informed them she had no will of her own; but when they said, if God should refer it to you, would you wish to die, answered that she should refer it back to Him. I know sight is pleasant. As we are departing, we wish, like Stephen, to see the open heavens; but above all, let us wish and pray for perfect resignation to our Father's will.

The faith that can and does trust God in the dark, honors Him the most. The darker it is, the more it honors Him. It is so through the whole journey of life. It is pleasant to pass life in the sunshine—to have no clouds and darkness; yet it is not always best for us, and does not always honor God. When it is perfectly dark, no light, to trust—to hold on to the promise, honors God, and is most profitable to us. I recently read of a good lady who was enduring a crushing heart trouble and all was perfect darkness, in answer to her daughter's complainings, said, "Hush, shall we not bear our cross when we have His strength to lean upon?"

"His hand the good man fastens on the skies,
And bids earth roll, nor feels her idle whirl."

THE EARTH MAN'S HOME.

IT has been amongst the arguments derived from analogy in favor of a future state that, otherwise, the disorders and inequalities of human condition, the calamities of virtue, and the successes of vice, would seem to cast a shade upon the moral government of God. But while this idea has pressed closely upon the thoughtful, it has been their habit to look out for the adjustment of these disorders, not in the sense in which they have existed, but in a sense which has never exhibited a single trace of the same disaster. But is this habit of thought consistent either with our natural expectations or with the real statements of revelation?

Is it consistent with our natural expectations? The circumstances which will approach nearest to our own, are those of a race of men, connected with a wide dominion of which they form but a part, who should have thrown off the allegiance which they owed to their sovereign, and who are now occupied with speculations and pursuits entirely their own, independent of the will, and subversive of the laws of the monarch to whom they were subject. Let it be supposed that the monarch is just, forbearing, kind and powerful. He looks with indignation and sorrow upon that province of his empire, wasted by discord, impoverished by vice, ravaged by cruelty, oppressed by force and wretched through crime. He contemplates the struggle with a keen and cautious eye—and resolves to undertake the vindication of his insulted authority.

Two modes of action might present themselves to his mind. He might send a special commission into the land—he might accompany this commission with an overwhelming force, before which all the resources of the rebellious must at once be annihilated. He might arrest the daring and the guilty, and by a judicial process arrange the scale of punishment, and assign to each the just expiation of his crime—he might collect the loyal, and acquaint himself with all their claims upon his regard—he might then transfer them, with all their possessions, to the peaceful regions of his empire—he might chase to some inhospitable climate the guilty thousands who had taken arms against his authority; and having cleared the land of its inhabitants, he might lay waste its dwellings; destroy by fire and violence the fertility of its fields; give up its beauty to neglect and oblivion; blot out its name from the titles of his crown, and consign it, in its ruined condition, to be a lasting memorial of the folly of rebellion.

Or he might send a commission, not to annihilate, but to repair—not to crush by violence, but to restore by wisdom—not to erase a title from his brows, but to recover allegiance to his laws. He might evidence the severity of justice, and the clemency of compassion—he might educate, enlighten, protect and reward—he might bring into exercise the latent sympathies of the misguided and the ignorant—he might bring to bear upon the hitherto degraded and unhappy, the nobler motives to human action, and he might succeed in the high and generous effort, of converting a moral wilderness into a scene of culture, fertility and concord. He might prefer the triumph of enmity removed—of rebellion crushed—of anarchy displaced—and of a land obedient to the sceptre which it had once refused.

I ask whether our natural feelings would not confirm the preference which the monarch had made.

But let it further be asked, Is this vindication of the power of the moral government of God, by the destruction of the world, the real statement of revelation? Has God indeed declared that this material earth shall be a memorial of wrath, but not of mercy? Is it the recorded purpose of his immutable will that the scene and place of redemption shall be separated from the people to be redeemed? That the earth with all its variety of garniture and beauty, once fitted to be the birthplace of their happiness, and given to them as the patrimony and sovereignty of their race, shall be torn away from their possession, and given up to the avenging flame? Is it indeed the verdict of Revelation, that this earth, on which the Redeemer walked and communed with men, in the hour of his humiliation, shall never be the scene of his fellowship with them in the day of his power and his glory? Did he "as a wayfaring man tarry with them only for a night," and ascend but to return only in the vengeance of insulted majesty, to annihilate the scene on which he endured this dishonor?

Is it, I would ask, without a distinct and adequate reason that the Lord Jesus Christ is called "the second Adam?" Surely the expression comprises a fuller meaning than that generally assigned to it. It implies indeed a similarity of relation between Adam and his descendants, and the Lord and his redeemed: a similarity of federal connection between themselves, and the persons dependant upon their actions. "As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive." The transmission of life is by the one, the transmission of death by the other. This is a great truth, momentous in all its consequences; but is it the whole truth? Is not Christ the antitype of Adam in another and very important sense? To Adam this material world was given as an inheritance; an empire over which he was to exercise a kingly power. The Mosaic record is expressed in these terms: "So God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them; and God said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth."

This original grant to Adam is referred to in after times by David, in the eighth Psalm; and the dominion of which he there speaks is by the apostle Paul ascribed in its full extent to Christ (Heb. ii.) as the second Adam. The creation of Adam after the image of God implies, therefore, the sovereignty to which he was heir. The image of God has been too exclusively limited to the idea of moral rectitude: but it comprises dominion as well as rectitude; hence in the renovated world, the saints are described as "kings" equally with "priests unto God." Both these blessings, rectitude and dominion, Adam forfeited by his transgressions. Satan immediately usurped the crown as it fell from Adam's head, and seized the dominion over the earth which Adam had forfeited. From that time he has maintained a despotic sway over mankind, and by our Lord himself is admitted to be the king, though an usurper, over the present world; for when our Lord entered into personal conflict with Satan, it was in that character that he regarded him. Satan pointed out to him "the kingdoms of the world," and expressed his willingness to yield him a delegated sovereignty, if he would allow him the claim of superiority. "All these will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me." Our Lord abhorred the blasphemy, but did not deny the usurpation. This usurpation is allowed by the inspired apostle, when he declared to the Corinthians that idolaters "sacrifice to devils, and not to God." Sacrifice is the loftiest homage which one being can pay to another; it is the highest token of submission, the last acknowledgment of supreme power.

But this period of usurpation is limited. In reference to the short duration of this unrighteous dominion, the Saviour declared, "Now is the judgment of this world, now shall the prince of this world be cast out;" "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Adam was formed after the image of God. And who is this image? We are told by the apostle (Heb. i.) "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken to us by his Son; whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds; who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person and upholding all things by the word of his power—when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the majesty on high." Adam was but the type of Christ. His creation of the dust of the earth, after the divine image of dominion, appears to have had special reference to this pattern. He represented Christ the true and only image of God. The dominion, therefore, granted to Adam, is in fact the dominion granted to Emmanuel, the Christ, the anointed "Ruler in Israel," "whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting." "And this man shall be the peace, though the 'mystic' Assyrian be come into our land."—Micah v. 1–5.

The past ages of mankind have exhibited the misrule and misery of usurped power. The dominion has been in satanic hands; and the successive schemes of human authority, their policy, art and strength have been the developments of his wisdom, in order to maintain, if possible, his full possession of the earth. But through all these dark periods of time, the plans of a mightier One are prepared in silence for their completion. The world belongs to Christ; the course of human things cannot therefore be at rest; the decree is gone forth. "And thou profane, wicked prince, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, thus saith the Lord God; remove the diadem, and take off the crown; exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him." (Ezek. xxi. 25–27.) Then, it would appear, will the earth be at rest, and the original grant of dominion to Adam be realized. Then will his redeemed church, rescued to share his glory in actual sovereignty, and perfect felicity, "reign with him upon the earth."

The contrary supposition appears to me at least to displace the consistency of the scheme of Revelation. If, according to the prevalent opinion, this material world be doomed to destruction, and not to renovation; if Christ shall come only as a mighty judge, to hold a last assize, to separate the righteous from the wicked, and then to annihilate the globe on which the career of guilt has been achieved, will the measure of revealed promise to the world be actually filled up?

It may confirm the view here given of the future, to inquire into the nature of that felicity which our Lord himself has taught us in our prayers to expect. It would be natural to suppose, that in the selection of blessings, which he condescended to make the subject of our prayers to God, the consummation of his own work of mercy would find a marked place. The supposition is consistent with the fact. He has concentrated a prayer for the completion of his own work, in the two remarkable expressions, "Thy kingdom come," "thy will be done on earth as in heaven." Can we refuse to admit that our Lord here bounds our view to this scene of earth? In heaven, that is, in the other regions of the universe of God, his will is already done: but here we are surrounded with a scene of rebellion, anarchy and sorrow. Does he then teach us to pray for a translation from this unquiet land to another and distant orb? He puts no such request within our lips; he directs us to pray for the establishment of his kingdom, and this kingdom appears to belong exclusively to this material earth. "Thy will be done on earth, as in heaven." Is not the inference twofold: first, that the earth is the theatre of his kingdom; and secondly, that conformity to his will is the absolute enjoyment of heaven? and that no loftier supplication can be associated with our thoughts, than that the hallowed sceptre should be replaced in human hands, even in the hands of the mighty Antitype, "the second Adam, the Lord from Heaven."

I ask then the Christian reader, if it be not desirable to call away our minds from human opinions; from the influence even of great names; from popular belief, however ancient; from theories, however venerable; from the prescriptive applause of centuries; from the vague and indistinct ritual of education; and to take our firm, courageous and patient stand upon the plain, grammatical and unwarped text of Scripture?

That wondrous volume, the charter of human hope, the anchor of human faith, affords instructions on this subject, to my mind more definite, and expectations more precise. Surely the Lord Jesus Christ is linked to our world by ties less fragile than those which the received theology has framed. He will COME AGAIN, and exhibit those ties in all their beauty and strength.—G. T. Noel, England.

NATURE AND LOCALITY OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD IN THE AGE TO COME.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD: Permit me to submit a few remarks on the following passage of Scripture:

"In whom (Christ) ye all trusted, after that ye heard the word of Truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession," etc.—Eph. i. 13, 14.

In the above passage we have an allusion to a "promise"—no other than the promise of God to Abraham that he, with his "seed" (which, saith Paul, is Christ), should possess the land of Canaan for an everlasting inheritance.

Then this promise, with which all believers were "sealed" by the Holy Spirit, is said to be the "earnest" only of every believer's "inheritance" until the "redemption" of the purchased possession.

From this we learn that the promised inheritance is at present in bondage, and that it has to be redeemed or reclaimed before it can be put in possession of those to whom it was promised; that therefore those to whom it was promised have for the present to be satisfied with the promise, and accept it as the "earnest" of the inheritance, till such time as God, who made the promise, shall "redeem" the thing promised—namely, the "inheritance" from those who now hold or possess it.

It is, therefore, interesting to know where the promised inheritance is, and who has, at the present time, possession of it. Now, all who understand the covenant of God with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, know that the promised "inheritance" is the "Holy Land," and those who know the modern history of Europe are aware that the "infidel Turks" obtained the Holy Land—the land covenanted to Abraham and his "seed"—by conquest, and that it remains in their possession to this day.

It is, therefore, evident that if it is ever to be possessed by Abraham and Christ it must first be "redeemed" or reclaimed from the Turks. The forcible redemption of the land covenanted by God to Abraham is the "redemption of the purchased possession" mentioned by Paul in the passage quoted as the subject of these remarks. And till this redemption of the land from the Turks takes place, believers in Christ have to be satisfied with the promise of possession, and accept it as the "earnest" of the inheritance, until it is rescued or "redeemed" from the "ruthless invader" of what is destined to be the territory proper of the future kingdom of Christ.

It is natural to inquire, when will such an event take place? I reply: When "the fulness of the Gentiles is come in." It is predicted that the promised inheritance (Land of Canaan) should be "trodden under foot of the Gentiles till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." The Turks will, therefore, hold on to Palestine till nearly the close of the present Gentile dispensation, when it will be "redeemed" for the everlasting possession of Christ and the resurrected saints, among whom will be Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Then the "crescent" of the unbelieving Turks will be replaced with the emblems of the "cross."

The central idea embodied in what is termed the "Eastern question" (the great question of all European political questions), has for its object the recovery or "redemption," by the so-called Christian nations of Europe, of the "Holy Land" from the grasp of the infidel Turk. These professedly Christian Powers acknowledge that an anomaly it is that there have been so many military and naval powers in Christian Europe, and that the "land" held sacred by all Christians should be permitted to be held in possession century after century, and desecrated by a nation who have no faith in Christ and the Cross—who have raised a heathen temple (the Mosque of Omar) upon the site of the once glorious Temple of Solomon.

And in this sense Christian nations may well ponder over the anomaly! One of the fairest portions of the earth—the scene of the nativity, life, ministry, suffering, death, resurrection and ascension of the Saviour of the world, even the holy sepulchre itself—in the possession of a nation of infidels hostile to the Christian and his creed, and yet surrounded by the most powerful military and naval powers in the world, all professing themselves Christian!

Thus from testimony of holy writ we draw the natural inference that no believer in Christ has as yet been put in possession of the "promised inheritance." And further, that no believer can be put in possession before that inheritance has been wrested from the grasp of the Turk who now holds it. All believers have to be satisfied with the "promise" of inheritance "until the redemption of the purchased possession." Christ purchased the possession with His blood: He endured the cross, despising the shame, that He might hereafter wear the "crown." "No cross, no crown," is an oft-quoted Scriptural phrase, but little understood even by those who quote it. As it is first the cross and then the crown, so there can be no kingdom without territory; and to be a kingdom there must be a king. For declaring Himself the future King of the Jews, Christ was subjected to the ignominious death of the cross. He has declared himself to be the future King of all the kings of the earth, and that he will hereafter reign on the earth till He has subdued all things to himself.

In view of all these statements what becomes of the orthodox notions of believers receiving their reward or "inheritance" at death? What becomes of the notion that believers go to heaven at death? What becomes of the orthodox notion that heaven, not the earth, is the future eternal abode of the saints? What becomes of the notion that man is by nature immortal? The fact is, all these notions are mere thinkings of the flesh, heathen doctrines and dogmas, as false as the Word of God is true. They are not to be found in the Scriptures from Genesis to Revelation, if you search till the day of resurrection. The testimony of Scripture is that man, in his present state, is purely mortal, and that immortality can be obtained only by a resurrection from the dead; that this earth, not heaven, is the future eternal abode of the resurrected saints; that there is no conscious existence between death and the resurrection, and that the resurrection takes place at the second coming, or advent, of Christ, when he will judge or rule the world in righteousness. Such are the glorious truths contained in the Gospel (good news) of the coming kingdom, which Christ taught His disciples to pray for. "Pray ye, 'Thy kingdom come.'" And why "Thy kingdom come" but that "Thy will may be done on earth (not in heaven) as it is done in heaven" (by the angelic hosts)?

That there should be in these last times an awful dearth of gospel truth in so-called Christendom need not surprise us when we refer to what the Prophet Amos predicts on the subject. He says:

"Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst of water, but of hearing of the words of the Lord; and they shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east, they shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord and shall not find it."—Amos viii. 11, 12.

Such, it appears, is the awful judgment which like a pall is now hanging over that portion of the earth erroneously designated Christendom. But if orthodox theology were true, the present period in the history of the church might truly be said to be one of its brightest epochs. Pauline theology and modern theology are, however, as opposite as the poles. There is scarcely any thing in common between them. "Oh! that men were wise, that they understood this," etc.—*N. Y. Mustard Seed.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

Jesus said to his disciples, "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you."

What Jesus said to the disciples, is also said to us; and if it was necessary for them to have faith and understand, so is it for us. But what about this "faith as a grain of mustard seed?" Mustard seed is very small indeed, and it seems as if that, in reality, would be but small faith, whereas we know it would take great faith, yea the strongest faith to do what Jesus says in the text.

Let us look again at the mustard seed. Read Matt. xiii. 31, 32: "The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed, which a man took and sowed in his field; which indeed is the least of all seeds; but when it is grown, it is the greatect among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof."

Let us have this kind of faith. Not always small like the original mustard seed if it never be planted, but exercise it so it can expand and increase, and become strong.

The Greek lexiçon says of it, "A plant belonging to the same genus as our mustard, but of a different species; and in the fertile soil of Palestine often growing to a very considerable height."

The idea is to have our faith expand and grow like the mustard seed planted in the fertile soil of Palestine.

This expression, "If your faith increase as a grain of mustard seed," etc., is not original with me. I was spending a few days at Br. William Thorne's, in Yonkers, so he and his wife with myself, spent part of an afternoon at Br. John Kemp's. We had a very pleasing and profitable time. Among other things, Br. Kemp gave us a very lively account of a Bible class he attended in Cooper Institute, some years ago.

This subject of faith came up. One brother in the class had an old, but choice translation of the New Testament. It read, "If your faith increased as a grain of mustard seed." It was a new and precious idea of that text, and too good we think to keep to ourself. Br. Kemp says he greatly misses that Bible class. They had such good feeling in it, and a free exchange of thought. We all need such, and why don't we have them?

Another brother, who could read the Hebrew more easily than the English, translated the last verse in Obadiah for them. Our translation reads, "And saviours shall come upon Mount Zion to judge the Mount of Esau; and the kingdom shall be the Lord's." He translated it, "And the saved ones shall come up on Mount Zion," etc. What a beautiful thought; besides, we know there is only one Saviour.

Let us grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom be glory both now and forever. Amen.

Mneemeiois. John v. 28.

BY S. COOPER.

Br. Storrs: There has evidently been in circulation a mistaken idea, which ought to be corrected, in relation to this Greek word, which in John v. 28 is rendered graves. It has been reported and supposed to occur but twice rendered grave in the Scriptures; but it appears to be found eight times rendered grave and graves; and twenty-nine times translated sepulchre. I will give references to where it is rendered grave, that those who wish may examine them: Matt. xxvii. 52, 33; Luke xi. 44; John v; 28 and xi. 17, 31, 38, and xii. 17.

The truth is what we want, and which we wish to handle, not deceitfully or mistakenly, but understandingly.

There is a time in man's life when he is disposed to be vexed at God, on account of the troubles of life; but if a man does right, and bears his lot with patience, and labors daily to grow wiser, there comes another time when he begins to see that God does things well,—that troubles are great blessings, and when his inclination to murmur, gives place to gratitude and praise. It has been so with me.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 9, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Our Assistant Editor.

We regret to learn, by a private note from this dear brother, that his health has not improved since he went into the country three weeks ago. He still remains there, but cannot tell whether he will return to this city before the camp-meeting. We trust he may be present at that meeting.

"The World's Crisis."

We sent a copy of our recent Pamphlet, a second edition, to Eld. Miles Grant, not as editor of the above-named paper, but as a personal affair, as we sent it to several others. We did not request him to notice it; but he saw fit to do so in the following manner:

A NEW THEORY.

We have just received a pamphlet of seventy-two pages, entitled "A Vindication of the Government of God over the Children of men; or the Promise and Oath of God to Abraham." By George Storrs. In this pamphlet Br. Storrs endeavors to prove that all who have not heard the gospel will be raised from the dead, and have an opportunity to hear about Christ, when they will either receive or reject him. We would say that the arguments presented by Br. S. in favor of his position, do not convince our mind that his new system of salvation for the heathen is correct, and in harmony with the Scriptures. We can see that his new position overthrows his former one, in relation to the resurrection of the wicked dead. He and his associates have urged the point that no one could be raised from the dead except those who had the Spirit of Christ in them; that is, none but Christians. Of course, he will not claim that the heathen were Christians, in possession of the Spirit of Christ; hence, when he assumes that they will be raised to hear the preaching of the gospel, in the coming age, he strikes a death-blow to the doctrine of the non-resurrection of all who are not Christians. Both positions cannot be true, because they contradict each other. If one unconverted man will be raised, why not all?

We think it best to believe Paul, when he said: "There shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust" (Acts xxiv. 15); and Jesus when he said: "Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth."—John v. 28, 29.

Those who have read our pamphlet can judge how accurate the foregoing representation is, and we have no disposition to complain of its inaccuracies, for we know something of the blinding influence of prejudice, and if Life believers misrepresent our views and condemn them unheard, without examination, and refuse to let them appear in the Herald of Life, we certainly cannot blame Br. Grant, or any of his way of thinking, for putting a wrong construction on our words, and thereby making a wrong impression as to our past and present views. We wish to cultivate a charitable spirit toward our theological opposers of every class; but we shall not do it, knowingly, at the expense of what we regard as truth.

That our arguments, in our pamphlet, "do not convince" Br. Grant's mind that our "new system of salvation for the heathen is correct, and in harmony with the Scriptures," is not to be wondered at; nor do his arguments against inherent immortality and endless torment "convince" his neighbors of the "Advent Herald" that "his new system," on those topics, are "correct," though he has for years endeavored to make them and others think they were. We have but just commenced with what Br. G. calls "A New Theory;" and it is not likely he would be convinced without more time to weigh the subject. One thing however is in favor of the idea that Br. Grant may yet be a convert; that is, he believes in the resurrection of all those who have never heard the Gospel, as well as those who have. We have not, then, the difficulty in his conversion that we have in the case of those who deny any resurrection of the heathen, or such as have never heard of God's love to the world. Between Br. G. and ourself it is only a question of how the resurrected heathen are to be disposed of after their resurrection. It is not a question about a "new system of salvation to the heathen;" but, shall the old system, promised and sworn to by Jehovah, be carried out? and the fact that Christ "gave himself a ransom for all" men, "be testified" to all "in due time?" Shall this Gospel be preached "to every creature" in order that "he that believeth" it "shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be condemned?" Will Br. Grant say, that justice can condemn a man for not believing that of which he never heard? The very thought of such an act is next door to eternal torments: both are as far removed from the equitable government of God as truth is from error; or to use an old saying, "as heaven is from hell." To our mind, it is a blasphemy against God and the government of the creatures He has made.

That we have modified our views on the subject of resurrection—or, rather the manner of stating the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked dead, we have admitted; but that our present view, or "new position overthrows" our "former one, in relation to the resurrection of the wicked dead," we do not admit; and Br. G. overlooks, or entirely misapprehends our "argument" on that point in our pamphlet. It is simply a question of, who are the wicked dead? The Gospel knows of only one class who, in a Scripture sense, are properly called the wicked dead, viz., those who have died in unbelief; or, who have died in the wilful rejection of Christ as their Redeemer or Deliverer. No man can be guilty of this sin who has never heard of Christ, or to whom God's love in Christ has never been made known. It is "he that believeth not" that "shall be damned"—who "shall not see life."

Clearly, then, no man is a sinner, past remedy, except such as "will not come unto" Christ "that they may have life." None can be put in this class who have never heard the Gospel message; and "God will have all men come to the knowledge of the truth" in His own "due time." So saith "the Scriptures," even if Br. G.'s "mind" is not yet "convinced" of it.

But Br. Grant says, that, we and our "associates have urged the point that no one could be raised from the dead except . . . Christians;" and says, "of course, he will not claim that the heathen were Cnristians," etc. That we have been too unguarded in some expressions on the subject, formerly, may be admitted; but Br. G. must not forget that Paul says, "We know in part;" and Peter was quite certain, for some years after the day of Pentecost, that there was no salvation for the Gentiles, and would not go to Cornelius without disputing the matter with "the voice," even "from heaven," which bade him do that which he protested he never had done. If, then, we have, heretofore, not sufficiently surveyed the whole ground of God's designs towards the children of men, we have not been more faulty than Peter was; but seeing God has opened our eyes "to see the way of the Lord more perfectly" we do not intend to close them against the light, lest we be left in darkness; for, saith Jesus, "If I had not come and spoken unto them they had not had sin." It is sinning against light that brings condemnation. That we intend to avoid, if possible.

We certainly never did "claim that the heathen were Christians;" but we do claim they are not unbelievers, or wicked in the gospel sense; and therefore are not "the wicked dead"—when dead—of whom we have said, and still say, they will never live again; hence, Br. G. will see, we have struck no "death-blow to the doctrine of the non-resurrection of all who are" wicked, in the gospel sense.

Br. G. asks, "If one unconverted man will be raised, why not all?" Because, some unconverted men have had the gospel, been enlightened by it, and have wilfully rejected it: while others never have had the gospel, and consequently, have never rejected it, nor "done despite unto the Spirit of grace." Br. G. might as well ask, If one sinner is saved, why not all?

As to our brother's quotation of Acts xxiv. 15, and John v. 28, 29, even with his view of them, they go to confirm our "new position," so far as it differs, in any respect, from our previous one. It remains for him to prove that the all, who are raised, will die again; or that mercy will never be shown any of them. Let him put himself to that work, if he thinks it an easy one. Does he believe all the millions on millions of the ignorant and untaught heathen, and people of all the dark ages of the world's history, who have lived and died in utter ignorance of God, and without any means of knowing Him or His love to the world in the gift of His Son, are to be raised from the dead, without any knowledge even of their Judge, till they see him sitting on his throne of judgment, and then to be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone? If our brother believes that to be the character of his God, we do not see why he need shrink from the endless torture doctrine: it is only a difference in time, not in character: both are an outrage on all the reason and sense of justice God has implanted in man's nature, and makes Him to contradict Himself, who has sworn that He hath "no pleasure in the death of the wicked;" while, in fact, He has placed millions on millions of the human family in circumstances, where He knew it was impossible for them to be blessed with the means of salvation in this life, and thus, virtually, determined they should die not once, only, but twice; and that under the most hopeless and horrible circumstances!

We cannot believe the kind and loving heart of our brother will long be bound in such thoughts of the Maker of us all, whose loving heart led Him to give up His only begotten and dearly beloved Son to agony and death "a ransom for all; to be testified in due time" to all for whom He died. No, no, a brighter view of God's dealing with the children of men is dawning on this benighted world; and Br. Grant, we trust, will "come to the front" in this glorious work.

"Search the Scriptures."

Such is the injunction of Him who "spake as never man spake," and who knew where the fountain of truth is. He once severely reproved his disciples, after his resurrection, for their "slowness of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken." The same disposition exists, to-day, of disbelief in the prophesies of the Old Testament Scriptures; and they are, mostly, lightly esteemed, or accounted of little consequence now that we have the New Testament.

In order to have a comprehensive and true knowledge of the mind of God, we must have an understanding of both Testaments, and the Old was the one, and the only one, that Jesus commanded his hearers to "search:" the New was not written till years had passed away, and cannot be understood except by a diligent and careful comparison with the Old. How certain, then, are those to err who discard the Old Testament, or lightly esteem it, and so explain the New as to contradict it. Such teachers "err, not knowing the Scriptures" to which Jesus referred, and which Paul tells Timothy, "are given by inspiration of God, and profitable;" and, also, "able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus." Peter, in like manner, speaking of the prophecies of the Old Testament, after referring to the scene in the mount of transfiguration, tells us, "We have the prophetic word more firm; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as to a light that shineth in a dark place." . . . "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scriptures is by any private impulse, or invention: for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Such being the fact in regard to the Old Testament, what presumption, not to say blasphemy, for men to set light by this inspired testimony, or attempt to prove it unreliable by calling its prophetic declarations conditional. If one prophecy is of that character, all may be; and then the foundation of faith is swept away, and no sure hope of the personal return of Christ from heaven can exist; for that return and His reign on earth are both the subject of prophecy.

It will be seen, hence, that in order to be benefitted by the Scriptures there must be faith; which is confidence in, or reliance on what is written or spoken. Man's belief or unbelief influences him in all his tempers, words and actions. How is faith to be produced if words do not mean what they say? If we are led to suppose the speaker does not mean just what the words naturally import, what ground for faith can exist? Certainly none at all, unless the speaker explains that the words are not intended to be understood literally; or some of his other words contradict the literal sense and compel a different one.

Our first parents fell by disbelieving, on the one hand, the truth God had spoken: and, on the other hand, by believing a lie. If, however, the prohibition and threatening had not been in plain and literal language, who could blame them for misconstruing it? The tempter told them the language, "Thou shalt surely die," did not mean what it expressed; but that "God knew" to eat of that tree would make them "as Gods." This was the first sermon ever preached teaching that God does not mean what his words literally express; and it is the model sermon, after which all those copy who give a mystical meaning to the plain words of God; especially, in treating of the prophecies of the Bible.

From the lie in Eden to the present time, the real cause of infidelity is, mystifying the testimony of God; thus producing uncertainty as to its meaning and destroying faith; and professing Christians are mainly responsible for this serpentine work. It has brought the Bible into contempt, and almost banished real faith from the earth; and it has filled the world with superstition and wild fanaticism, which goes under the name of deep devotion, or spiritual-mindedness, and palms itself off for true religion on the simple-hearted and unsuspecting, while it denounces those on whom it fails to impose its fancies as lacking in spiritual discernment.

It is our desire to raise, in the minds of those with whom we communicate, confidence, unshaken faith, in what God has said. This cannot be done unless we can be convinced that He means what His words express, unless it can be clearly shown that His other clear testimony forbids the literal construction of the language.

When God has promised and made oath to any thing, we are not at liberty to give any other construction to the words, "that have gone out of His mouth," than the literal and obvious meaning of the language employed: He "will not alter the thing" that He hath spoken. Psa. lxxxix. 34. No trifling with such testimony is to be indulged in, or attempts to limit its meaning. We are firmly to believe God says what he means, and means what he says; and we are not at liberty to add to or take from the obvious sense of the language.

Not to regard this principle is to weaken or destroy the Divine testimony; and we are in danger of making "void the words of God by the traditions of men." The more simple and unqualified our faith in such testimony, the more peace and quietness of mind shall we possess, and the more shall we honor God; and He will take care to honor us for our confidence. Abraham is the grand example of such trust in God's word, when he withheld not his beloved son Isaac, but offered him up for a burnt offering, after God had promised him, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called." A "knife lay at the throat of the promise;" but Abraham staggered not; "accounting that God was able to raise" Isaac "up from the dead." Such is faith. It quibbles not at appearances, but gives glory to God by a steadfast reliance on His word, however dark the cloud that intervenes. Let us exercise like precious faith, that we may be blessed with Abraham.

A New Departure at Rome.

It seems that infallibility, of the Roman sort, is not above lying. A recent despatch from Rome says:

The Pope, in reply to an address by the Roman Academy, remonstrating against doc trines which are antagonistic to the spirit of modern times, disclaims any intention on the part of the Papacy to lay claim to inherent power to dispossess sovereigns or to assume direction over the worldly affairs of nations. "In ancient times," says His Holiness, "Christian nations revered the Pope, as the arbiter between sovereign and people in cases of disagreement, and great services have been rendered by the Papacy in preventing wars and healing up divisions among the nations of the world."

It is well known that the Papacy was continually stirring up strife and causing war in Europe—often directly inciting the conflict, as for instance the wars of the sixth century, which finally gave temporal power to the Popes. And as to Pope Pius' disclaimers of "power to dispossess sovereigns, or assume direction over worldly affairs of nations," it is only another proof of the folly the Roman church committed voting its latest dogma: for it conclusively proves that either Pius is, or some of his predecessors were quite fallible. For we read in the Clementii, lib. 2, lit. 1, c. 2—The bishop of Rome has power to absolve from all allegiance, obligation, bond of sacrifice. . . . the provinces, cities and armies of kings that rebel against him." Another declared: "The tribunals of kings are subjected to the power of the priests." (Crawf. p 300.) Innocent III. said: "Our Lord God the Pope; another God upon earth; King of kings and Lord of lords. . . . The power of the Pope is greater than all created power, and extends itself to things celestial, terrestrial and infernal."

It only remains to decide which infallible Pope was fallible, in order to settle the pretensions of Rome. Pius insinuates that he asserts only spiritual power, outside of the States of the Church. Innocent declares that all power in heaven, earth and hell is in his hands. History is against Pius. It shows that the Papacy has endeavored to enforce the sentiment of Innocent's utterances. The apology of Pius is a new departure, and is fatal to the infallibility dogma.—Ad. Ch. Times.

The American Life and Advent Camp-Meeting.

This Association of Advent Believers will hold their Annual Camp-Meeting upon their new and beautiful ground in "Carew's Grove," at Springfield, Mass., (distant about 1 1-4 miles from the railway station), commencing Sunday, Aug. 13, and continuing over Sunday, Aug. 20.

The Camp-Meeting Committee desire to say to the friends that Nature has contributed much for our camping place. We have an area of six acres of fine, level, dry tenting ground, dotted over with grand old trees, bestowing grateful shade. To these natural advantages, through the liberality of kind brethren, have been added all the accessories which thought could suggest as necessary to the comfort and convenience of all. Let all, then, far and near, from North and South, from East and West, turn aside from the dusty, weary way, and come in to this consecrated spot to rest and refresh awhile.

DEDICATION.

The Public Services of the meeting will commence Sunday, Aug. 13, at 10 1-2 A. M.; at which time a dedicatory sermon will be preached by Geo. Storrs, of New York.

FARES.

Fare on the Boston and Albany railroad is reduced one-third, which will be $4 from Boston to Springfield and return. Tickets to be obtained at the ticket offices between Boston and Worcester, at Grantville, Holliston, Natic, Westboro, Milford, and Southville; beyond Worcester at the usual stations. On the Hartford and New Haven railroad fare is reduced one-third. Tickets to be obtained at New Haven, Meriden, Middletown, Berlin, and New Britain, Hartford, Thompsonville, and Windsor Locks. On the Connecticut River railroad, fare is reduced one-third from South Vernon and intermediate stations to Springfield. On all the above roads camp-meeting tickets good from Aug. 10 to Aug. 30 must be called for at the ticket offices, and they must also be signed by the Secretary at the camp-meeting. Remember this. Friends coming from New York can come and return for $4 70 by taking the boat to New Haven, and thence by cars to Springfield. The boat which leaves New York at 3 15 P. M., connects with the train at the steamboat wharf, at New Haven. Passengers by this boat arrive in Springfield at 10 51 P. M. The other boat, which leaves New York at 11 P. M., reaches New Haven in time for the accommodation, which leaves New Haven at 8 A. M.; but passengers will have to go across the city by horse-cars to the depot of the Hartford and New Haven railroad. Tickets for the railroad to the camp-meeting will be sold on the steamboats. Passengers buying through tickets will be furnished with a return ticket, * which will be good only when endorsed by the Secretary of the camp-ground.

Omnibuses will be found in readiness at the Springfield depot to convey all to the ground. Fare 10 cents.

BOARD.

Good board will be furnished at 80 cents per day. Those intending to board themselves will find a choice and constant supply of groceries, provisions and fruits for sale upon the ground at regular market prices.

* The confusion experienced in regard to return tickets, by the boats, will not occur again.

Special Notice.

Br. T. R. Weaver writes: I have just completed arrangements by which passengers will be carried from the depot in Springfield to our camp-ground for 10 cents. Trunks for the same.

Mr. Collins will have his name on his carriages, and they will be at the depot on the arrival of each train.

Remember and call for Collins' Carriages, on your arrival at the depot, and he will carry you for 10 cents to our ground.

"The Abomination of Desolation."

BY POLLY G. PITTS.

In the Herald of Life for May 17, was an article written by a brother, on Matt. xxiv. He asks, "The Abomination of Desolation; Is it in the past?" Now as he says that he has to confess there are seeming insurmountable obstacles in the way of his believing that the time of trouble, spoken of, is in the past, I wish to give my views upon it, and perhaps it may remove some of those insurmountable obstacles out of the way, and throw some light on the subject.

And as Jesus went out, and departed from the temple, his disciples came to him for to show him the buildings of the temple. And he said unto them, See ye not all these things? Verily, I say unto you, There shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. And as he sat upon the mount of Olives, his disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us, when shall these things be? or, when shall the temple be destroyed? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and the end of the world, or age?

Now mark, here are three questions asked; and Jesus answers them by course. He says unto them, Take heed that ye be not deceived. For many shall come in my name, etc., and ye shall hear of wars, etc., but be not troubled, for all the things must come, but the end is not yet. Again he says, Nation shall rise against nation, etc., and famine and pestilence and earthquakes, etc., all these are the beginning of sorrows. Then they should be delivered up, and hated, and killed, etc.; and this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come; or, Jerusalem shall be destroyed. Was it so preached? and before the destruction of Jerusalem? Let us see. Paul says, Rom. x. 11, For the Scriptures saith, Whosoever believeth on him (i. e., Jesus) shall not be ashamed. For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek; for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. For whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved. How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach except they be sent, etc. Paul then asks, "Have they not all heard? (Hear him answer his own question.) Yes, verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words to the end of the world." Again Paul in his epistle to the Colossians, chap. i. speaking of their hope, which was laid up for them in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel; which is come unto you, as it is in all the world, etc. If ye continue in the faith, grounded, and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister. This has satisfied me so far.

Now let us look again at Jesus' answer to the first question. When shall these stones be thrown down? or, the temple destroyed? and I think we will get light on the abomination of desolation. Jesus says, And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; then shall the end come. When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whosoever readeth let him understand:) then (when the abomination of desolation stands in its holy place) let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains: let him which is on the housetop not come down to take any thing out of his house: neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes (as if he had said, Do not burden yourselves, but flee for your lives, for the Romans will destroy the city and the sanctuary.) And woe unto them that are with child, etc. And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day! For then (in those days) shall be great tribulation, (mark this), such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time; no, nor ever shall be. (I believe it, heaven and earth shall pass away, but His word shall not pass away.)

St. Mark records the same words of our Saviour on this subject; and the Saviour's answer to the first question of the disciples is understood by Mark the same as by Matthew; and the answer of Jesus to the second question (what shall be the sign of thy coming?) is alike in both places.

We will now look at what Luke says on the same subject, and then at what Daniel says about the abomination of desolation, and where he locates it. In Luke xxi. 5, the same conversation is recorded of Christ and his disciples. And some spake of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones, and gifts. Jesus said, As for these things which ye behold, the days will come, in the which there shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down. (Is it not recorded in history that the Romans ploughed up the foundation of the temple to find treasures?) And they asked him, saying, Master, tell us, when shall these things be? etc. Now the answer of Jesus to his disciples on this first question, gives us all the light that we need on it. So it seems to me. He says, When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. (We all know that it was the Roman power that desolated Jerusalem.) Then, (When? when the Roman army stands where it ought not, or encompasses Jerusalem) let them which are in Judea flee into the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter therein. For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. Where were these things written? Turn to Deut. xxviii. and xxix chapters, and see if there was not a just prophetical description of this tribulation; and that what was written did not come upon them in its perfection.

Luke goes on to tell what Jesus said, in the same language that Matthew and Mark do. Jesus says, Woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days; for there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. Is not Jerusalem now trodden down by the Gentiles? Yes, surely; then the abomination of desolation must be in the past.

We will now look at what Daniel says about this abomination. In chap. ix. Gabriel is sent to give Daniel skill and understanding, concerning seventy weeks which were determined upon Daniel's people, and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, to make an end of sins, to bring in everlasting righteousness, and seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy. Know, therefore, and understand, from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, etc. After three-score and two weeks the Messiah shall be cut off; but not for himself: and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease; and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, (did he do it? yes,) even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate. And in chap. xii. it is said, And from the time the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the "abomination that maketh desolate set up;" there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Again, in the eleventh chap. of Daniel, there is a power spoken of with whom the Jews made a league; and in the Apocrypha, 1 Maccabees viii. it is said it was with the Romans; and profane history says the same. And Daniel says, After the league made with him, he shall work deceitfully: for he shall come up, and shall become strong with a small people. Daniel goes on to tell what he will do, and that he shall have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant. And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate. And such as do wickedly against the covenant shall he corrupt by flatteries: but the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits. And they that understand among the people shall instruct the many: yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days. Yes, many days.

Have God's people suffered so? How long is it since Rome Papal, and temporal, has had power to put the children of God to death? Not very long; and I believe Christ spoke with reference to these days of suffering and persecution, after he answered the first question; for he says, After the tribulation of those days, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. This is the answer to the second question. He never speaks of another time of trouble near the end, but rather speaks as though there would be a cry of peace, and safety when sudden destruction should come, and the wicked should not escape. He says, Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, etc., and that day come upon you unawares. Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come upon the earth, and stand before the Son of Man.

May God give us wisdom that we may understand His word, and be ready with our lamps trimmed and burning, and we like unto men that look for their Lord. Your sister in the Lord, "Waiting."

EVANSVILLE, WIS., July 24, 1871.

THE CAMP-MEETING.

BR. STORRS: Allow me to say, farther, that more real importance is attached to this meeting than has existed with any previous one, or can exist with any future one, if we should hold more. It is to be a "Life" meeting. It is to be an Advent meeting: indeed, I hope this will commend it to the favorable consideration of all lovers of these themes. There is no salvation, as I hold, in preaching "Life," technically speaking, or Age to come, the thousand years past, or "come out of her my people," or "liberty," unless we spread the immediate personal coming of the Lord. This must make, to a great extent, the burden of our theme. Then it will be a free meeting: so free that all can enjoy it, and all improve it. You cannot only hold your views, but you may preach them, and urge them. How different this will be from former years, and how mighty shall we be in this freedom, being in the advance of the rest of our brethren. As the Bishop of Bossina said, in the Ecumenical, "If we would be great, we must be free."

It is, again, to be a meeting where the wisdom, talent, and pious feeling of the body shall be represented, and you should be there. Good is to be expected. The re-union will be good, and the Annual Meeting of the "Life and Advent Union" the most important that has ever been held. I hope, therefore, all will come, from far and near, with a deep and absorbing interest to make this meeting all it should be.

W. S. CAMPBELL.

July 28, 1871.

FROM ELD. R. V. LYON.

BR. STORRS: Since my last in the HERALD OF LIFE, I have held a number of grove meetings in Canada West. Gatherings very large. At N. it was the eighth yearly meeting which I have held in that place. The people came some twenty miles. There were thousands present to hear. It was equal to a Methodist camp-meeting. Better attention from such a mass of human beings could not have been expected. The Lord will, I am to hold grove meetings in the same places next June and July.

I have spent some days in the city of Hamilton, C. W., speaking in the evenings in the grove (open air), to large congregations, who gave the best attention to my message.

By the invitation of a leading member of the Free Methodist church, I preached last first day in the Free Meeting House (built mostly by himself), some five miles from this, to a large congregation, who gave most profound attention to my message. Had an invitation to come again.

Sold quite a number of "Kingdom of God, and Life only in Christ." The Methodist preacher, who was present to hear, bought one. This work contains 360 pages of readable matter, neatly bound. It can be had, free of postage, by sending $1 10 to my address, Suspension Bridge, N. Y. It should be in the hands of all who love the truth.

I am interested in the circulation of the HERALD OF LIFE, but it must be open to receive articles in favor of Israel's future restoration to God's favor, and the land of Canaan, as well as Life only in Christ.

N. B. A PROPOSITION.—Resolved, That the Old and New Testaments teach the future gathering of Judah and Israel, or a portion of the natural posterity of Abraham to the land of Canaan. Book, chapter and verse to be given by each disputant.

I will take the affirmative of this proposition in an oral discussion with any of my peers.

BENJAMIN MELLOR, Rockdale Mills, Pa., writes: I am glad to hear that you are still progressing in the knowledge and love of God and of his Son Jesus Christ; and I hope and pray that He may make you the honored instrument of enlightening His church in that sublime mystery which has been (partially, at least,) hid for ages, viz., God's promise and oath to Abraham. I confess it was somewhat of a disappointment to me, and I doubt not to others, when you were requested to desist from proceeding farther with the subject in the weekly issue of the HERALD OF LIFE. But am now reconciled, since it has been the means of bringing out your Pamphlet, which, I hope and trust, will take a wider spread than the weekly has hitherto done.

FROM LOUISA J. BEACH.

BR. STORRS: I do not know what you think of me, that I do not write to you. I have long been wishing to write, and feeling that I must do so; yet I do not know when I ever felt so reluctant to write after all. I now see that I ought to have done so some time ago.

My great trouble has been in regard to money for the paper. At the last camp-meeting I pledged ten dollars, and the same for my husband. I also promised five dollars toward the camp-meeting fund and the tract fund. These pledges were made in good faith, and a thought never occurred to me that I should ever be unable to fulfil them.

I found my husband sick, when I returned from Springfield, and then commenced a long, dark hour of trial, care and perplexity for me, that has not yet ended.

My expenses have been heavy, of course, and are continuous, as we must live, etc.; but my income is insufficient to meet these and all my obligations. My husband has earned nothing this long time; or rather, I should say, that as we sold our share in the business to Br. Powell, last spring, we have nothing from that direction, whatever, to depend upon. I say we, for my husband's mind was in such a state that he could take no interest whatever in business; and although I have gone over the whole ground many times with him, and explained all to his satisfaction, yet in a few hours it would all be forgotten, and he can tell nothing of it to-day; and sometimes he says, he knows not why he is not in the business now. He is improving slowly, yet requires much care. He is able to do some light work about the place, if some one reminds him of it and tells him what to do.

You can imagine a little what I have on my mind; yet the Lord has sustained me thus far, and I have not quite given out. I have curtailed my expenses in every way possible, and am doing my work without help, and have done a great deal out of doors beside. It seems almost a miracle, to those who know me, that I have held out so. I have property enough in my hands to relieve me of all difficulty, and leave me a home, if I could only get matters into the right shape; but I cannot; and it is a great trial to be in debt. I am looking to the Lord to direct and help me in the matter, for I have nowhere else to look. I own myself a beautiful and valuable horse, and I think I shall sell it, in order to raise funds; and hope in this way, if no other, to be able to send you more. I should have written before, but kept hoping I could send. You cannot think how I have suffered in mind on these things. I am so situated that I can seldom attend meeting, and have few privileges; but I have enjoyed sweet communion with the Lord much of the time, and feel his blessing while in the furnace.

I send $5, to be applied on my pledge. I do not certainly know if I can be at the meeting at Springfield; shall if I can. Remember me and mine when you pray.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., Aug. 4, 1871.

FROM JENNIE R. SHAFFER.

BR. STORRS: I enclose $2 for that highly esteemed HERALD OF LIFE, hoping I shall ever be able to be blessed with the privilege of perusing its columns, and that it may ever flourish, and when one is stricken down by death, which is probable in old age, another may be able to do the like work. I must say I never enjoyed reading the Bible so much as now, and through your paper I have been led to see more clear the harmony and love of our heavenly Father. Though partially believing the Life views, and the reviving of the wicked dead, I liked Br. Thomas Read's expositions of Scripture. I hope his health will admit of his writing more largely in the future.

I was sadly disappointed on learning "The Promise and Oath of God to Abraham," was discontinued; am very anxious to read the pamphlet, (for which I shall send). I think it is certainly a pity some are not willing to exercise patience toward all that may be said or written on any one subject pertaining to Bible truth, even should it conflict with our former views and opinions; if wrong, be thankful and ready to throw away old prejudices. I trust I may ever be ready and willing to receive instruction which will make wise unto salvation; not be like the Pharisees, having eyes, but see not; and ears, hear not, neither understand. Hoping, by the grace of God, to be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand, having girded our loins about with truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and stand firm in apostolic faith.

"If we would keep our armor bright,
Attend with constant care—
Always walking in His sight;
And watching unto prayer."

May the Lord of peace himself give us peace always, in all things.

MONTROSE, MO., July 24, 1871.

BR. S. COOPER, Woodstock Valley, Conn., writes: I regret that circumstances are such that I do not see how myself and family can attend camp-meeting this year as usual. I feel a deep interest in the meeting, and shall not cease to pray for the Divine Spirit's presence and lead in all the transactions of the meeting. My whole heart is in sympathy with freedom, free meeting and free paper: free as wisdom and prudence may direct. I do not expect my presence would add to the spiritual interest or discretionary measures of the meeting; yet it is the place to which I love to resort; having laid aside the common cares of life to enjoy Christian association in fellowship and worship. May the Lord abundantly bless the meeting.

FROM W. H. WHITMAN.

DEAR READERS OF THE HERALD: As we have not written anything for the HERALD for a long time, we thought we would write a few lines. We were confined at home all last winter and spring on account of my wife's health. She is severely afflicted with catarrh in her head. She is better in the summer season; but gets worse as winter sets in.

We have strong faith in the near approach of the coming and kingdom of our Lord Jesus, to raise the dead saints, and change the living ones; and all to be gathered with their Lord, and take the government of the world, and rule it in righteousness.

We long to be out telling our fellow-men of these and other great truths concerning our LIFE-GIVER, and persuade them to turn to Him and live.

Dear brethren and sisters, if we live worthy of our calling, and obtain an inheritance in the kingdom of God, we will not have to set on cushioned stools and sing forever (as we have heard it taught), but we will all have something to do that will be a great pleasure to us, and to the King of kings, and Lord of lords.

How it made our heart ache when we read the notice from the Board of Managers in the HERALD of April 26th. Brethren, let us have a free paper; and if any of us are wrong, on any question, and can be made to see the error by a candid investigation of God's word through the medium of the HERALD, how thankful such will be.

May God give you wisdom and an abundance of his Holy Spirit, that all things may be done in order, and to divine acceptance, at your annual meeting.

We long to be with you on the camp-ground in August. But it is an impossibility, under existing circumstances. But let all that can go, go there to glorify God and his Son Jesus Christ.

GALESBURG, ILL., July 29, 1871.

ROMINE VAN ORMAN, Butler, Mo., writes: I have long been a believer in the soon coming of our Lord and Master; coming that is to bring life and immortality. I am the only one of the household of faith that there is in this part of the country that I know of; and I am looked upon with a feeling of, "Away with such stuff." But I feel that I know in whom I have believed, and one day it will all be made right.

Note by the Editor.

A valiant old "soldier" for the truth, you will find in Butler, viz., Mrs. Catharine C. Williams. Do not think you are alone while she dwells there. Please find her out, and rejoice in the consolation that one other, at least, dwells in Butler, Mo., besides yourself.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BR. STORRS: I take my pen once more to try to cheer the hearts of the tried children of our coming Messiah. O how the word "Messiah" sounds! It touches a cord in the heart of those that are looking and waiting for his glorious appearing. Dear brothers and sisters, I feel to-day that it is like standing up with you in the great conference, which began more than thirty years ago, and giving in my testimony to God's eternal truth of "No life out of Christ," of the immutability of God's oath and promise to Abraham and his seed; and of the increase and peace of Christ's government on the throne of his father David, "World without end." Amen. Bless the Lord.

There was a little incident happened when I was a child, say sixty-five years ago, that has often cheered me, even now, in old age and gray hairs. It was this: I was out in the field; the harvest had come, and the reapers with their sickles were reaping down the fields of grain; and toward noon they laid down their sickles and went to binding; then they gave a great shout, "A Bands O!" with all their might; the next field took it up, "A Bands O," and the next, and the next, and so on through all the broad table lands on Lake Champlain to the Canadas. Now, dear brethren, are we not like the reapers? Have we not sown in tears? Yes, verily; and are we not reaping in joy? Surely. I rejoice to-day with joy unspeakable that God's living truth is spreading in the land; though sown in much weakness it is spreading in power, and should not a mighty shout of "A Bands O!" or bless the Lord O my soul, from the waiting ones, go through the world, lifting up the hands that lie down, and strengthening the feeble knees? God grant that it may. O may the sound go out into the world, and the words to the end of the earth; may it reach the islands of the sea, cheer Br. Leask in his labor of love, and all the waiting ones there. May the little bands in California take it up and give it new strength. May God give us the bands that we may "Bind up the testimony, seal the law among the disciples." For I will wait for the Lord, and I will look for him. O, dear brethren, is not the time near when he that soweth and he that reapeth shall rejoice together? How oft do I feel to sing,

"Only waiting till the reapers
Have their last sheaf gathered home,
And earth's pilgrimage is ended,
And the day of glory come.

Quickly, reapers, gather quickly,
The last heir of glory in;
Come, O Jesus, end our waiting,
End the reign of death and sin."

O dear waiting ones take courage. "He that goeth forth weeping, or weepeth, and beareth precious seed (the incorruptible seed) shall doubtless (not a doubt) come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." O, precious promises of God; let us lay hold of them in faith, and pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth more laborers into the harvest field. I feel that it is like going out into the hedges, and compelling men to come in; but the incorruptible seed, the word of God, has a compelling power in it; and though it is full supper time, some will be drawn by the love of God, through Jesus Christ, to come in, even at the eleventh hour. Yes, God's house will be filled, every sheaf will be gathered home. Only once think of being bound up in the great Bundle of Life with Jesus, and our bands that bind us is "Love of God." Only think, dear friend, of the first sheaf, or first-fruit of this glorious harvest, the early resurrection of Jesus, and how acceptable it was to God, i. e., this great offering. God grant that we may all have a part in this "first resurrection," for on such the second death has no power. For if one died for all, then were all dead (surely); now if we fall asleep in Jesus, the gates of hades shall not prevail against us, for the harvest must be like its first-fruit. Jesus says, I will raise him up at the last day. Bless God for the blessed hope of the resurrection into eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. For there is no life out of him.

I do bless God for the HERALD OF LIFE. I felt when reading the last HERALD, that God's people were getting more united; and the errors that have divided the Advent bands were dying out. O, may the prayer of Jesus be answered, that his people may be one. O, how glad I would be to meet you all in your great gathering. May the blessing of God attend you in all your deliberations. May it be truly said, "This is God's host." And may Jesus be your great Marshal, who, by his Spirit, shall marshal your hosts to the battle.

Your affectionate sister in the Lord.

EVANSVILLE, WIS., July, 1871.

ELD. S. L. WALTER'S SICKNESS.

ELD. J. LEWIS writes from Oconee, Ill., saying: Br. Walter's situation is critical. We have but faint hope of his recovery: the doctor thinks it very doubtful; but the Lord is good, and peradventure He will restore him in answer to prayer. Pray for him and for me, that I may be able to go on my journey to Grafton. How long we shall be detained here we do not know, and our expenses are increasing. Br. Walter is very destitute of pecuniary means, and needs help. O, let love go out in alms-giving, and the Lord will bless the donors.

P. S.—Since the above was in type, we have received a note from Eld. Lewis saying: I write by the request of Br. Walter, whose labor of love, we fear, is all done, and soon he will cease from trouble and sleep in Jesus until He comes to make up His jewels. Br. Walter is fast sinking. He is happy, and his faith is unshaken in hope of a speedy resurrection to die no more. His dear wife is with him; both are away from home 72 miles. We have much reason to be thankful that our lot fell among friends of the same faith. Br. Babcock is poor in this world's goods, but rich in faith; he and his wife are doing all in their power with their means; yet we entreat the aid of our brethren and sisters abroad who are blessed with means to help Br. Walter and his wife in this their hour of need.

FALLEN ASLEEP.

DIED, in Tyrone, N. Y., on the evening of the 20th instant, of gangrenous inflammation, Mr. WILLIAM FORRESTER, aged 65 years.

Sadly we read these lines in a secular paper, and were made to realize that another of the Lord's soldiers had laid his armor by to sweetly await the LIFE-GIVER'S return. The first ray of light that we received of "No life out of Christ," was from Br. F. He was a devoted friend of the Life cause and a great lover of the HERALD OF LIFE, a deep and spiritual minded Christian, an earnest and discriminating Bible student, and an enthusiastic believer in "No life out of Christ." By a private letter of recent date we should judge that his heart was thoroughly electrified by the evidence of the Lord's soon coming. A firm and earnest defender of the faith "once delivered unto the saints" has fallen asleep, calmly and peacefully in Jesus, in the blessed hope of soon arising in immortality in the glorious image of Him who has conquered death. My heart rejoices in the hope of soon meeting him with the entire family of the redeemed, where all tears shall be affectionately "wiped away" by the hand of God, and "there shall be no more death."

WM. H. SPENCER.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., July 30, 1871.

DIED.

KNAPP.—Died of consumption, in Adams, Wis., July 20, 1871, O. P. Knapp, aged 55 years.

Patient through his long sickness, he passed into the dark land of the enemy, exclaiming, "All is well." Some time ago he was led to examine the Scriptures by reading the works of Br. Blain. He joyfully received the truth, thence onward, as life lingered, in sweet submission to the Divine will he received strength to bear all, believing that God has power to raise the dead. The morning before his death he whispered, "I have a bright hope of resurrection to life eternal." Words of comfort were given from 1 Thess. iv. 18. May the Lord sanctify this affliction to the friends and relatives both West and East.

BETHLEHEM HOME SCHOOL.

THIS excellent and well-known institution has just passed into the charge of Rev. AMBROSE RONDTHALER, who for upwards of sixteen years has been a Professional Teacher and Principal of educational institutions in York, and at Bethlehem, Pa.

The course of study is thorough, and all students enter not only the school-room but also become part of the Principal's family. All sectarianism is banished from the school.

The Bible only is the standard of religious instruction.

For terms and particulars send for circular.

REV. AMBROSE RONDTHALER,
Principal.

Note by the Editor.

The Fall term of Br. Rondthaler's School commences Aug. 16. He has the highest recommendations as a teacher. We hope that our friends, and others, having children that they wish to send from home to school, where they will have fatherly care and be well instructed, will patronize the above-named institution.

H. ROCKWELL.—The money was received and credited on your pledge.

He Knows.

I know not what will befall me! God hangs a mist
o'er my eyes,
And o'er each step of my onward path He makes new scenes to rise,
And every joy He sends me comes as a sweet and glad surprise.

I see not a step before me, as I tread the days of the year,
But the past is still in God's keeping, the future His mercy shall clear,
And what looks dark in the distance, may brighten,
as I draw near.

For perhaps the dreaded future has less bitterness than I think.
The Lord may sweeten the water before I stoop to drink.
Or, if Marah must be Marah, He will stand beside its brink.

It may be there is waiting for the coming of my feet,
Some gift of such rare blessedness, some joy so
strangely sweet,
That my lips can only tremble with the thanks I cannot speak.

O restful, blissful ignorance! 'Tis blessed not to know,
It keeps me quiet in those arms which will not let me go,
And hushes my soul to rest on the bosom which loves me so.

So I go on not knowing. I would not if I might;
I would rather walk on in the dark with God, than go alone in the light;
I would rather walk with Him by faith, than walk alone by sight.

My heart shrinks back from trials which the future
may disclose,
Yet I never had a sorrow but what the dear Lord chose;
So I send the coming tears back with the whispered
word "He knows."

Destruction of Mystic Babylon.

We extract the following from "Thoughts on the Coming and Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ—by John Cox, minister of the gospel, Woolwich," published some years since. The extract is taken from his thoughts on events to occur previous to the setting up of the kingdom of Christ. He says:

Great and beneficial changes are generally introduced by great and dreadful commotions. This chiefly arises from the opposition made by the old state of things about to be superseded. An eminent writer observes, "In every new development of his plan of mercy and salvation to the human race, it has hitherto pleased God that mercy and judgment should as it were go hand in hand. The calling of Abraham and the birth of Isaac were nearly coeval with the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire from heaven. The exodus from Egypt was associated with the desolation of that kingdom by the ten plagues, and the destruction of Pharaoh and his host in the Red sea. The establishment of Israel in the land of Canaan was effected by the extirpation of a great part of the aboriginal inhabitants. The settlement of the crown of Israel in the person and family of David, was accompanied with dreadful wars. The return of Judah from the Babylonish captivity was preceded by the fall of the empire of Assyria. That dispensation, whereby the Gentiles were brought into the church in the room of the Jews, was followed by the destruction of Jerusalem, with circumstances of so awful a nature, as made it a fit type and emblem of the judgments of the last days. In concluding, therefore, that the glorious inauguration of our Lord in his kingdom, which is to be ushered by his second advent, with the clouds of heaven, shall likewise be signalized by the most terrific displays of the Divine wrath against an unbelieving world, we not only are guided by the unerring testimony of prophecy, but we might even a priori, without any express assurances to that effect, have been led to form similar expectations, from an attentive study of the dispensations of Providence in past ages."

We now come to consider some of the great events, which must transpire in the world before the glorious kingdom of Christ is set up in it. This if rightly understood is an awful and alarming subject, a subject which the prophecies speak freely and largely upon. Nations will be reckoned with, long arrears of vengeance will be paid off, thrones and kingdoms will be overturned, all false religions fall, and oppressors feel the weight of God's wrath. These and like things will make way for Him whose right it is to reign. This is the judgment of the quick or living, which is to precede the judgment of the dead, both of whom Christ will judge at his appearing and kingdom, 2 Tim. iv. 1. The nature, progress, and design of these judgments, will be best understood by a diligent search of Psa. ii. 8–12; xlvi. 6–10; Isa. xxiv. 18–22; xxxiv. 1–8; Jer. xxv. 27–33; Dan. vii. 9–12; Rev. xi. 15–19; xiv. 18–20; xvi. 13–21; and xix. 11–21, and with many other passages too numerous to cite, to some of which we shall have occasion to refer.

But to particularize; 1. Before the establishment of Christ's reign popery must be entirely destroyed. The kingdom of Christ and that of Antichrist, cannot be dominant on this earth at the same time. The papacy has been termed Satan's masterpiece, and the Pope, Satan's Milchisedec; and some have considered that the whole system of popery is an infernal mimicry, or rather anticipation of that kingdom Christ is to set up in the world; and some were foolish enough to prophecy in the days of Constantine (Zedekiah-like) that the glorious era described Rev. xxi., was about to be introduced, when, alas! the building of mystical Babylon was going rapidly on. It is impossible to declare the whole truth concerning this horrible delusion, which is alike opposed to reason and revelation, to civil and religious liberty, to the interests of man for eternity, and to his happiness in time; it is a "strong delusion," and "a mystery of iniquity;" and it is a most astounding fact, which is a proof of the power of evil, and the wickedness and folly of man, that satan should be able to palm such a system upon the world under the name of Christianity, yea, and retain some of the essential doctrines of our most holy faith therein. The characteristics of Christianity are knowledge, holiness, and love; it is most simple, most beneficial, most beneficent; but the characteristics of popery are ignorance, sin, and cruelty; it is a religion of pomp, of darkness, and of blood. Well might John "wonder with great admiration," Rev. xvii. 6; as Mr. Fry observes, "Wonderful indeed must it have appeared in the age of John, that the apostate church should one day possess in sovereign state, the capital of the Roman empire, and should from the seven hills deal out her spiritual corruptions, to intoxicate and subdue the same world that the legions of the imperial city had conquered by the sword. But now we must shut our eyes indeed if we refuse to recognize, in this emblem of "the woman sitting on the scarlet beast," the vaunted apostolic sea of Rome. "Mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots," as the churches in the Roman Catholic communion remarkably express themselves when they speak of the Romish church, "Rome, mother, and mistress."

The papacy did not spring into being and maturity at once; it was slowly matured, until it reached a height of power of despotic power before unequalled. It is not our province at any length to trace its growth, or rehearse its deeds of blood. The professing church was Judaized, and philosophized, before the time of Constantine, but then it became paganized, and shortly after satanized. This mystery of iniquity worked in the apostle's days, and during the second and third centuries every kind of heresy was promulgated, ceremonies and forms were introduced, and spirituality displaced by superstition. The materials for popery were thus prepared, and by the union of the church with the Roman state, its foundation was openly laid, and the building rapidly carried on. An orator at Constantinople, in the reign of Jovian, fifty years after the accession of Constantine to the Roman purple, says, "In the recent changes (he is adverting to Julian the apostate) both religious, pagan, and Christian, have been alternately disgraced by the seeming acquisition of worthless proselytes of those votaries of the reigning purple, who could pass without a reason and without a blush from the church to the temple, and from the altars of Jupiter to the sacred table of the Christians."

A few facts recalled to mind, will show that these heavy charges are not without foundation. Look at its image worship, and other hundred senseless, mischievous mummeries, both for the dead and the living. Think how it takes away the book of life, the lamp of eternity. Consider how it exalts saints and angels, and degrades the Redeemer. Behold its course traced in blood. Who can unfold the horrors of the Inquisition, or number the thousands of the Waldenses, Lollards, and Protestants it hath butchered? But there is no end to this tale of woe; France, Spain, England, Ireland, has each furnished hecatombs of victims. But we are told that popery is changed, and that these things should not now be mentioned; but because I believe it is unchanged and unchangeable, I have hinted at these things. I believe popery as a system, to be like sin; both may, yea, shall be annihilated, but neither can be changed, while they live they will retain their nature, and restlessly follow up their grand object, which in both is—dominion.

In Rev. 13, there is mention made of two beasts; the former (ver. 1–to 10,) describes the Roman empire, the second (ver. 11–18,) describes the papacy. The description is similar to that of Daniel's little horn. The same power is alluded to by the term of false prophet, Rev. xix. 20. But we hasten on to Rev. 17, in which the destruction of this enemy to God and man is foretold. Yes, the word is gone out of Jehovah's mouth in righteousness, that Babylon shall sit low in the dust; yea, be debased to the depths of hell; as a millstone is overwhelmed by the ocean, when cast into it, so shall Babylon be overwhelmed by the long treasured-up vengeance of God.

In Rev. 17, one of the seven vial angels said to John, "Come hither, I will show thee the judgment of the great whore, that sitteth upon many waters." John was then shown this apostate church, under the figure of a woman sitting on a scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. There appears to be good reason to conclude that this beast is the Roman empire in its last form of infidelity. As pagan, its symbol was a great red dragon, Rev. xii. 3. As under the influence of popery, it is called a beast rising out of the sea, Rev. xiii. 1–10. But this beast is said to rise out of the bottomless pit, or abyss, Rev. xi. 7. xvii. 8; and to be full of names of blasphemy. Another reason for considering this beast to be the Roman empire in its infidel form is, the office assigned to it, "to hate the whore, make her desolate and naked, and eat her flesh, and burn her with fire," ver. 16; (none but an infidel power can do this,) and, after having done so, make war with the Lamb, which this beast doth, ver. 14. But it may be asked, does not the vision represent the great whore as riding upon this beast of infidelity? Yes; and this seems to say, that between infidelity and popery there will be, for a time, coalition; that the latter will owe its support to the former; but that, after awhile, having gained that which it wished by its alliance with popery, and, perhaps, having both joined together to persecute the church of God, the beast, or infidel power, to whom the ten kings shall give their power, shall destroy the whore by the agency of these kings.

We have had some foreshadowing of this in the French revolution and its effects.* Popery has already suffered much from infidelity; and notwithstanding their apparent agreement in these liberal days, it must suffer still more from its iron hand. But still it is plain from the word of God, that however the ten kings may waste the whore, there is to be some signal and finishing act of vengeance, which will complete the work of destruction. This is set forth by the angel's throwing the millstone into the sea; and Rev. xviii. 8, her plagues are said to come in one day; the false prophet perishes finally with the beast, and the kings of the earth, Rev. xix. 19, 20. The strong hand of Zion's avenger will hurl her down from her eminence, drag her out of all her fastnesses, and give her an eternal portion in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, together with the beast on which she rode, even all who helped forward her deeds of idolatry, superstition, and blood.

There is one consideration connected with this subject which claims our most serious attention. How wide, how searching will those judgments be by which Babylon shall be destroyed! Where is the church that hath not been contaminated by her poisonous breath, that doth not manifest somewhat of her spirit and conduct? Persecution, pharisaism, heresy, formality, outward show, crying up of the creature, are but too manifest among professors;—in some, one anti-Christian feature is exhibited; and in some another—but are any wholly free? Instead, then, of one sect quarrelling with another—had we not better be found praying, both for ourselves and them, that God would give us all humility to unlearn what is wrong, and honesty to avow it? Surely all classes of religious professors need much purification. "And behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave neither root nor branch."—Isa. xiv. 22, 23; Mal. iv. 1. It is easy to cut down a tree, however great and lofty; this may be done without much disquieting the soil around, but in order to pull up every root and fibre of an ancient tree, the ground all around must be moved and separated. Thus will the whole Christendom be shaken by the rooting up of Babylon; nothing but pure truth will escape; God will deliver all beside over to infidelity, and the fire of wrath. That beast will, doubtless, seek to devour truth likewise, and to destroy those who love it; but truth is immortal—the teeth of time, and the violence of infidelity cannot destroy it, nor ultimately injure its honest professors; for he who sitteth above the water-floods hath said, "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth."—Rev. iii. 10.

* France contained, before the revolution, 1793, upwards of 366,000 secular and regular clergy, beside an immense number of nuns. About 24,000 priests were butchered during the revolution.

In the whole of Christendom, there were no less than 225,444 monasteries, about 150 years ago: 3,180 were suppressed by Henry VIII., and his predecessors, in England; there were 50,000 persons in them. —Simpson's Plea.

O Tye Kim:

or, the Chinaman and the Nutmeg-Trees.

O Tye Kim is of the pure Chinese race, and was born at Singapore about the year 1830. Some years previous to that date, Mr. B., a German missionary, had taken up his residence in Penang, near the Straits of Malacca, chiefly peopled by Chinese merchants and laborers.

There Mr. B. set up a school for Chinese youths. The father of O Tye Kim, then resident at Singapore, sent his son over to this missionary school, not to be instructed in Christianity, but to be made proficient in good European education, and thus become qualified for employment by the English government; nevertheless, our faithful brother in Christ, Mr. B., would not receive them for instruction, unless they consented to be taught from the Scriptures themselves the truths of the Gospel.

About fifty Chinese youths were at the school when O Tye Kim was there; and, as if Satan had some foresight into his future, that he was marked out by God for His own, he especially stirred up in the boy's mind a hatred for the name of Jesus: he could not bear to read or write it in his school exercises. There was another Chinese boy in whose heart this peculiar enmity to our Lord's name was equally reigning, and he was of the Roman Catholic religion. So great was their bitterness against this blessed name, that often they were severely beaten for blotting and defiling it wherever they found it in the Scriptures or elsewhere. At length, having finished his education, O Tye Kim was apprenticed as a government surveyor and engineer.

While serving his time, and diligently advancing in his profession, he gave loose to all his natural and vicious youthful propensities, while, in religion, he worshipped idols, and followed the superstitions of his forefathers.

Some years afterward, while employed as land-surveyor at Singapore, a very alarming and singular phenomenon appeared in the sky of the Indian Archipelago. On the afternoon of one day the whole atmosphere was thickened and colored deep blood-red. The sun was obscured in its setting, and so very peculiar was its appearance, that all the inhabitants of the region were seriously alarmed, both European, Chinese, and Malays—indeed all. They trembled at what was coming, and quailed under the apprehension of some approaching calamity.

O Tye Kim trembled among the rest, and his superstitious mind sought refuge, among other charms, by seeking out his long-neglected Bible, which the kind missionary had given him. He found it covered with dust! He wiped it clean; then, turning his back to the open window, where to his view the lowering and lurid sky seemed pregnant with destruction, he fixed his eyes intently on the sacred pages, reading them aloud, thus hoping safety from impending judgments by some hidden virtue in the letter only, without faith in Him who gave the Word, or knowledge of that great Saviour, to whom the Word bore testimony, "that whosoever believeth in him should receive remission of sins."

Whatever might have been the cause of this strange appearance in the sky that afternoon, the next morn the sun rose in all its splendor, and as he mounted to his meridian brightness, completely dispelled the fears of all tremblers, and every one returned to his farm or merchandise as though nothing had alarmed them. Among the rest our young friend himself, who returned the well-cleaned Bible to its hiding-place, and resigned it once more to the dust and neglect from which the alarm of the day before had caused it a momentary rescue.

Some time after this, the duties of his profession once more called him over to Penang, where he was occupied under the government surveyor in measuring and laying out lands.

One evening, his day's work accomplished, he lingered in a grove of nutmeg-trees, admiring the beautiful fruit with which the trees were loaded, the color of the inner coat, or mace, being exceedingly rich. As he gazed upon these, his attention was also attracted by the barren trees, which were being removed as cumberers of the ground, and made up in bundles for the burning—the unfruitful, or male trees, as they are called, not being distinguishable until the time of fruit. At one moment he was admiring the abundance of rich fruit displayed upon the good trees, and how amply they repaid the hand that planted and reared them; the next moment he was contemplating the care and time that seemed to have been so wasted upon the barren trees, and how just, yea necessary, it was to cut them down and cast them into the fire, which, notwithstanding all their culture, had brought no fruit to perfection. And now was come the time for God to speak home to his heart and conscience.

As truly as the Lord spoke to Job out of the whirlwind, or to Elijah in the still small voice that succeeded it, so did the Lord say to this Chinaman: "What doest thou here? why cumberest thou the ground?" Yes, all at once it flashed upon his conscience, that hitherto he had only lived for himself, for his own pleasure and self-will.

God had not been in all his thoughts. He felt that while the fruitfulness of the nutmeg-trees, that were so very profitable to those who planted them, condemned him as an unprofitable and wicked man in the sight of God; the fate of the barren trees, now being removed and gathered for burning, just represented the righteous judgment that assuredly awaited him in the day that God would judge them for their neglect of him, and their wicked works.

Then did God bring home to his awakened conscience the preaching of John the Baptist, in Matt. iii., "The axe is laid unto the root of the trees: therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire." Then our Lord's parable of the barren fig-tree: "Cut it down: why cumbereth it the ground?" Further, our Lord's discourse in John xv.: Every branch that beareth not fruit is cast forth, withered, and gathered dry for burning. All which he had read at the faithful missionary's school.

The word of God, too, was living and powerful, piercing to the marrow, and searching the thoughts and intents of his heart; laying bare his vileness, and the judgment under which he lay. Surely divine justice would soon cut him down, like the barren nutmeg-trees, and consume him in the fires of wrath! Oh! what a wretch was he! Oh! that he had been fruitful and beautiful in the sight of his Creator and Cultivator as those splendid nutmeg-trees, with their branches loaded with fruit! Thus self-convicted, and groaning under the burden of his guilt, did O Tye Kim return to his lodgings that night. He slept not! The voice heard in the nutmeg plantation still sounded in his conscience, and forbade all rest and peace.

Early in the morning he thought of the kind instructor of his youth, hitherto neglected—the faithful servant of that Saviour whose sacred name he had so often abused; and with a heavy heart he sought the habitation of the missionary, Mr. B. He received a hearty welcome, and as he poured out his heart, confessing his sins, his ruin, and how God had shown him his righteous doom in the fate of the barren nutmeg-trees, the missionary smiled with joy. O Tye Kim, wondering, asked: "Wherefore do you smile?" The missionary opened his mouth and preached unto him Jesus. "Now canst thou understand how it behooved Christ to die, or else abide alone? Now canst thou understand why Christ must needs die, the Just for the unjust, to bring us to God? Now canst thou understand and perceive the love of God in giving his only begotten Son, that we dead sinners might live through him? 'Herein is love, not that we loved him, but that he loved us, and gave his Son a propitiation for our sins.'

"Look, now, on the cross of Christ. See there the Holy One and the Just bearing sin in his own body, and learn both the righteousness and the love of God. How he can be just and the justifier of the vilest sinner who believes on Jesus Christ as the bearer away of his sins by death. See now, O Tye Kim, though you never would before, how God beseeches men to be reconciled to him; for God hath made him who knew no sin to be sin in our place, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."

Thus did this faithful missionary now reap the fruit of his early labor with his Chinese scholar. God having prepared the soil, the good seed struck deep its roots, in preparation for a hundred-fold that this new-born man may yet yield to his heavenly, divine husbandman, rivalling even his first dumb instructors, the prolific nutmeg-trees.

The young Chinese returned to his house more than dimly perceiving how the death and judgment due to evil living had been met by the death and sufferings of the Son of God, who had appeared once at the end of the world, or ages, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself, "once offered." And before another day dawned upon him, he had poured out his heart at the feet of Jesus in tears of contrition and joy and love unspeakable.

The forenoon of that day found O Tye Kim again in the presence of his missionary friend, rejoicing in his full salvation through the death and resurrection of Christ his Lord and Saviour. He came and stood before him as exultingly as Naaman, the cleansed leper of old, stood before Elisha, the man of God. He came to tell him that from henceforth he was Christ's alone. He was bought with the price of His precious blood, and he must yield himself up—body, soul, and spirit—to his service. "Here I am," added he; "what shall I do to serve my Lord? I give up the service of my employer, and I come to ask your counsel as to what I shall do to serve the Lord, who has bought me." The missionary replied: "Leave not the lawful service of your earthly master. Go back to your work, and in diligently serving him, faithfully serve your Master in heaven. You are now a new creature in Christ Jesus, quickened together with him whom God raised from the dead, and set on his own right hand. Now walk down here in the power of that new and endless life you have in Christ, and glorify him in all your ways. Go on in your business, and in your leisure hours be ready to bear testimony to the love of God to man, as manifested in Christ Jesus. Tell them of present grace and coming judgment. Now you have received Christ for righteousness, sanctification, and redemption; you are complete, and possess in him all things. The Holy Ghost, by whom you are sealed unto the day of redemption, will empower you to preach the gospel of grace to your still benighted countrymen."

I need hardly say this godly counsel was followed by the young Christian, who, having confessed his full salvation in the Lord Jesus Christ, commenced a career of service in the gospel which God has eminently blessed to the salvation of hundreds of his countrymen. After the example of the Apostle Paul, O Tye Kim has hitherto, while ministering the word of grace to believers on the Lord's day, and preaching the gospel with power to his fellow-sinners around, been supporting himself with the work of his own hands.

I could tell you much more of this dear servant of the Lord—how for thirteen years he has been walking in the grace of God; how the power of Christ rests upon him, because he glories in his own infirmities, and makes Christ all his power; because he lives in Christ, and rejoices in Christ—walks in his high places by faith—stands in grace, and hopes for glory. But let this suffice.

Now, my dear readers, how is it with you? Have the nutmeg-trees in the Penang plantations a voice to reach even unto you? Are you still living according to man, in the flesh; still following the course of this world, children of wrath, even as others? or, have you been awakened from the death of sin by the voice of the Son of God?

Remember, that every plant which God hath not planted shall be rooted up. Christ is the true Vine, and his Father is the husbandman, and except ye are abiding in this Vine, ye cannot bear any fruit at all; for apart from Christ ye can do nothing.

If your conscience tells you that you are still a stranger to the love and saving grace of God, let this sound, going from the boughs of the Penang nutmeg-trees, awaken your soul from its death in sin, and may the conviction of your own guilty barrenness lead you, as it did the Chinaman, to learn the preciousness of Christ, the Saviour of sinners; lest O Tye Kim should one day rise up in judgment against you and condemn you, who, with all your privileges in a land of Bibles and gospel liberty, remain a cumberer of the ground, fitted only for burning.—Selected.

A Bible View of Hell:

Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, etc., by E. Wolcott. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer.

This work is a valuable Scriptural compendium of the subject, and is an important addition to the Life literature. Among its contents may be noticed the following: Hell in the Hebrew and Greek; The righteous as well as the wicked go into hell; good men desire to be redeemed from hell; Hades; Capernaum brought down to hell; Hell shall not prevail against the righteous; The Rich Man and Lazarus; Gehenna; Unquenchable Fire; Everlasting Fire; God able to destroy both soul and body in hell; Tartarus; Smoke of their torment; The Lake of Fire, etc., etc. The work is beautifully printed, and offered below cost. Single copies 5 cents; $4 per hundred, by Express. SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

CHRIST'S AT HIS COMING—1 COR. XV. 23.

WHAT a scene of indescribable glory that will be when the Lord himself shall descend to gather His redeemed to the house he has prepared for them! What a moment of unsullied delight, when at the shout, the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, His sleeping saints, raised, and living saints, changed, "shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall they ever be with the Lord!"

All the hosts of the redeemed shall be marshalled there, in bodies of glory, instinct with Divine life—the saints of old, who on the faith of a promise were worshippers, pilgrims, soldiers—those to whose faith dens and caves bore witness—"of whom the world was not worthy?" the elders and just men who "died in faith, not having received the promise," shall be there; "Abraham, Isaac and Jacob;" "Noah, Daniel and Job;" "Moses and Elias" shall be there; Abel and the long line of Martyrs; Aaron and the Lord's priests; Samuel and the Lord's prophets; David and the men of faith who sat on his throne; all God's renowned ones, the perfected just shall stand in that scene for which they in faith waited.

"The church of the first-born," too, as the bride prepared or her Lord, shall take her place there; all down to the last re-born soul, who shall form the completion of the mystery. She, too, will recount her worthies in that morning; the many who have stood forth in other days, and who stand forth in our own days, as the witnesses of God's truth and the heralds of God's salvation, all shall ascend together and swell the countless multitude of Christ's own—shall take their place too in their respective glories—"every man in his own order"—star differing from star in glory, and each reflecting the image of Jesus.

There will be seats too in the kingdom; thrones for rulership over the tribes of Israel; mansions in the Father's house; thrones around the throne of God; all shall be occupied by the redeemed, each invested with the insignia sovereign love has assigned him. All will "know even as they are known"—each known to each—all known to all. What a season of unutterable joy! of holy intercourse! of uninterrupted communion! But the rapturous thought of each one of this innumerable company will be, they are Christ's—"I am my Beloved's, and His desire is towards me." To be Christ's own will be a source of deep unmixed pleasure, then—(should it not be now?) The absorbing object of their heaven-inspired vision will be Christ—to be forever with Him—to behold Him—to cast their crowns at His feet, paying the heart's deep homage to Him in one united utterance of "Thou art worthy, for Thou wast slain, and has redeemed us to God by Thy blood."

The power of Christ's resurrection will be applied to the bodies of his Saints; they will be raised, because He has been raised: by virtue of having his life and being indwelt by his Spirit, they will be presented in the perfection of that life in its full triumph over death, and him who had the power of death; they are raised, not for judgment—that to them is passed, Christ bore it for them—but because they are Christ's; Christ's resurrection was the first fruits, and the pledge of that abundant ingathering. He was the first sheaf presented to the Lord, the sample and earnest of the harvest that shall then be gathered into the garner of God; they will be raised up, and presented in the glory with Him. He is the expression of the glory, and they stand in him. The reunited dust shall be reanimated and vivified with Divine life; the weakness shall be transformed into power, corruption into incorruption, disorder into glory, the natural body into a spiritual body; it will bear the impress of the heavenly, even as it has borne the image of the earthly. Where is the sting of death? Gone! Where the grave's victory? Gone! Victory, full, complete, eternal, is theirs—Satan bruised under their feet forever.

The saints will stand before the tribunal of Christ to receive the rewards of the kingdom; but they will appear there as glorified saints; no stain of sin shall be there, the last trace of the curse shall have been removed, the reproach of Egypt clean and forever rolled away; the death of the slain Lamb will be learnt in the light of glory, and in the presence of God.

Earth may move on still in its course and projects, as it did when its light was set in the darkness of the cross; its religion may go on too, quite compatible with its godless pursuits, until judgment break the spell of its delusion and dissolve the dream—awaking men to the deadly reality of falling "into the hands of the living God." The light—God's light—shall have been removed to its own proper sphere, there to reflect each its peculiar brightness, "shining as the brightness of the firmament"—"as the sun in the kingdom of their Father"—being with Him who is the sun and centre of that heavenly system, undimmed, unobscured by the clouds of unbelief or doubt. They are with Him as He moves on in the course of the counsels of God, whether relating to the heavens above or the heavens beneath. In the presence of His glory, they shall be presented faultless, "with exceeding joy." Will He "take His great power, and reign," swaying the sceptre of righteous supremacy over a judged and renovated earth? They will be with Him there! After the course of the kingdom shall be complete, and He shall have delivered up the kingdom to the Father, will He be tabernacled in the home, the dwelling-place of righteousness, in the new heavens and new earth? They that are His will still be with him. They are Christ's present and eternal portion, and their place is to be "forever with the Lord." Whether in the kingdom or in the new heavens and new earth, they will enjoy the rest of God in its perfection, and bear witness to His glory in the exalted sphere in which grace has set them, and for which grace has adapted them.

The hope for which we wait is not judgment, not the kingdom set up, not Israel's restoration, or the deliverance of creation from its present bondage (all true in its place)—but God's Son from heaven! He is coming, not to fulfil prophecy, but to fulfil promise: "I will come again, and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." Judgment waits for this! the restoration of Israel, creation's deliverance—all waits suspended until the rapture of the saints—"they that are Christ's at his coming."

After the Lord Jesus has gathered his own to himself in the heavens, He will make good the prophetic word in its bearing towards the earth, and deliver creation, bringing it into the liberty of redemption.

Well may the affections of the heart be moved at the prospect! Well may the sound of that well known Scripture reverberate in the inner-man, "Behold, I come quickly!" Yes, He is coming to appropriate to himself that which He has purchased at his own personal cost; to whom He can say, "I have redeemed thee; thou art mine!" to surround himself with the trophies of redeeming love. The Father's will will be fully accomplished in the resurrection and glorification of those who were the objects of it; for this they were saved. Our necessities were not the first cause; God is glorified in the redemption He has wrought, and the objects of his love are prepared for the glory that awaits them. They shall stand in the clear unclouded light of divine righteousness, and be at home there. The robe in which they are arrayed is divinely righteous and meet for the occasion.

God, resting in the complacency of omnipotent love, will welcome them himself; His own immediate presence will be their rest; His unclouded glory the sphere of their worship; God and the Lamb their light and their temple. He will dwell in their midst; they His people—He their God.

What a prospect! Even the anticipation of such a hope lifts our spirits above the clouds and mists of earth; but we need purified hearts to be prepared to allow the rays of that glory to reach within and shed its light abroad there. There should be nothing allowed discordant with that holy scene; it will darken the vision and confuse the affections. The Holy Spirit will be leading us within, to look after the house, and rid it of its corruptions and intruders, instead of opening the windows of the heart to allow the light of a new heaven to fill and irradiate it with its illuminating glory.

Oh that our constant position may be—as those who are "turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God"—"to wait for His Son from heaven," with the heart purified and the eye single, with staff and girdle, ready to welcome the shout in the air, whenever it may be uttered; ready! with nothing to leave behind that would retard our upward flight, nothing that may clash with that oft-expressed desire—"Amen! Even so, come Lord Jesus!"—Prophetic Times.

THE OBJECT FOR WHICH JESUS CHRIST THE SON OF GOD CAME INTO THE WORLD.

As the manner in which sin shall be ultimately dealt with, will clearly tend to the understanding of the future relative conditions of the saved and the unsaved, our inquiry is directed to the object for which the Son of God became incarnate, or took "the likeness of sinful flesh," and to the mode in which that object is said to be fulfilled.

1. He came to glorify his Father (John xvii. 4).

2. He came "for sin," and "to put away sin."

These are not two objects, but one; for by the putting away sin, the Lord Jesus laid the sure foundation, whereby regenerated men should hallow the name of God the Father, and should do his will on earth, as it is done in heaven.

"Now once in the end of the age"—close of the legal dispensation—"hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." (Heb. ix. 26.)

"Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy* him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." (Heb. ii. 14.)

"For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." (1 John iii. 8.)

In these several Scriptures there seem to be three objects to be attained by the work of the cross, but in reality they again merge into one. By the abolition of sin, the destruction of the works of the devil necessarily ensues, both as regards children of God and unbelievers. By the abolition of sin, death is no more, for it is born of sin; "Sin came into the world, and death by sin." True, there remains the destruction of the devil; but he is merely sin personified; the putting away of sin is virtually putting away the devil; the simple act of consigning him to the lake of fire that he may be consumed, is all that remains.

Now, Christian reader, apply the meaning of the word "destroy" to the Scriptures quoted above, and then ask yourself the question in the light of reason, whether the devil or his works can exist for ever? You may still be incredulous whilst pondering on traditional ideas, or "vain philosophy;" so I proceed with an examination of God's word as quoted, wherein he has given a pledge for the destruction of sin and of the devil. The performance of this promise you will hardly question. First of all I would remark, that in scrutinizing the Bible—from the transcendantly beautiful frontispiece, the paradisaic type of the predestined crowning circumstances of the heavenly family, to the close of "The Book of the Revelation of Jesus Christ," where the Spirit fills in with divine coloring the expanded glory of the original groundwork—we behold a "God of all grace" serenely contemplating the hour wherein he most surely knows that "He will purge out from his kingdom all things that offend;" when he will expunge sin, root and branch, from his new creation, destroying both its author, Satan, and its companion, death. The mind of Omniscience is shown to have been "before the foundation of the world," anticipating the period when the Father, the Son and the royal heavenly family shall be found in oneness of mind, condition and joy. (John xvii. 21, with Eph. i. 3–6; Isaiah xxv. 6–8.) The eye of Divine holiness is seen to be prospectively scanning the condition of the universe when "there shall be no more curse," for the source whence came the curse shall for ever have disappeared, and not the faintest jot or tittle of leaven shall be seen or heard from whence evil can possibly arise, "for the former things will have passed away!" But I am anticipating, and proof is demanded.

Sin was not of God. It was, and is an exceptional, abnormal element in the economy of creation, for every thing that was made was once pronounced "very good." It became a hideous, festering excrescence, poisoning the life of man, and deteriorating the proper fruitfulness of the earth. The germ of evil was implanted by an act of "that old serpent the devil," and the result was that "By one man sin came into the world, and death by sin."

Adam, who once had sweet communion with God in innocency, and had revelled in the perfection of serene loveliness that pervaded creation, must have been awe-struck at the terrible change that passed over the face of the whole scene on the introduction of the dark shadow of the curse wrought by sin. But mark well! this same man was permitted of God to hear the doom of the author of this dire calamity, viz., that the Seed of the woman should bruise his head (Heb.: break in pieces, hence destroy as to its vitality.) Enabled thus to see that a time must come when the once beautiful work of the hands of God should be purged from the cause of its corruption, and restored to its "very good" state by the excision of that foreign excrescence, sin, he called his wife Eve, "the mother of all living," or who should have life under such circumstances. He had a belief, according to the mind of God and the glimmering of light vouchsafed, in the resurrection; in proof of which God clothed him and his wife with the emblems of the character of that sacrifice by which this result was afterwards to be obtained. In other words—they were enveloped in symbolic robes of righteousness, resurrection garments, which Adam certainly would not have obtained had his faith not rested on the God of resurrection, or of "the living." (Matt. xxii. 32, with Gen. iii. 20.) Such is the very essence of the belief through which righteousness is imputed. (Rom. iv. 16–25.

I have been particular in the introduction of this scene, because in its several incidents are found the elements of the everlasting gospel, the work of the cross of Christ, its necessity and results.

*DESTROY.—The meaning in Webster's Dictionary is, "to unbuild, to pull down, to separate violently into its constituent parts, to break up the structure and organic existence of; syn. to consume, extirpate, extinguish, kill."

Jesus the Son of God was manifested—He in the very similitude of sinful humanity, appeared on earth, because in no other guise could he accomplish the Divine will in the putting away of sin, and in destroying the devil and his works. As far as the interest of God is involved, these results are now attained; but they will be so actually, completely and eternally, when these instruments have fulfilled the purpose for which they were permitted to exist.

The devil has become the self-constituted god and prince of this present economy. Sin is the weapon which he has ever wielded, in all its various forms of fascination for the flesh, in order to the maintenance of his authority, and the subjugation of his subjects. It has been his aim to create a love of ignorance as well as defiance of God, dishonor to his name, rejection of his gospel of grace, and blindness to the promises of his glory. It was to meet these circumstances in the very spot where they had birth, and were in action, and finally to annul them, that the Son of God came from heaven and became the Son of Man by being "born of a woman" into the world. He came to grapple with the usurper, overcome him, and set free his captives for ever.

"The strong man armed" with sin "keepeth his palace," furnished with every allurement seductive to human nature, and consequently "his goods are in peace." His subjects, under the opiate of things seen though temporal, are entranced and diverted from things not seen and eternal. It was necessary, therefore, in order to destroy the effect of this false peace tending to the certain ruin of man, for "the stronger man" first to "come upon him and overcome him," and then to "take from him all his armor" of offence "wherein he trusted." (Luke xi. 21, 22.) Even during his lifetime we perceive the sure symptoms of the final victory of the Lord Jesus Christ; disease and death, the children of sin, and demons fled at his word; nay, Satan himself was discomfited, and forced to yield before the power of the Stronger Man. But it was on the cross that all the armor of the Strong Man was delivered up to the Divine Conqueror, for he was made sin, "died unto sin," was judicially treated "for sin," by being put to death in the flesh on which sin had been laid. (Rom. vi. 10; viii. 3; 2 Cor. v. 21.) Therefore, "by the sacrifice of himself, he put away sin."

This act of divine holiness against sin is more fully shown in the sin-offering of Levit. iv. The Hebrew word for "sin-offering" is the same as that for "sin," the former being the perfectly vicarious covering for the latter. The sin-offering represented adequately the entire load substitutionally laid upon it, i. e., the entire animal, or actual substitute with which sin was identified (ver. 4), was wholly consumed till "ashes" alone remained to tell of the full accomplishment of the sacrifice.

"By the sacrifice of himself," Christ displayed on the cross an open and complete triumph over "the principalities and powers," spoiling them (Col. ii. 15) as by the Stronger Man. The effect of this we are now to observe, both as regards believers and unbelievers. As to the former, they are "freed from sin," "sin hath no more dominion over them," though their present condition in sinful flesh still for a time remains. But this sinful flesh, called "the body of sin," the present state of the body to which sin is at present attached, is, as to its ultimate condition, destroyed; it has, according to the intent of him "who calleth things that be not, as though they were," been "crucified with Christ. (Rom. vi. 6–9.) Believers are in Christ precisely as Christ himself is to God, "perfected for ever;" and have a resurrection state in prospect when the above will become a manifest reality, for they will be changed morally and personally into the heavenly similitude of the Son of God, sinless both in body and character. (Phil. iii. 21; Rom. viii. 29, 30.)

As to unbelievers, or those who have no faith in the fact that Christ "died unto sin," they do, by that very act of unbelief, retain "the body of sin." Their rejection of the gospel shuts out Christ as the propitiation for their sins, although God offered him for the sin of the whole world, if the world would receive him. Thus unbelievers will necessarily have to supplement the consumption of sin, of their interest in which believers have availed themselves, by being consumed in their own persons; for all sin must be "put away," since Christ gave himself for that very end.

It is thus that sin will be judicially disposed of; and that being so, its "reign unto death," must cease; there can be no more death, for its very source will have ceased to exist. So we read that the same act of Christ on the cross that abolished sin, "abolished death." Again, "the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

Satan, "him who had the power of death," well knows that he is about to be despoiled of his goods, that the world's palace in which he has held rule is trembling to its foundation, and his sceptre about to depart for ever. At the close of the reign of the antichristian beast, whose very title, "the Man of Sin," shows whence he will derive his energy and craft to work evil, the strong man will be found in the abyss for a thousand years, during which period his Conqueror will be holding universal sway, gathering out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity. After which, the work of redemption being accomplished in the salvation of all the bodies that will compose the entire family of God; sin and death, "the works of the devil," together with the devil himself, having finished all that was required of them in the vast, mysterious drama of the history of man, will be for ever put away.

I must here retrograde one step in point of time in order to bring to notice a solemn truth in connection with the subject of this paper. When the Divine judgment on the last state of "this present evil age" shall be manifested by the down pour of "the vials of the wrath of God," we read of the terrific yet indisputable effects thereof in cries of defiant anger and blasphemy; sin of the deepest dye without a shadow of repentance. (Rev. ix. 20; xvi. 21.) If such be the case, then under eternal torments the sinful blasphemies of the damned would be ceaseless; I say, then, that the Lord Jesus Christ can not be said to have accomplished the work for which He sacrificed himself; for that sacrifice will be proved to have been incapable "to put away sin!" Neither will it have possessed sufficient power to destroy either the devil or his works! Let the advocates of the popular theory solemnly weigh the above in the fear of God.

And now, concerning the sentence on the devil as recorded in Scripture (Rev. xx. 20), apart from tradition, I must press on the reader's attention that it is executed previous to the passing away of the earth and its firmament, when the assize of the great white throne shall sit, which is not mentioned till the following verse. This will strengthen the assertion that his torment is connected with the dispensation of which "day and night" are characteristic elements. He is tormented till day and night shall cease, which they will as soon as the new earth and new firmament appear, for "there shall be no night there!" (Rev. xxii. 5.) His torment ended, the fire will quickly complete his destruction! (See Heb. ii. 14.)

The very mention of the new earth and its atmosphere "wherein dwelleth righteousness," renders nugatory any questioning as to the completeness of the destruction, in its primary and evident sense, of sin, death and Satan; for the first earth and its atmosphere, with which they are associated, will flee away from the face of him who shall occupy the great white throne, and "no place be found for them." (Rev. xx. 11.) Thus, by the work and judgments of the Son of God, will the name and majesty of the Father be vindicated in a scene where he was dishonored; every vestige of the cause of that dishonor will have been swept away, together with the very theatre itself on which Satan, armed with sin and the power of death, has been playing so terrible a part.

"There shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain!" This is not said of any particular party, it is of universal application. Death, sorrow and pain cannot be dwellers with righteousness in the new economy, or "Paradise of God," for "the former things" with which they were connected, will have "passed away." "Behold," saith he who sitteth on the throne, the Creator, "I make all things new!" (Rev. xxi. 4, 5.) After a long-suffering period of seven thousand years, Adam's original vision will at length be realized!

REVISION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD: It ought to be known to all readers of the Holy Scriptures that the whole of the words and phrases in italics were supplied by the translators in order to make, as they thought, the sense or meaning of the sacred text more apparent to the general reader; and were not found, as is now generally supposed, in the original manuscripts.

In some cases the translators have evidently succeeded in their laudable object; but in very many, instead of throwing additional light on the text, the additional words and phrases obscure (unintentionally, let us hope) the legitimate sense of the original. One case in point, taken from the seventeenth verse of the first chapter of Peter's First Epistle, reads as follows: "Pass the time of your sojourning here in fear." The adverb of place "here," in italics, was supplied by the translators: not found in Peter's manuscript. Orthodox theology then, as now, embodied the doctrine of the "immortality of the soul," and of going to heaven or hell at death; and we can hardly avoid the conclusion that, in at least this instance, the translators added the word "here" to favor orthodox theology. Peter evidently uses the term "sojourning" in the sense in which it was applied to the sojourning of the Israelites in the wilderness, prior to their entry into the "promised land," the land of Canaan. And we must bear in mind, that as the wilderness in which they sojourned, and the "promised land" into which they afterwards entered, were both located in the eastern part of the earth—not one upon earth, the other in heaven—so the Christian's sojourning in this present dispensation of trial and suffering, and his future "rest" in the kingdom of Christ (the same promised land of Canaan), are both emphatically on the earth; the kingdom of Christ not being a kingdom in the skies, as erroneously asserted in orthodox theology, but upon the earth, as declared in the Word of God. "For He (Christ) shall reign on the earth." What Peter really says is: "Pass the time of your sojourning in fear;" without allusion to locality. The apostle had no motive to mention locality, having no false theory to support. He well knew, as well as all the other apostles, that there is no promise in the Word of God to the human race of any other place of rest for the people of God than upon the earth, where they are to "live and reign with Christ forever." There is no promise to Adam's race of a "kingdom beyond the skies." This earth, redeemed, ultimately, from the "curse" pronounced upon it at the "fall," is intended by God to be the eternal abode of humanity redeemed. The Scripture declares that Christ, as Son of David and Son of God, is to be the future "King of all the earth," not merely in a moral and spiritual sense, as theologians say, but literally. He will come literally to reign personally as surely as he was literally crucified. "First the cross, then the crown," is a common pulpit aphorism, though erroneously interpreted in a spiritual sense. The "seed of the woman" will never have succeeded in "bruising the serpent's head" until the kingdoms of this world have become the one Kingdom of Christ, and He shall have subdued all things to Himself. This He will accomplish during His "millennial reign on the earth."

Any one may doubt the theory here advanced—namely, that the kingdom which Christ taught His disciples to pray for is a kingdom to be established on the earth, the capital of which will be Jerusalem, in the Holy Land, the land "promised" and "covenanted" by God to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and to their "seed," which, says Paul, is Christ—let such a one read the sixteenth and seventeenth verses of the fourteenth chapter of Zechariah. Indeed, it will be well to read the whole chapter, and not only the whole of the chapter, but also the two preceding ones. Any one who may take an interest in obtaining correct views on this grand and important subject will have no cause to regret the time so spent.

The case in point, which I have taken as the first that offered itself, on reference to the Scriptures to prove how easy it is not only to obscure but to pervert the true meaning of the sacred text, by human additions and alterations, is only one among thousands which might be adduced having the same pernicious tendency. It is well, and I admit exhibits an honest disposition on the part of the translators, that their additions are acknowledged by putting them in italics. The danger lies in this: that comparatively few readers of the Bible are aware of this historical fact, and therefore read the italic words and phrases as part of the sacred text. In truth, I am afraid many ministers of the gospel, not confined to "Nonconformists," are not much better acquainted with the fact than the general reader. As one acquainted with the truth on this point, I never read a portion of Scripture without reading it with and then without the italic additions. To me this exercise is, apart from theological views, exceedingly interesting. It is often a good exercise in composition, in the grammatical construction of sentences. And I am often led to think that the grammatical construction of the text is frequently more clear, forcible and concise without the words and phrases supplied by the translators than with them. Of course this is a consideration independent of the danger of perverting the sense and meaning of the text by additions which inculcate (whether intentionally or not) erroneous doctrines affecting the revealed mind and will of God to men.

One royal injunction to the translators of the present version was that in cases in which there might be a diversity of opinion, on doctrinal points, they were advised to decide in favor of the views of the Church to which they belonged. And this instruction might have been a temptation in more than one or two instances. It will be interesting to Bible students to observe how the present revisers of our authorized version will treat the additions of the former translators. To me it seems a thing almost impossible that men already committed to what is termed orthodox views can be expected to give us a faithful rendering, inasmuch as every alteration in the text, involving, as in some cases it would, an alteration in the sense and meaning, will have to be decided by a "two-thirds majority." What if a very few men, learned in Hebrew and Greek, discover that a correct translation of certain passages involves doctrines which are truly apostolic, but which are not orthodox in our day, or for centuries past? The result to be expected is that in every such instance the only men capable of giving us the truth will be overruled bp a "two-thirds majority" of the incapables, determined to abide by the popular theology of the day, no matter at what sacrifice? Such a method of procedure will be deemed by them preferable to disturbing long established views and notions, and thereby the labors of the only men capable of giving us a faithful translation and a true rendering of the meaning in the vernacular will be rendered null and void by a "two-thirds majority" prepossessed in favor of established dogmas. So far as I understand the work is commenced with the predetermination to support and maintain at all hazards modern orthodox theology. How, then, can we hope for a truly honest translation of the original text of the sacred writings?

If the object of the majority of the revisers be a mere quibble about words and the grammatical construction of the present version, a desire to modernize the literary style, so as to render it more in harmony with the tastes of the present generation, I for one have no sympathy with the undertaking, and if the revisers do not intend to allow any translation which might endanger popular doctrines and dogmas, what can their object of a revision of the present version be? It is a vast work, and needs to be a labor of love to be done well. E. T.

"The Great Words which the Horn Spake."

We take the following from the "New York Sunday Herald":

THE POPE'S LETTER TO CARDINAL PATRIZZI.

ALL REVOLUTIONISTS AND FREE THINKERS ANATHEMATISED—THE READING OF CERTAIN IRRELIGIOUS JOURNALS PROHIBITED.

The Pope has addressed the following letter to Cardinal Patrizzi, Bishop of Rome:

Monsignor—When God in His impenetrable designs permitted that the capital of Christianity should be wrongfully occupied, the usurpers proclaimed that Rome is necessary to the integrity of Italy and to the perfect unity of all her parties, as if there were not in Italy to this day two small provinces which continue under the former government, and which, I hope, will ever remain so; but the purpose of these great workmen of the revolution was not only to usurp a city like Rome; their purpose was and is still to destroy the centre of Catholicism and even Catholicism itself. In order to accomplish the ruin of an indestructible edifice all the ungodly, all the free thinkers, all the sectarians of the world have lent their aid by sending each their contingent to this metropolis. All these little battalions have united into one body, and their intention is to insult and break the images of the Holy Virgin Mary and of the Saints. Their aim is to villify and hunt down the ministers of the sanctuary, to desecrate the churches, to multiply the houses of prostitution, to assail the ears of the godly by their sacreligious clamors, and to infuse into the hearts and minds—chiefly so among the young—the venom of impiety by the reading of certain journals known to be impudent, lying, hypocritical and irreligious.

"This infernal phalanx has put it into its head to extirpate in Rome what it calls religious fanaticism," as was said by an Italian philosopher of unpleasant memory, who died a sudden death a few years ago. After having taken root in Rome it designs to transform the centry of Christianity into a city of infidels, or rather to make Rome the mistress of a religion of tolerance, such as those desire to make her who have not the thought of any other but the present existence before their eyes, and who imagine that God allows all things to pass without occupying himself with their acts.

And does the government which tolerates these acts belong to that phalanx also? We should hope not; for the affirmation would be a lamentable proclamation of the downfall of the throne. For the purpose of applying, however, some remedy to the fulness of so many evils, you will please, Monsignor, to issue a circular to the curates in order that they may warn their parishioners that the reading of certain journals, especially those printed here in Rome, is prohibited to them; and let this prohibition be made in such a manner that those who break it may understand that they have committed not a venial sin, but a deadly sin.

And, to conclude, let us raise our hands toward God, and let us hope that the many crimes against Him, against His religion and against society itself should draw to an end, and that we should one day come out of this labyrinth of evils to breathe freely under the protecting wings of faith, of morals and of order.

I bless you with all my heart.

Toleration and Investigation.

All men desire toleration; why then should they not tolerate others? Why abuse a man for giving up an old theory or opinion? He might as well abuse us for retaining it. If this be unjustifiable in him, it is equally so for us to treat him in that way. The man who seeks after truth, and is led to alter his opinion, and tries to give others a part in his joys, by making known his discoveries, deserves our thanks instead of our censure. He who is really deserving censure is the man who will not take pains to find truth; or having found it, will not impart to others lest he should suffer reproach or loss. It has often been the case that men kill their benefactors and reward their plunderers. The Jews killed Jesus and released a robber. Many do the same in some form or other. They blame the Jews, but act out the same spirit: it was an intolerant spirit. They would not bear to have Jesus disturb their customs, creeds and traditions: it was bringing in causes of division, and lessening the reputation of those who wished to be thought wise and learned. He was regardless of the effect of his teaching on the established order of which the Scribes and Pharisees were so tenacious, and on which their popularity depended. He sought to make men wise and holy, though it might overturn all the schemes of the popular leaders of that age, and break down all their doctrinal theories. He proclaimed the selfishness, hypocrisy and pride of those leaders in such a manner as roused all these unholy principles into action. They would not tolerate him, and hence put him to death. They would not endure one who boldly denounced their corruptions of truth, and sent the people direct to "search the Scriptures." That would be admitting the people to some sort of independence in their theological investigations which might lessen the popular estimation of the usefulness of the Scribes and Pharisees.

We hardly need a stronger proof of the truth of the gospel history, than the fact that men now, who attempt to follow truth wheresoever it may lead—regardless of its effects on themselves among men—are treated as Jesus and his followers were by the popular leaders in their day. The treatment he met with is so perfectly like what men now manifest toward any who do not sustain their traditions or doctrines, that we cannot doubt the truth of the whole gospel history—it is natural as life: men in general never did give up their old opinions and customs without first persecuting those who have tried to bless them by showing a better and more truthful way. Jesus was a real person—he was from God—he was a teacher and regenerator of mankind—he was treated as the gospels say—he could not have been treated otherwise in such a world as this; and the gospel is as certainly true and divine as that light and truth exist in the universe. If any one would wish further proof of this, let them follow out their convictions of truth; boldly utter them, and live them out as did Jesus: let them sit at Jesus' feet and learn of him in this matter, regardless of the opinions and traditions of popular leaders and popular applause, and see if they do not become satisfied of the truth of the history of Jesus.

We do not ask you to deal in fancies, excitement or fanaticism in any form. Be thoroughly concerned to know the truth, and soberly, but decisively make it manifest in your utterances and in your life, regardless of its consequences on your reputation and worldly prospects—make truth, the truth relating to the kingdom of God, and life through Christ, the controlling theme, and act accordingly, and see if you are not satisfied, that whatever else may be false, the gospel of Christ is true. Live Christ-like—labor for the same objects in the same unvarying, steady, persevering course—live simply to learn and to practice the truth, and thus honor God and bless men, and you will soon find yourself in circumstances not unlike those Christ was in—you will drink of his cup, and be a partaker of his sufferings, and share in his lack of reputation.

A clear knowledge of truth and duty will always be the result of a hearty, thorough persevering obedience to the light already given—to the dictates of our judgment—to the revelations of truth and duty made known to us by God.

Some people are afraid to inquire after truth lest they should fall into infidelity. Such persons are already in effect infidels: i. e., are blind believers; and what are such better than infidels? He only is a true believer who is convinced of the truth of Christianity in such a manner that he can give a reason, to every man that asks him, of the hope that is in him. Let our faith be founded in the wisdom and word of God, and let it go out in living action, and all the errors that have ever cursed the world will not snake it—it is founded on a rock. But if our belief stands only in the wisdom and traditions of men, the farther we keep from the light of investigation the more sure we may be of any easy, down-hill journey; but it may land us into perdition. "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." "Search the Scriptures." Eternal life is therein revealed, and that most of all things concerns us, who find ourselves dying creatures.

Good Words and Good Advice.

The following letter, written by Br. Jacob Grim, and published in the Herald of Life Sept. 7, 1870, immediately after the anniversary of the Life and Advent Union of last year, is so excellent that we insert it again at this time, on the eve of the anniversary of said Union, to-morrow, Aug. 17.—Editor.

To the Brethren and Sisters, scattered abroad, we would again, at the close of our Anniversary, send our cordial greeting; and we would ask you to mingle your united prayers to the Father of all our mercies for his abundant mercies and favors toward us, in watching over all our deliberations, and overruling them to his own glory. We were again privileged in meeting many of our dear brethren and sisters at the Tent of the Life and Advent Union. Although at the commencement of our deliberations it almost seemed as if we were to meet an important crisis in the Life movement, and for awhile our hearts were made sad, yet, with the exception of the first afternoon, there never was, since the organization of our Union, a better or more happy state of feeling. We realized the hand of the Lord in all our movements; and never for the last seven years have we so felt that the Herald of Life is in the hands of the great Head of the church; and he will overrule all things for his own glory. We never before realized so clearly that we individually and collectively are but instruments in the hands of the Lord, and when we fail to accomplish God's purpose, he raises up others in our stead. Yes, my brethren and sisters, the Herald of Life will live until it has accomplished its work; and when it fails in that, God will use some other instrument.

If we could only be satisfied, and endeavor to learn our Father's will concerning us, and then work therein—and not try and subserve our own wills—how much more could we accomplish for his glory and our own comfort.

Brethren, suppose we try to drop and lose sight of self, and ask the question of our Father, what he would have us do, and in what capacity he would have us employed? and then, when we meet again at another anniversary, we will come together in quite another spirit. It does seem sometimes as if we forget that Jesus is at the rudder of the Life boat; for sometimes, when a little storm is brewing, or one of the oarsmen lets go his oar, we feel as if the boat was going down. But we have sailed thus far under His guidance, and by his help we will maintain our position, however humble it may be. Yes, my brethren, be of good cheer—Jesus guides our boat and all will be well. I think our friends left the camp-ground with a full conviction that the Life and Advent Union stands in a better position for labor than it has in any past year.

And now, brethren, one word for the Herald of Life. I know that there has been considerable fault found for the past year or two; some with one thing and some with another, and I admit there has been some reason for it. But allow me to repeat an anecdote that I heard some thirty years ago. Considerable fault had been found with the "Baptist Record." Said the Editor, "I was once invited to a dinner, and I saw several dishes on the table that I did not like; and I turned up my nose at them; but going farther along the table I found a dish that I was very fond of; so I placed my chair near said dish, sat down and drew several of the side dishes to me and made a very good dinner. Before I finished, I happened to look toward the two despised dishes, and found several enjoying those as much as I was enjoying mine." "So," says the Editor, "I made up my mind the table was not spread for me alone." Moral: Brethren and sisters, if we can find a dish in the Herald of Life which suits our taste, allow us to enjoy the same; and then you take the dish which suits your taste; then all will be fed in due time.

There is the children's corner: who would shut out that dish from the little ones? Then there should be a dish of pure milk for the new comers inquiring after truth: then we should have a dish of answers to questions. We say sometimes, "O, that is old; we have answered that so many times that it is quite stale!" So it may be to you or us; but it is quite new to the new subscribers. Why, I have been answering "Thief on the cross;" "Rich man and Lazarus;" "John v. 28, 29," for the last twenty-five years; and was asked the qnestion again only the other evening. Yes, brethren, we must keep on answering; that is the work God has assigned us; and we are willing to work in the calling our Father has assigned us.

The great truths are, first, Life only in Christ: and second, When will this life be manifest? We answer, At the advent of Jesus the Life-giver. Here, then, are the two great fundamental truths upon which the Herald of Life has started on its mission. Now if men build upon this foundation, they will have life; even if what they build should be made up in part of hay, wood or stubble; only be sure we build upon Christ, and not upon an immortal soul, or spirit entity. The great matter is, to be sure we get the foundation right.

Now, brethren, for once just make up your minds that you and I are not the Life and Advent Union; but only a part of the large and increasing family; and others who are scattered abroad, and who have never been able to be present to speak for themselves, have the same rights with you and me; and all this great family must be fed, and it requires a diversity of food in order that all may be satisfied. Only let us try to make our dishes small, and have them well spiced down with the love of God and the love of our brethren and sisters. Now, some folks are fond of a dish of chowder; but I prefer having all the ingredients that make up the dish separate, and then I can eat that which I like best; and that is what we do with some of the articles in the paper; we separate the parts we like and leave the rest for some others.

We have concluded, if time continues, and the Lord will, to have a Camp-Meeting of our own; and have opened a subscription for the same through the Herald: but the thing of the first and most importance is, that the brethren and sisters should speak their minds freely through the Herald as regards the best, most central and easiest place of access to the body at large: so speak freely, friends, that your committee may act intelligently. Yours, in the bonds of Christian fellowship.

Jacob Grim.

Salutation.

To the Saints and Faithful in Christ, at Springfield, Mass., who are blessed with the rich enjoyment of each other's society.

Grace, mercy and peace be with you. Accept this salutation from the few laboring sunburnt pilgrims scattered abroad here in Southern Kansas.

We are doing what we can for the Master's glory: gladly would we do more. Don't forget us in your prayers. May the peace of God be with you and his Spirit direct you.

May an earnest prayer go up to God for his richest blessing to rest upon our aged and beloved Editor, who has spent a life-time in lifting the veil of bigotry, and letting the light of truth shine among men. Remember, we are nearly all indebted to him for the light of truth we now enjoy.

God bless the Union! May its influence be felt more and more, till the great Deliverer shall come to give life to his waiting people.

Kansas is a rich field for missionary labor. Truth is advancing.

Yours, for the truth,

S. J. Brimhall.

From Camp-Meeting.

Dear Herald: Have you ever attended a Camp-meeting? You ought to be here to see and enjoy, as it cannot truthfully be described. Great credit is due Br. Day and others, who have so long and unweariedly labored in preparing the ground and fixings. It is indeed a splendid spot; admirably adapted for the occasion. The trees, mostly pine, are tall, straight, with green thick foliage at top; the ground smooth and soft, with plenty of cool, pure water just at hand; and the tents, you should see them, so cosy, so new, white and clean; furnished, many with carpets, beds and chairs; and arranged in a circle a little distance in front of preacher's stand: and this same stand is fitted up tastefully with mottoes of evergreen and flowers, such as "God is Love," etc.

This being the first or opening day, much cannot be said of the services, but the veteran pioneer, Geo. Storrs, has preached the opening sermon on the "Worship of God," and dedicated the ground to His service. His health is rather feeble, and he feels that he is nearing the end of his pilgrimage; but he speaks still with power and energy.

On the stand, with the speaker, are brethren Roworth, Stewart, Campbell, Pile; while assembled in the admirably arranged seats are a crowd of hearers. It is to be hoped much good may be the product of this gathering in the woods.

From Jane A. Goodrich.

Br. Storrs: Through the blessing of our heavenly Father, I am able to write once more. I can truly say, although afflicted and distressed in body, I have heavenly peace in my soul. O, what a friend Jesus is! Truly he sticketh closer than a brother. I feel a firm, unshaken confidence in Him. Though my heart and my flesh fail, God is the strength of my heart and my portion forever. O, blessed be the Lord forever, for what I enjoy of His love. Thy sweet smiles are more to be desired than all the riches, honors and pleasures of this world. I often think that we shall not suffer as much for him as he did for us; but we have this promise, that if we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him. Then we shall be more than paid for all that we have to endure in this life. O, how precious in the few days past has the Christian's hope looked to me. My heart says, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time.

I do thank the Lord that we can have a hope that is big with immortality. It seems many times as if I should go down to the grave; but my trust is in the living God; and I know that, whether I live or die, I shall be the Lord's. O that He may give us wisdom and patience to endure a little longer. Soon the night of suffering will be over; then we shall be where God shall wipe all tears from our eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away. What a blessed thought.

As the time draws near for our annual gathering, my heart is with you; and while I am prevented from attending with you, my prayer is, that our heavenly Father may open the windows of heaven and pour out such a blessing as never was known on a camp-ground before, and give you all a fresh baptism. May it be as it was on the days of Pentecost; and may much good be done. I hope that you may all go to increase in the knowledge of God and our Lord Jesus Christ; that our love of God and our Redeemer may be increased, and thereby our love and usefulness to our fellow-creatures may be increased; so that you can say that it is the best feast you ever attended. May the Lord bless you in all your endeavors to spread the truth as it is in Jesus.

From Z. McLester.

Geo. Storrs: As I am here yet, and still able to sit easy and read, at seventy-nine years of age, please continue my Herald to the amount of the enclosed dollar, after paying arrearages, if there is any left. If not, please let me know, for I must have the paper, and I'm ashamed to read it without paying for it, although I am poor and entirely past work, and can do nothing but read.

Your extract of the great speech in the Vatican greatly interested me. I have been watching with singular interest the proceedings of the late Ecumenical Council at Rome; and the stubborn opposition of Hyacinthe and Dollinger, and last, but not least by a vast, Strossmayer. You will not wonder at my interest in the late opposition to the blasphemous pretensions of Popery, when you learn that I've read with astonishment, indignation and disgust Maria Monk's (the escaped nun) disclosures. Next, the "Master Key to Popery, and then, the "History of the Popes," by De Cormenin. Now, sir, after allowing the most liberal margin for opposing writers, how can our most talented people even sympathize with or become Catholics?

In the Herald of the 26th of July, I was much interested in the correspondence on the subject of the forth-coming camp-meeting, and most particularly on the stand you took on the subject of the "Advent Union's" becoming sectarian in practice, while disavowing the principles, etc.; for I hold with Strossmayer, that "To be great or good we must be free." Hence, I was sorry, awhile back, to see that the Board of Managers resolved that your articles on the "Promise and Oath of God to Abraham," must be discontinued. But from the above named correspondence we have reasons to hope that the Herald will still be continued as the advocate of free thought and free speech; and that you may be continued its Editor-in-chief; and that I may get to see a copy of your dedicating sermon, and the proceedings at the camp-meeting, etc.

Most Respectfully.

From N. J. Lucas.

Dear Brethren and Sisters in the Lord: Blessed memory oft reminds me of dear ones of like precious faith, and I would gladly take you by the hand and converse with you of the better land; but pretty soon, if faithful, we shall gain that land and sing the victor's song.

My love for the coming of the Lord, and its kindred truths, is still unabated. The hope of the resurrection beams bright: life through Christ looks blessed. I sometimes ask myself the question, Will one so unworthy as myself have eternal life in the kingdom of God? O, I sometimes fear lest I be weighed in the balance and be found wanting. I never felt the need of being truly thankful to the Lord for health and strength, and many other blessings that we are constantly receiving, as I have for the past few weeks, while stopping in Lewiston, at the house of Eld. H. M. Bryant. Sister B. is affected with a lameness which causes her to be almost constantly confined to the house; and at times it is very painful; and to you, dear brethren and sisters, I would say, you that know the worth of prayer, raise one fervent effectual prayer to the Lord that this dear afflicted child of God may be restored to health. O for living, unshaken faith in Jesus, in these last days. The Saviour has the same loving, tender care for his children now as ever. His arm is not shortened that he cannot save, nor his ear heavy that he cannot hear. I can say if I ever loved thee, my Jesus, 'tis now. I feel just like believing the word of the Lord with my whole heart, and venturing out on his mercy. It is but a little longer we shall have to labor and toil here; we shall soon enter the haven of eternal rest; but we want clean hands and a pure heart and a willing mind to labor for the Lord, what little time we remain in this world of sorrow and of tears. May the Lord help us all to do what He has for us to do willingly.

We think much good might be done here in Lewiston under the labor of Eld. H. M. Bryant, if the people would get in the right place. We think the truth has been clearly presented by him thus far. There are some here who are real Life believers at heart, but have not the moral courage to confess it to the world. May the Lord help them to have firmness and decision of character in these last days, is my prayer.

Any wishing to write Br. Bryant, his P. O. address is Lewiston, Me. Your letters of love, dear brethren and sisters, would greatly comfort their hearts at this time, or, if any have any thing to donate, here is a worthy brother and sister. Br. B. would like to be at the Springfield camp-meeting, but on account of limited means we fear he will have to remain away. We judge it safe at all times and under all circumstances to lend to the Lord. May the Lord direct.

Yours, in hope of life.

Lewiston, Me., Aug., 1871.

From Eld. H. Rockwell.

Dear Brethren at the office of the Herald of Life, and all that love life, and desire length of days in the ages to come, when Christ shall be seated on the throne of David, to rule and to order it forever, even forever and ever. Br. Storrs, and all the dear ones waiting for life in the future; O come, praise the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever!

I arrived at the home of my adoption yesterday, from a mission of two or three weeks in Wopping, South Windsor, Rockville, Tolland, and Square Pond, and experienced some things in which my heart was made sad, and I could not refrain from weeping when I see so many wholly given up to idolatry. But this is not strange when we see an inscription on every altar throughout the length and breadth of the land, "To the unknown God," whom the masses are taught to ignorantly worship. But then it makes me rejoice to know that even the shadow of my poor old tottering frame causes intense alarm among the teachers of this false theory, for fear that their household gods be stolen, or that the gain of the craftsmen should be brought into disrepute, for by this they gain the wreath of popularity, and while it is not only saddening, it makes my heart right glad in the Lord to know that, if I am known to be within the lines of what they are pleased to call their limits, immediately you will see these frightened priests running from house to house, to prevent their weak lambs from being devoured by that old wolf in sheep's clothing. O, I pity the poor scared creatures. May the good Lord in great mercy bless them, and save them from insanity, to which they are rapidly tending. But did they know how much their opposition was spreading the blessed truth of No life out of Christ, and how it confirmed those that were not fully established in the present truth, I think that unless they are determined to resist the truth, and are resolved to impede the onward march of knowledge and grace that they would hold their peace, or adopt the wise counsel of one Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all the people: And now I say unto you, refrain from these men, and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought: but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it: lest haply ye be found to fight against God. O my dear brethren and sisters, in the hope of life in the future, do we fully realize the imminent danger of our position? I can truly say, I believe that the opposition that is so manifest, is but some of the fiery trials that are to try us, and if those but light and triflictions, do work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal work of glory, let us lift up our heads, knowing that our redemption draweth nigh.

New Britain, Conn., Aug. 5, 1871.

From William G. Samson.

Br. Storrs: I feel grateful a thousand times to you for the loving kindness and brotherly Christian love you had and showed to the public toward me. 'Tis true I am in my 77th year, and have almost lost the use of both feet and legs, but I can truly say when I have opportunity I have not lost the use of my tongue. Bless the Lord for this. O if I had but the use of my feet and legs, I would not be ashamed to go out and publish the blessed name of Jesus to a gainsaying world. Bless the Lord. When I meet among the people of God I want no one to tell me what to say; the blessed Lord is my spokesman; he teaches me what to say. But sorry to say I am able to go but very seldom.

When Sister Wood left me one of your Life views I read it through, but when we met again she asked me how I liked the Life views. I told her I did not think much of such doctrine as that was. I thought I understood about as much of the meaning of the Scriptures as any poor common man did, but I told the sister I would subscribe for the Life views six months, but I thought little of it. I was taught in the Methodist belief, which I belonged to for many years, that when a happy saint departed this life, the soul went home to glory. This I always believed, and should believe it now, but when I had read the Life views a little while, I soon found I was nothing but a fool. I thought I knew something when I knew nothing. I can find nothing in my Bible about going to glory at death. What reality would it be to go to glory at death and tarry there until the day of judgment, and then for the soul and spirit to return to join together with the old resurrected body? I find no such Bible doctrine. Jesus said to the dying thief, this day shalt thou be with me in paradise, meaning the grave, and this is how so many poor souls are deceived. I always thought so too, but I found myself in many mistakes, when I compared Scripture with Scripture on the Life views.

I never shall regret the day that our sister gave me the first paper, because I have learned more this six months from the Life views, comparing it with the Bible, than ever I knew in my whole life. So, my dear brothers and sisters all, let us keep up good courage to sing on pray on. Don't be discouraged; the prize lies before us, and the crown will soon be given. All glory be to Jesus. I long for the time to come when we all shall meet at home.

ALBANY, N. Y., Aug. 7, 1871.

FROM PROF. J. F. HUBER.

BR. STORRS: I feel sorry that the brethren declined to have the subject of the age to come discussed in the HERALD, assured that a discussion in a candid, fair and Christian spirit could not hurt, but would advance the cause and make the truth, on whichever side it lies, shine forth more luminously and more gloriously.

And the freedom granted you, without any undue restrictions, to present the truth of God as you understand it, and feel impressed and directed by the Spirit of God to proclaim it, at the approaching camp-meeting, gives me good hope that the former restriction will be removed, and that the beloved HERALD, under the continued guidance of its present editor and his excellent assistant, will, by the blessing of God, prove more and more useful in spreading light on the glorious doctrines of the blessed gospel of our Lord and LIFE-GIVER Jesus Christ.

Most gladly would I attend the gathering of the dear brethren and sisters in the tented grove, but circumstances forbid it. Still, though absent in body, I shall remember you all in my prayers that the God of light, love and peace may be with you, and crown your meeting with fraternal harmony, and with advancement in the knowledge of the truth and in all the graces of the divine Spirit.

And may we all pray on and labor on, diligently and faithfully, watching to the end; for soon, very soon our Lord and Master will come, and may we then be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless, and each receive a crown of life that fadeth not away.

With affectionate and fraternal greeting,

Yours, in Christ,

MIDDLETOWN, CONN., Aug. 9, 1871.

FROM ELLEN J. MOORE.

BR. STORRS: I have often thought that you and others in writing on the subject of Christ's second coming and on the Life views, were a little too severe in saying that such things would not be tolerated in any orthodox church. My mother always taught me that the Methodists believed in the second coming of Christ, and that he would reign upon the earth. I have been undeceived.

In June 1869, I met Br. Roworth at a mutual friend's, and there I heard for the first time the Life views. They were presented in such a way that they were soul-convincing. Consequently, I embraced them. At that time I was a member and Sabbath school teacher of a Methodist church. Shortly after I gave up my class of young ladies, it being impossible for me to attend regularly. The pastor's wife took the class. In February, 1870, I withdrew from the church and school. About three months ago I was waited upon by the scholars and one of the superintendents, to come back and take my class again, as the teacher was compelled to give it up. My answer to them was, if they (the school) will have me, I will most willingly. They were all agreed. I was proposed, and have taught regularly ever since. Last Monday night the first teachers meeting was held, when I sent in the following lines, as I had no idea of sailing under false colors:

To the Officers and Teachers of the ——— M. E. S. S.: I have been kindly and cordially invited to take charge of, and teach Mrs. ——— class, formerly my own, which invitation I most gladly accept if proposed and accepted in the regular way. I love the Sabbath work, and deem it a great privilege to be able thus to work for my Master.

That there may be no trouble in the future I should like to make a few statements. I believe in the speedy coming of Christ, and that He will reign upon this earth, "as it was given him for an everlasting possession." Also, "no immortality nor future life except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day, if dead, or a change, if alive." My creed, the Bible. I shall teach that death means death, and life means life. Now that you have my views, I beg that you will be as candid with me. If I am accepted or rejected please send me a few lines to that effect.

Yours, E. J. MOORE.

BROOKLYN, Aug. 3, 1871.

I was rejected. They were sorry I had formed such ideas; that if I taught it must be the Methodist doctrine. These are the words as near as I can recollect. The Secretary pro tem. waited upon me and gave me a verbal answer to my note.

Now then, Br. Storrs, why was I rejected? Was it because I believed in the coming of Christ, and his reign upon this earth, and in a resurrection? Was it because I believed that God gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believed on him should not perish but have everlasting life? Or was it because I have thrown all creeds one side, and have taken the Bible as my guide?

I am indeed unworthy, yet I thank God that he has given me strength thus openly to speak for my Saviour and our views. My constant prayer is that I may love his appearing and not be found wanting.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Aug. 7, 1871.

FROM F. E. DOWNS.

BR. STORRS: The enclosed slip I cut from the "Daily Emporium," a penny paper published in Trenton, N. J., and I thought it would interest our friends to learn that the soul-sleepers are waking up the rest of the world.

This editor delights in flights of fancy about the immortal soul and all that sort of stuff, and I do think a few lines from your pen might stir up some folks in and about this region.

Yours, in hope of a resurrection.

MORRISVILLE, PA., Aug. 5, 1871.

"A sect called Soul Sleepers is reported to be making considerable progress in Southwestern Virginia. The peculiarity of their creed is, that at death the wicked are annihilated and the righteous sleep till the resurrection. The same doctrine, it is said, is making considerable headway among the Disciple's Church in Southern Indiana."

ELD. S. L. WALTER.—FALLEN ASLEEP.

HELP, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth; the faithful fail from among the children of men. Our dear Br. WALTER has fallen asleep; blessed sleep from which none ever wakes to weep; precious in the sight of God is the death of his saints. His faith was unwavering to the last expiring breath; being happy in God, rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation, and notwithstanding his suffering was severe, he would be heard to say, precious Jesus, let me rest; I want to sleep in Jesus.

It would be protracting this article to name the hundredth part of his virtuous life; all that know him can testify that he was a faithful servant of the Lord and we mourn his loss, but we mourn not without hope of soon meeting him where parting will be no more.

Almost his last words were, tell Br. Storrs that I will meet him in the kingdom, and soon after he closed his eyes in peaceful repose, on Friday, the 4th inst., at 8 P. M.

The Methodist friends at Oconee opened their church, where a sermon was preached by the writer, from Isa. xiii. 12. From thence he was conveyed to the cemetery, where we laid him in the hands of a covenant-keeping God, leaving a dear companion to breast the storms of affliction alone. May the blessing of heaven attend her in the consolations of the Holy Spirit, and may the children of the deceased walk in the footsteps of their father, is the prayer of your unworthy servant.

THOSE QUESTIONS ANSWERED.

FROM D. J. ELLSWORTH.

IN the early spring of 1868, after the "67" time had passed, and while the "68" time argument was pending, (which I believed in) I commenced a careful study of those prophesies, visions and revelations made known to Daniel, concerning what should take place in the latter days, as also to serve as a beacon light, for those who should be living at the time of the setting up of that universal kingdom, when a king shall reign in righteousness, and execute justice and judgment in the earth. At the very outset of my investigations, serious questions arose which at once shook my faith in the past interpretations given by Advent believers, in which myself, in common with many others, had swallowed down without first giving the matter a critical study, but allowing others to think for me, and receiving their very plausible arguments as a sure and truthful understanding of the matter.

I immediately wrote two articles for publication in the "Crisis," headed: "The Visions of Daniel," and, "Is the Pope or the Papacy the Antichrist?" They were refused publication by the "Crisis Committee." To meet those questions, and answer them by the sure word of prophecy, would have shown the fallacy of their time arguments much sooner than the passing of the time set. The articles were afterwards published in the HERALD OF LIFE, but no one replied.

After months and years passed, the questions remained unanswered, and were again presented in another article, recently published in the HERALD OF LIFE, on the 24th chapter of Matt., and "The Abomination of Desolation."

I wish now, through the HERALD, to thank Br. Abel Larkin, of Mount Sterling, Ill., for a scriptural, common-sense and satisfactory solution of the troublesome questions.

I intended, in the above mentioned article, to have referred to Br. Larkin and his exposition of the times of Daniel, and of the events of the time of the end, published in a pamphlet by him, entitled, "The Closing Scenes of Jerusalem's Warfare." I recommend that pamphlet to all seekers after truth, and hesitate not in saying, that I consider Br. Larkin to be in advance of all other expositors that I know. I remain in Christian sympathy and love, your brother.

SPRINGFIELD NATIONAL ADVENT CAMP-MEETING.

PROVIDENCE permitting, a GENERAL CAMP-MEETING will be held at Springfield, Mass., on the camp-ground, beautifully located about one and a quarter miles from the R. R. Depot, on land of C. W. Chapin, Esq., known as "Chapin's Grove," commencing Saturday, August 19, and continuing till August 28.

Ample accommodations will be provided for board at the new and commodious boarding house on the ground. Board 85 cents per day. Breakfast, or supper, 35 cents each. Dinner at 50 cents, excepting Sunday, August 27, when it will be 75 cents. The boarding department is under the charge of the Committee, and any profits accruing from the same will go to the support of the meeting.

FARES.

Fare on the Boston and Albany Railroad is reduced one-third, which will be $4 from Boston to Springfield and return. Albany $4 35, Pittsfield $2 35, Worcester $2 50. Tickets to be obtained at the ticket offices, at Boston, Natick, South Framingham, Milford, Southville, Worcester, and the stations to Pittsfield. Also at North and South Adams, Cheshire, Chatham, Hudson, and Albany.

On the Hartford and New Haven R. R. fare is reduced one third; tickets to be obtained at New Haven, Meriden, Berlin, Middletown, Hartford, Windsor Locks, and Thompsonville.

On the Conn. R. R. fare is reduced one third from South Vernon and intermediate stations to Springfield. On all the above roads camp-meeting tickets, good from August 10 to August 30, must be called for at the ticket offices, and they must also be signed by the Secretary at the camp-meeting. Remember this.

On the roads operated by the

comprising Vermont Central, Vermont and Canada, Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly, Montreal and Vermont Junction, Sullivan, Og. and Lake Champlain, Missisquoi, Rutland, Vt. Valley, Montreal and Plattsburgh, Whitehall and Plattsburgh Railroads, the friends will purchase regular tickets at the several stations, for the nearest point on the Conn. River Road to South Vernon or Greenfield, at which place they will be sure to go to the ticket office and get a CAMP-MEETING ticket for Springfield, which they will present to the Secretary on the camp-ground to be countersigned; and they will then be furnished with a free return pass—good from South Vernon to the places they came from on any of the roads run by the Vermont Central Railroad.

On the Vt. and Mass. R. Road, Troy and Greenfield R. Road from Hoosac Tunnel, persons will purchase regular tickets at the offices for Greenfield. At Greenfield they will go into the ticket office and call for Camp-meeting Tickets for Springfield. All such when they go to the Secretary on the camp-ground to have their tickets countersigned, will be furnished with a free return pass from Greenfield to Athol, Fitchburg, or any place on the Vermont and Mass. R. R., or Troy and Greenfield R. R., that they may come from—provided twenty-five passengers shall have come over the Vt. and Mass. Railroad to the meeting.

Passengers coming from North of South Vernon, unless provided with return tickets, should purchase only to South Vernon, and then purchase to Springfield and return. The same rule will apply also to passengers coming from East of, or in the vicinity of Greenfield.

On the Providence and Worcester R. R., camp-meeting tickets at one third discount can be obtained at the depot in Providence, good from Aug. 10 to Aug. 30. Call for Camp-meeting tickets.

On the Worcester and Nashua R. R. Road, friends from Nashua, N. H., Groton Junction, and Clinton, will purchase regular tickets at the stations for Worcester, at which place they will purchase tickets for Springfield; and free return passes from Worcester will be furnished them by the Secretary on the ground.

Friends coming from New York can come and return for $4 70 by taking the boat at New Haven, and thence by cars to Springfield. The boat which leaves New York at 3 15 P. M., connects with the train at the steamboat wharf at New Haven. Passengers by this boat arrive in Springfield at 10 51 non and intermediate stations to Springfield. On all the above roads camp-meeting ticks, good from Aug. 10 to Aug. 30, must be called for at the ticket offices, and they must also be signed P. M. The other boat, which leaves New York at 11 P. M., reaches New Haven in time for the accommodation, which leaves New Haven at 8 A. M.; but passengers will have to go across the city by horse cars to the depot of the Hartford and New Haven R. R. Tickets for the R. R. to the camp-meeting will be sold on the steamboats. Passengers buying through tickets, will be furnished with a return ticket, which will be good only when endorsed by the Secretary of the camp-ground.

Arrangements have been made with the Eastern R. R. Co., by which those taking the cars from Portsmouth and intermediate places for Boston, paying full fares at the ticket offices, can have FREE RETURN PASSES by application to the Secretary, on the camp-ground.

Cars leave the Boston and Albany depot, Boston, at 5, 7, 8 1-2 and 9 A. M.; and at 3, 4 1-2, and 9 P. M.

Arrangements with any other roads that may be made, will be noticed hereafter.

CAMP-MEETING IN MAINE.

THERE is to be an Advent camp-meeting on the old ground in the Emerson Grove, in North Hermon, to commence Sept. 4, and continue one week. Distance from Bangor 5 miles. Those coming by boat or cars should come to Bangor, thence they will find conveyance to the ground. There will be provision made for man and beast, at reasonable rate, on the ground.

We extend a cordial invitation to all Christians; also, to the preaching brethren in Maine, to rally once more on old camp Hermon, there to labor for the perishing, and to strengthen the weak: also we would say to the preaching brethren West, if any should see this notice and feel as though the Lord wanted you should come to this gathering, come, and we will use you the best that we can.

Now, brethren and sisters, come up to camp Hermon; come praying; come in the Spirit; come to do good and to get good. This camp-meeting is to be a free meeting, without regard to sect or party.

Committee of Arrangements. — Liberty Wetherbee, Daniel E. Ireland, Charles Philips, Austen Pomroy.

NOTICE.

THE Lord will, there will be a Grove Meeting in Rootville, Crawford Co., Pa., to commence Aug. 31, and continue one week. Come, all who can; not only to be hearers, but doers. Homes for all free.

Now, brethren and sisters, lay by the cares of this life for one week, and come and work for the Lord. Those coming by railroad, come to Lincolnville, (two miles from the meeting), where teams shall be waiting every day during the week.

ZWINGLI AND LUTHER.

THE biographer of Zwingli thus sums up the chief parallel events of their lives in order to show more distinctly how they approached toward and diverged from each other.

"Zwingli and Luther were born within a few weeks of each other—Luther on Martinmas, 1483, Zwingli on the first of January, 1484. Their parents were pious, upright peasants—Zwingli's affluent and indulgent to their children, Luther's poor and austere. Whilst Zwingli's teacher was distinguished for learning and gentleness of disposition, we only know Luther's master at Mansfield as a savage school tyrant, who flogged his pupil one forenoon fifteen times. Zwingli's parents liberally relieved their son from all the cares of earning his livelihood. Luther had to beg his scanty meal with singing. Both excite admiration by their fine voices. Luther's brings him the means of support from widow Cotta, in Eisenach, while Zwingli's had nearly introduced him to a cloister life. About the year 1502, both became acquainted with the Scriptures—Zwingli in Basle, at the foot of Wyttembach; Luther in the library at Erfurt, where he sees a complete Bible for the first time. About the year 1505, Zwingli finds in Leo Jud a friend that remains faithful to him during his whole life, while Luther loses in a terrible manner such an one in his Alexis, which induces him to seek a cloister. From 1506 to 1510, Zwingli, as parson of Glarus, wrestles against the temptations of his life, and combats the corruption of his country, while Luther suffers under inward trials and the malice of the monks. Zwingli, by the study of the classics, pierces to a deeper acquaintance with the Bible; while Luther, by reading the writings of the Mystics, arrives at the same result. In the year 1510, Luther, in 1513, Zwingli, go to Italy, enthusiastic advocates of the papacy. Both are surprised in the Milanese at finding another ritual for the Mass—the Ambrosian.

"Luther, in his journey, becomes acquainted at Rome with the thorough dissoluteness of the lower classes of the Roman clergy. Zwingli, in his Italian campaigns, has his eyes opened to the total corruption of papal misgovernment. In the year 1517, both found peace of soul through faith in Jesus Christ, and while Zwingli, resolute to proclaim the word of God without respect of human laws and doctrines, attacks the pilgrimages and the adoration of the Virgin, Luther, from the same standing point, attacks the sale of indulgences, and without intending it, shakes the papacy to its foundation."

The two great reformers were more strongly contrasted in death than in life. The fiery Luther died peacefully in his bed at the ripe age of sixty-three; at forty-seven, the gentle Zwingli perished on the battle-field. When the war, which he had tried vainly to prevent, broke out between the Protestant and papal cantons of Switzerland, the pastor accompanied his brethren in the faith, as field preacher, to the conflict. In the midst of the action, while bending down to comfort with the words of life a fallen countryman, a stone struck his helmet with such force that he fell to the ground. On his attempting to rise, a hostile spear gave him a fatal stab. He had fallen near a tree. He was leaning on it; his hands were clasped, his lips moved in prayer, while his eyes were directed heaven-ward. In this state a party of marauding soldiers found him. "Will you confess? Shall we fetch a priest!" they cry to him. The tongue which had so eloquently combated error was now dumb, but a motion of the head signifies a negative. "Then call upon the mother of God and the blessed saints in your heart," they shout to him. Again he refuses. "Die, then, obstinate heretic," said an officer from Unterwalden, and gave him a deadly blow. Nor did the contrast end here. The remains of Luther were borne to the tomb by a funeral procession of extraordinary pomp; the body of Zwingli was quartered by the common hangman, and the ashes mixed with the ashes of a swine, that it might be impossible for his friends and admirers to identify his remains. —Selected.

CHRIST THE "HEIR OF ALL THINGS."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD: "Heir of all things!" What a glorious destiny for the Son of man! Well might the prophet say, "Who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm (strength or power) of the Lord been revealed? "Appointed," by God the Father, "heir of all things"—therefore not yet in possession. But now we see not yet all things put under him. But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels (by assuming human nature) for the suffering of death (had He assumed angelic nature He could not have submitted himself to death), crowned with glory and honor. Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they; for unto which of the angels said God at any time, "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee?" But unto the Son He saith, "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever, etc. For unto the angels hath He (God) not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak." The phrase, "world to come," might be quite as properly rendered "age to come." We see clearly, then, the apostles had been speaking of a world or "age" to come, the government and control of which was not to be submitted to angels. But to the Son he saith, "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever." It is evident, then, that as the Son of God is to have a "throne" forever and ever, that he is, among other things, heir to a "kingdom," of which he is not yet put in possession. A sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of Thy "kingdom." Why, all the prophets, since the foundation of the world, have predicted Christ the "Heir to the throne of His father David;" and the "throne of David" was in the city of Jerusalem. One thing is sure, that whatever Christ may be heir to, He is not yet in possession. He declared himself a king, and for that he was mocked with a "crown of thorns" and crucified. But, so sure as He was literally crucified, so sure will He be literally crowned; "for the kingdoms of this world (or 'age') shall literally become the one kingdom of Christ, and he shall reign from sea to sea and from the rivers to the ends of the earth."

"No cross no crown" is a truism often made use of in the pulpit without the persons using it fully comprehending or believing its true import. "First the cross, then the crown," may be literally applied to Christ. The Apostle says, "Having suffered with Him (Christ) we shall also reign with Him." What did the Apostles mean by the term "reign?" "Oh!" say orthodox theologians, "to reign in heaven, to be sure." I would ask them, who would there be in heaven for the saints to reign over, seeing that all in heaven would be equally immortal, because none could be there but immortals? Whereas, the Scriptural doctrine is that, in the world or age to come, of which the Apostles speak, and the government of which is to be submitted to Christ, for the "government shall be upon his shoulders;" nations in the flesh shall be ruled and reigned over by Christ and the resurrected saints. One of the apostles asked Christ what should be their reward who had left all their worldly affairs and interests to follow him, and received in reply—"At the restoration of all things, among others the twelve tribes of Jacob, you apostles shall sit upon twelve thrones, each one ruling and reigning over one of the (restored) tribes of Israel." The kingdom which Christ taught his disciples to pray for —"Thy kingdom come"—is a universal kingdom to be set up here upon the earth. For why do we pray, "Thy kingdom come," but that "Thy will may be done on earth," not in heaven, as some theologians falsely assert? Furthermore, we are told that this kingdom shall "break in pieces all other kingdoms"—the kingdoms of men—"and itself shall stand forever," verifying the declaration of the Word of God—"Thy throne is forever and ever; a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of Thy kingdom."—N. Y. Sunday Herald.

HIDDEN LIFE.

AN unrestrained flow of talk is a sure sign of a trifling, dissipated mind; and no one can turn readily from useless, frivolous conversation to recollected prayer or spiritual reading so as to profit by them. But there is another kind of silence to be cultivated, besides that of the tongue, as regards others. I mean silence as regards one's self: restraining the imagination, not permitting it to dwell overmuch on what we have heard or said; not indulging in the phantasmagoria of picture-thoughts, whether of the past or future. How hard this is, those only who have struggled with the difficulty know! And yet how necessary it is; for how can we hope to hear God's voice amid the invisible but no less real whirl of moral dissipation which such a mental habit induces? How can we gather those wandering thoughts into a recollected attitude of prayer? Be sure that you have made no small progress in the spiritual life when you can control your imagination so as to fix it on the duty and occupation actually existing, to the exclusion of the crowd of thoughts which are perpetually sweeping across the mind. No doubt you cannot prevent those thoughts from arising, but you can prevent yourself from dwelling on them; you can put them aside; you can check the self-complacency, or imitation, or earthly longings which feed them, and by the practice of such interior mortification you will attain that spirit of inward silence which draws the soul into a close intercourse with God.

You must resolve not to be disheartened; but even if you were to fall a hundred times a day, determine to rise up each time, and go onward. What will it matter though you have fallen by the way, if you reach your journey's end safely at last? God will forgive the falls; they often are caused by undue haste, which prevents us from taking fitting precautions, or, with timid souls, from a perpetual looking round for imaginary dangers, which cause them to stumble.

If God requires any thing of us, we have no right to draw back under the pretext that we are liable to commit some fault in obeying. It is better to obey imperfectly than not at all. Perhaps you ought to rebuke some one dependent on you, but you are silent for fear of giving way to vehemence; or you avoid the society of certain persons, because they make you cross and impatient. How are you to attain self-control if you shun all occasions of practising it? Is not self-choosing a greater fault than those into which you fear to fall? Aim at a steady mind to do right; go wherever duty calls you; and believe firmly that God is an indulgent Father, and will forgive the faults which take our weakness by surprise in spite of our sincere desire to please him.

A holy man writes to one of his spiritual children (a religious novice): "If you can learn to walk slowly and speak slowly, I shall have hopes of you."—By Pere Jean Nicolas Grou, born, 1731; died, 1803.

BETHLEHEM HOME SCHOOL.

THIS excellent and well-known institution has just passed into the charge of Rev. AMBROSE RONDTHALER, who for upwards of sixteen years has been a Professional Teacher and Principal of educational institutions in York, and at Bethlehem, Pa.

The course of study is thorough, and all students enter not only the school-room but also become part of the Principal's family. All sectarianism is banished from the school.

The Bible only is the standard of religious instruction.

For terms and particulars send for circular.

REV. AMBROSE RONDTHALER,
Principal.

Note by the Editor.

The Fall term of Br. Rondthaler's School commences Aug. 16. He has the highest recommendations as a teacher. We hope that our friends, and others, having children that they wish to send from home to school, where they will have fatherly care and be well instructed, will patronize the above-named institution.

Homeward Bound.

What matter if on Life's broad sea
The wild wind toss our bark,
And white-browed waves in anger rise
And all around is dark!
We care not for the perils round,
So long as we are homeward bound.

The tempest's breath may rend our sails,
The sullen thunders roar,
But every surge is drifting us
Nearer a peaceful shore.
Where endless joy and rest are found
To bless the faithful homeward bound.

We're homeward bound; our hearts are strong,
For at the helm is He
Who once in storm and darkness stilled
The sea of Galilee;
And He will still the tempest's sound
And safely guide us homeward bound.

Soon shall we moor our little bark
Beside the shining shore,
And meet again, in that blest land,
The friends we've loved before:
And in our Father's kingdom crowned
Greet all the loved ones homeward bound.

"The Children of the Resurrection."

Extract from a Dialogue.

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

A.—I am glad to see you again, Br. S., with an opportunity of continuing our former conversation. I confess that a correct understanding of the subject of a future life is of great importance, and the topic is of increased interest to me since our friendly conversation over the matter. But having given the subject much thought I cannot feel otherwise than that you are greatly in error. I hope I may convince you of this.

S.—It is always a pleasure for me to converse with candid and earnest Bible students. My heart rests with supreme satisfaction upon the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," because I believe it to be the plain truth of God regarding the subject of future destiny. I did not embrace it hastily, I can assure you, and if I am in error, as you honestly think, of course you can unfold the true light of the Bible to me, and I will gladly accept it. Show me by the unequivocal and uniform teaching of the Scriptures, that others than the heirs of God's everlasting kingdom shall have a revival from death, and I will embrace your position as the truth. Until you do this you must allow me to enjoy the conclusion that I am right, and that the error lies in the doctrine that any portion of the human family shall be raised from the dead in mortality.

A.—Let me call your attention to some of the means by which you frame and endeavor to sustain your theory. For instance, you make a great mistake in affirming that a future life and eternal life are synonymous, or, in other words, in affirming that all who shall live again will secure their revival from death by being made "partakers of the divine nature" of Christ. I admit that the saints are raised to eternal life, but as they compose only a small portion of those who shall be raised from the dead, hence there must be a future life that is not eternal.

S.—You have struck at the real groundwork of the subject. I am glad you admit that the saints are raised to eternal life, for this agrees with the Apostle Paul that "the dead shall be raised incorruptible." If I can show from the Scriptures that none but the children of God shall have a revival from death, then you must admit that life beyond the grave is eternal life, and hence, eternal life and future life are the same thing.

A.—That's the point I am desirous of seeing you substantiate by Bible evidence. Of course your conclusion is correct if you can establish the premises, which, however, I consider simply assumption on your part.

S.—Now, Br. A., you will freely admit that all believers under the Mosaic dispensation looked for a future life, or a revival from death. Christ in one of His discourses to the Jews says, in regard to the Old Testament Scriptures, "in them ye think ye have eternal life"—but you know that this expression is not found in those Scriptures, with the exception of Dan. xii. 2, where its equivalent, "everlasting life," is found once. They based their hope of a future life upon the faithfulness of God in fulfilling the promises which he had made, "having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth." A direct promise of their resurrection is found in Isa. xxvi. 19: "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." Thus it will be seen that a future life by a revival from death, as revealed in the Old Testament Scriptures, and eternal life in the New Testament are the same. They looked for a revival from death from the fact that God called himself "their God." The Old Testament Scriptures made known no revival from death for any but the children of God. Hence, as His people alone were the subjects of a future life, and as Christ declares emphatically that those who are "accounted worthy" of a "resurrection from the dead" can die no more, because "they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection," you must see that future life and eternal life are synonymous, for all who have a resurrection from the dead, of course will be "the children of the resurrection," and these Christ says are "the children of God."—See Luke xx. 35–38.

A.—I think you err in applying Isa. xxvi. 19 to only a class of the human family, because it says "the earth shall cast out the dead." This means all the dead; and Dan. xii. 2 shows that only a part of the dead shall be raised to "everlasting life," and the others to condemnation.

S.—The misapplication you speak of is wholly on your side. The context proves that my application of Isa. xxvi. 19 is correct. Verse 14 speaks of the other class of the dead who are not God's "dead men." It reads: "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise: therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made their memory to perish." This verse proves that you are wrong in applying the 19th verse to the re-living of all the dead. The expressions "Thy dead men shall live," and "The earth shall cast out the dead," does not mean that the class of dead shall have a resurrection whom the 14th verse declares "shall not live," "shall not rise." With this fact in view you must see that the 19th verse refers only to a class of the dead—the same class whom Christ affirms shall be raised to an endless life, "being the children of the resurrection," and thus embraces all who shall live again. Hence, we again repeat the assertion that the Scriptures reveal but one state of existence beyond the grave, and that is a deathless state.

You cite me Dan. xii. 2 as corroborative proof that both classes of the human family shall have a revival from death. I cannot but think this is done without mature consideration of the passage. Let me point you to eminent criticism upon this passage, all the more valuable because coming from those who believe in the resurrection of all men. Prof. Whiting says: "There is an obscurity in this passage, produced by an improper rendering of the words 'ailleh—weailleh.' They are translated in this instance, 'some' and 'some.' Now, the phrase, composed of the pronoun ailleh, with the conjunction waw (and) joined to ailleh, is the proper expression for these and those." Prof. W. translates the passage thus: "And many from the sleepers of the dust of the ground shall awake, these to everlasting life, and those to reproaches and everlasting abhorrence." Prof. Bush renders it these and those, and says: "The waking is evidently predicted of the many and not of the whole; consequently 'these' in the one case must be understood of the class that awakes, and the 'those' in the other of that which remains asleep."

Dr. Hody argues that "if many standing alone could signify all, many of could not. Many of does plainly except some." Gesenius says that the Hebrew word "designates a part taken out of the whole." These criticisms show that Daniel is in full harmony with the other inspired writers. In support of the facts I have already mentioned, I might cite you John iii. 36, and many other passages in the New Testament.

A.—I was expecting you would quote John iii. 36 before this time. This passage merely means that the wicked dead will not see eternal life.

S.—You are quite right in saying that this passage teaches that the wicked dead will not see eternal life, but the passage uproots the theory that they will see life of any kind. Let us look at the passage: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting (zoen) life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see (zoen) life: but the wrath of God abideth on him." Upon the word life in this passage Sylvester Bliss published the following valuable criticism while editor of the "Advent Herald:" "The word zoe is . . . never expressive of eternal life, and is in no place thus rendered. It has in it no element of duration; which, when given in its connection, is always expressed by some adverbal or adjective qualifier, and thus the phrase eternal life is nowhere represented in the Greek by zoe, which, in such connection, is simply the representation of life, as significant of its kind; its duration as expressed by its appendage eternal, being otherwise represented. Thus in John iii. 36, 'He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life.' The word life in each case is represented by zoen; whilst everlasting, in the first connection, is represented by aionion—the phrase rendered life everlasting being zoen aionion; whilst life in the last connection, is zoen, without expression of its duration." As zoen means simply life, without any "expression of its duration," and as none but "the children of God" shall be "accounted worthy" of a resurrection from the dead, being called "the children of the resurrection," the conclusion seems unavoidable that the only life beyond the grave is eternal life, and hence, eternal life and future life are synonymous.

The Temptation of Jesus.

BY W. H. FORD.

"Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil."—Matt. iv. 1.

This text, above all others, is relied upon by many to sustain the once popular, but now fast waning, theory of the existence of a supernatural personal spirit-devil, of whom they say he is the cause and instigator of all wickedness. He is represented as being in all places, at all times, plotting evil against men, to prevent them from returning to their allegiance. He is supposed to know the thoughts and purposes of all mankind; and to make him still more dreadful, he is said to be with us at home and abroad, and we visible to him, but he invisible to us, like a masked battery at the corner of every street, ready to belch forth death upon the careless passers by. It is an undeniable and lamentable fact that this imaginary being takes a more prominent part in the religious revivals of the present day than the great God himself. The loving command of our heavenly Father is not sufficient: the uplifted and outstretched arms of our Saviour are not sufficient: the glories and blessings of an eternal life are not sufficient. All these avail but little toward inducing men to forsake evil; and in order to complete the work of human redemption, they conjure up a frightful creature, whom they say is ready to snatch the man's soul, as soon as the body dies, and bear it off to the bottomless pit. They seem to have forgotten that passage of Scripture which says, that the love of God restraineth man from evil.

Let us now inquire what kind of a devil it was that Jesus was tempted of. The idea that Jesus would take a great personal spirit-devil for a companion, and suffer himself to be led about by such a being, is very unreasonable, to say the least.

Paul says that Jesus was tempted in all points like as we are.—Heb. iv. 15. Then, according to Paul, if we are not tempted of a personal spirit-devil, neither was Jesus, for he was tempted in all points like as we are. Now, if we can find out just how we are tempted, then it will be an easy matter to know how Jesus was tempted.

James says, that every man is tempted when he is [tempted of a personal devil? Not a bit of it, but every man—that is every man for himself] is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed.—James i. 14. Christ, being in the likeness of sinful flesh, had lusts to entice him the same as other men; and he being hungry in the wilderness, and knowing that he had the power to convert stones into bread, his craving appetite said to him, "convert those stones into bread—you have the power." These self-suggestive ideas would arise in his mind: Why suffer when I have power to convert stones into bread? But he knowing that it was against his Father's will for him to obtain food in that way, chose rather to continue to suffer than to incur his Father's displeasure.
